long floss embzodered and fret with gold after an tike fashion: and ouer that garment was a short garment of cloth of gold scant to the knee, fashioned like a tabard all ouer, with small double rolles, all of flat gold of damaske, fret with frised gold, and on their heads skarfs and wyappers of damaske gold, with flat pipes, that strange it was to behold. The other two ladies were in kirtels of crimsin & purple sattin, embzodered with a vinctel of pomegranats of gold, all the garments cut compasse wise, hauing but demie sleeves, naked downe from the elbowes, and ouer their garments were bochets of pleasants, rolled with crimsin veluet, and set with letters of gold like characts, their heads rolled in pleasants and tipets like the Egyptians, embzodered with gold.
Their faces, necks, armes, and hands, covered in fine pleasants blacke: some call it Lumbardines, which is marvellous thin; so that the same ladies se med to be pigers or blacke spozes. Of these foresaid sir ladies, the ladie Marie sister vnto the king was one, the other I name not. After that the kings grace and the ladies had danced a certeine time, they depar ted euerie one to his lodging.

In this yere also came ambassadours, not onelie from the king of Arragon and Castile, but also from the kings of France, Denmarke, Scotland, and o ther places, which were highlie welcomed, and noble intertained. It happened on a daie, that there were certeine noble men made a wager to run at the ring and parties were taken, and which partie attained or toke awaie the ring offnest with certeine courses, shoud win the wager. Whereof the kings grace hearing, offered to be on the one partie with sir com panions. The ambassadours hearing thereof, were much desirous to see this wager tried, and speciallie the ambassadours of Spaine, who had neuer sene the king in harnesse. At the daie appointed, the king was mounted on a goodlie courser, trapped in purple veluet cut, the inner side whereof was wygouth with flat gold of damaske in the skole, and the veluet on the other side cut in letters: so that the gold appeared as though it had bene embzodered with certeine rea sons or posies. And on the veluet betwene the let ters were fastened castels and sheafes of arrowes of

bucket gold, with a garment, the sleeves compassed ouer his harness, and his bales of the same worke; with a great plume of feathers on his head pece, that came downe to the arlon of his saddle, and a great companie of fresh gentlemen came in with his grace richlie armed and decked, with manie other right gorgeouslie appareled; the trumpets before them goodlie to behold, whereof manie strangers but speciallie the Spaniards much reioiced; for they had neuer seene the king before that time armed.

On the other side came in another band of gentlemen freshlie appareled, and pleasant to behold, all appareled in cloth of gold, checkered with flat gold of damaske, powdered with roses; and so euerie man ran: but to conclude, the pise was given unto the king. Euerie man did run twelue courses, the king did beare away the ring fise times, and attened it there. And these courses thus finished, the Spanishe ambassadours desired to haue some of the badges of heretics, which were on the kings trapper. His grace therof knowing, commanded euerie of them to take thereof what it pleased them, who in effect took all on the more part; for in the beginning they thought they had bene counterfeit, and not of gold; as they were. On the next day then next following in the second yeare of his reign, his grace being young, and willing not to be idle, rose in the morning verie earlie to fetch maie of greene boughs; himselfe fresh & richlie appareled; and clothed all his knights, squiers and gentlemen in white sattin, and all his gard and peomen of the crowne in white sarcenet: and so went euerie man with his bow and arrowes shooting to the wood, and so repaired againe to the court, euerie man with a greene bough in his cap.

Now at his returning, manie hearing of his going on making, were desirous to see him shot, for at that time his grace shot as strong and as great a length as anie of his gard. There came to his grace a certaine man with bow and arrowes, and desired his grace to take the muster of him, and to see him shot; for at that time his grace was contented. The man put the one foot in his bosome, and so did shoot, and shot a verie good shot, and well towards his marke: whereof, not onelie his grace, but all other greatlie marvelled. So the king gaue him a reward for his so doing; which person afterwards of the people, and of them in the court, was called, foot in bosome. The same yeare in the feast of Pentecost, holden at Greenwich, that is to say, the thursdaie in the same weeke, his grace with two other with him, challenged all commers, to fight with them at the barriers with target, and casting the speare of eight foot long; and that done, his grace with the said two aides to fight euerie of them twelue strokes with two handed swordes, with and against all commers, none excepted being a gentleman; where the king behaued himselfe so well, and deliuered himselfe so valiantlie by his hardie prowesse and great strength, that the praise and laud was given to his grace, and his aides: notwithstanding that diuerse and strong persons had assailed him and his aides.

From thence the whole court removed to Windsor, then beginning his progresse, & exercising himselfe daillie in shooting, singing, dancing, wrestling, casting of the barre, plateng at the recorders, flute, virginals, in setting of songs, and making of ballads; he did set two full masses, euerie of them fise parts, which were song oftentimes in his chappell, and afterwards in diuerse other places. And when he came to Woking, there were kept both iustices and turneies: the rest of this progresse was spent in hunting, hawking, and shooting. A Doctor Colet deane of Poules erected a fre schoule in Poules church yard in London, and committed the oversight thereof to the masters and wardens of the mercers, because himselfe was borne in London, & was sonne to Henrie Colet mercer, sometime lord maior of the cite of London. On the thirdd summer night, the king came pryncelie into Cheape, in one of the cotes of his gard; and on saint Peters night, the king and queene came riding roiallie to the kings hed in Cheape, there to behold the watch of the cite.

Now when the said progresse was finished, his grace, the queene, with all their whole traine, in the moneth of October following, removed to Greenwich. The king not minded to see young gentlemen vnerpert in martiall feates, caused a place to be prepared within the park of Greenwich, for the queene and the ladies to stand & see the fight with battle axes that should be done there, where the king himselfe armed, fought with one Ciot a gentleman of Almaine, a tall man, and a good man of armes. And then after they had done, they marched alwaies two and two together, and so did their feats and enterprises euerie man verie well. Albeit, it happened the said Ciot to fight with sir Edward Howard, which Ciot was by him striken to the ground. The morow after this enterpryse done, the king with the queene came to the Towler of London. And to the intent that there should no displeasure nor malice be borne by anie of those gentlemen, which fought with the ar against other; the king gaue unto them a certeine summe of gold, valued at two hundred markes, to make a banquet among themselves withall. The which banquet was made at fishmongers hall in Thames street, where they all met to the number of foure and twentie, all appareled in one sute of liuerie, after Almaine fashion; that is to say, their bitter garments all of yellow sattin, yellow hosen, yellow shoes, girdels, scabberds, and bonnets with yellow feathers, their garments and hosen all cut & lined with white sattin, and their scabberds wound about with sattin. After their banquet ended, they went by torchlight to the Towler, & presented themselves before the king, who took pleasure to behold them.

From thence the eight day of November, his grace removed to Richmond, and willed to be declared to all noble men and gentlemen, that his grace with two aides, that is to wit, maister Charles Brandon, and maister Compton, during two daies would answer all commers; with speare at the tilt one daie, and at turneie with swordes the other. And to accomplish this enterpryse, on the thirtenth day of November, his grace armed at all peeces with his two aides entered the field, their bales and trappers were of cloth of gold, set with red roses, wrought with gold of broderie. The counterpart came in freshlie appareled, euerie man after his deuise. At these iustices the king brake more fraues than anie other, & therefore had the pise. At the turneie in likewise, the honour was his. The second night were diuerse strangers of Maritiman the emperours court and ambassadours of Spaine with the king at supper. When they had supped, the king willed them to go into the queenes chamber, who so did.

In the meane season, the king with diuerse other, appareled in Almaine iackets of crimsin and purple sattin, with long quartered sleeves, and hosen of the same sute, their bonnets of white velvet, wrapped in flat gold of damaske, with visards and white plumes, came in with a munumrie; and after a certeine time that they had played with the queene and the strangers, they departed. Then suddenly entered sir miquels richlie appareled, plaieng on their instruments; and then followed fourtene persons, gentlemen, all appareled in yellow sattin, cut like Almaine, bearing toches. After them came sir Disgust in white sattin and greene, embroidered and set with letters and cassels of fine gold in bulion, the garments were of strange fashion, with also strange cuts, curle cut knit with points of fine gold, and tassels of the same, their hosen cut and tied in likewise, their bonnets of cloth of silver wond with gold. The first of these sir was the king, the earle of Essex, Charles Brandon, sir Edward Howard, sir Thomas Annet, and sir Henrie Guilford.

Then part of the gentlemen bearing torches departed, and the Queene returned, after whom came in six ladies, apparelled in garments of crimsin sattin embroyered and trauesered with glosse of gold, cut in pomegranats and pokes, fringed after the fashion of Spaine. Then the said sir men danced with these six ladies: and after that they had danced a scalon, the ladies took off the mens visors, whereby they were known: whereof the queene and the strangers much praised the king, and ended the pastime: It is to be noted, that at this time the queene was great with child, & shortly after this pastime, she took her chamber at Richmond, for the which cause the king kept his Christmas there. And on the twetyeares daie the first daie of Januarie the queene was deliuered of a prince to the great gladnesse of the realme, for the honour of whome fieres were made, and diuers vessels with wine set for such as would take thereof in certain streets in London, and generall processions thereupon to laud God, As touching the preparation of the princes christening, I ouerpaste, which was honorable done, whose godfathers at the font were the archbishop of Canturburie, and the earle of Surrey, & godmother the lady Katharine countesse of Deuonshire, daughter to king Edward the fourth: his name was Henrie.

Against the twelſe date of the date of the Epiſ-nie at night, before the banket in the hall at Richmond, was a pageant deuſed like a mounteine, glittering by night as though it had bene all of gold and ſet with ſtones, on the top of which mounteine was a tree of gold, the branches and boughes ſtred with gold, ſpreading on euery ſide ouer the mount-eine with roſes and pomegranats, the which mount-eine was with vices brought vp towards the king, and out of the ſame came a ladie appareled in cloth of gold, and the children of honour called the bend-men, which were freſhly diſguiſed, and danced a mo-rice before the king; and that done, reentred the mounteine, which then was drawen backe, and then was the waſſail of banket brought in, and ſo brake up Chriſtmaſſe. Shortlie after and before the queene churching, the k. rode to Walingſham. The queene being churched or purified, the king and ſhe removed from Richmond to Weſtmiſter, where was preparation for ſolemne ſaiks in the hono^r of the queene; the king being one, and with him three aides: his grace being called Cure loial, the lord William erle of Deuonſhire called Bon volcire, ſir Thomas Lancet named Bon espoir, ſir Edward Penill called Valiant deſire, whoſe names were ſet vpon a goodlie table, & the table hanged in a tree curioſlie wrought, and they were called Les quater cheualiers de la for-reſt ſaigne, theſe ſoure to run at the tilt againſt all comers, with other certeine articles compriſed in the ſaid table.

A place in the palace was prepared for the king and quene, richlie hanged, the inner part with cloth of gold, & the utter with rich cloth of arras. These feasts began the thirtenth daie of Februarie. Now after that the quene with hir traine of ladies had taken their places, into the palace was conducted a pageant of a great quantitie, made like a Forrest with roches, hills, and dales, with diuerse lundrie trees, flours, hartshornes, fern, and grasse, with six foresters standing within the same Forrest, garnished in cotes and hoods of gréene beluet, by whome laie a great number of speares; all the trees, hearbs, and floures of the same forest were made of gréene beluet, gréene damaske, & filke of diuerse colours, as sattin & farrenet. In the middest of this forest was a castell standing made of gold, and before the castell gate sat a gentleman freschly apparelled, making a garland of roses for the pysle. This forest was drawen as it were by strength of two great beastes, a lion and an antelop; the lion dogged all ouer with damaske gold, the antelop was wrought all ouer with siluer of da-maske, his beames or hories and tuskes of gold.

These beasts were led with certeine men appareled like wild men, or woodhouſes, their bodies, heads, faces, hands, and legs couered with graine ſlike ſlothed: on either of the ſaid antelop and lion ſat a lady richlie apparelled, the beaſts were tied to the pagant with great chaines of gold, as horſes be in the cart. When the pagant reſted befoze the queene, the forenamed foreſters blew their hozns, then the deuife or pagant opened on all ſides, and out iſſued the foreſaid foure knights armed at all peces, euerie of them a ſpeare in his hand on horſebacke with great plumes on their heads, their baſes and trappers of cloſh of gold, euerie of them his name embordred on his baſe and trapper. On the other part with great noiſe a ſwell of trumpets as of drums entered into the field, the erle of Eſſex, the lord Thomas Howard with manie other cleane armed, their trappers and baſes all of crimſin fatin embordred with branches of pomegranats of gold and poſies; with manie a freſh gentleman riding befoze them, their ſotmen well apparelled: and ſo the iuſts began and endured all that daye.

The morrow, being the thirteenth of Februarie after dinner, at time convenient, the queene with the ladies repaired to see the lusts, the trumpets sounded, and in came many a noble man and gentleman richly appparelled, taking vp their horses; after whom followed certeine lordes appparelled, they and their horses in cloth of gold and russet tinsell: knights in cloth of gold and russet velvet; and a great number of gentlemen on foot in russet sattin and pellois, and yeomen in russet damaske and yellow, all the nether part of euerie mans hosen scarlet and yellow caps. Then came the king vnder a pavilion of cloth of gold and purple velvet embrodered, and powdered with li. and ss. of fine gold, the compasse of the pavilion a-bone embrodered richly, and ballanced with flat gold, beaten in wire, with an imperial crowne in the top of fine gold, his haies and trappers of cloth of gold, fretted with damaske gold, the trapper pendant to the taile. A crane and chafon of Steele, in the front of the chafon was a godlie plume set full of musers or trembling spangles of gold. After followed his three aides, euerie of them vnder a pavilion of crimsin damaske and purple, powdered with li. and ss. of fine gold, ballanced and fringed with gold of damaske: on the top of euerie pavilion a great ss. of goldsmiths worke.

The number of the gentlemen and yeomen attending on foot, apparelled in russet and yellow, was an hundred, twelve score and eight. When next these pavilions came twelve children of honour, sitting currie of them on a great courser richlie trapped and embrodered in severall devises and fashions, where lacked neither byverie no; goldsmiths worke, so that a currie child and horse in device and fashion was contrarie to other, which was goodlie to behold. Then on the contrarie part entered fir Charles Brandon, first on horsebacke in a long robe of russet sattin, like a recluse or religious person, and his horse trapped in the same sute, without drum or noise of minnstrelle, putting a bill of petition to the quene, the effect wher of was, that if it would please hie to licence him to run in his presence, he would do it gladly; and if not, then he would depart as he came. After that his request was granted, then he put off his said habit, and was armed at all peeces with rich bases and horse also richly trapped, and so did run his horse to the tilt end, where diuerse men on foot apparelled in russet sattin waited on him.

Next after came in alone yong Henrie Guilford esquier, himselfe and his horse in russet cloth of gold and cloth of siluer, closed in a deuse, or a pageant made like a castell or a turret, wrought of russet saycenet florence, wrought and set in gold with his word or posie, and all his men in russet sattin & white, with hosen to the same, and their bonets of like colours, demanding also licence of the queene to run; which to him granted, he took place at the tilts end. Then came next the marquess Dorset and sir Thomas Bullen like two pilgrims from saint James, in taberds of blacke velvet, with palmers hats on their helmets, with long Jacobs staves in their hands, their horse trappers of blacke velvet, their taberds, hats, and trappers set with scalop shels of fine gold, and strips of blacke velvet, euerie strip set with a scalop shell, their seruants all in blacke sattin with scalop shels of gold in their breeches. Some after came in the lord Henrie of Buckingham earle of Wiltshire, himselfe and his horse apparelled in cloth of siluer, embroidered with his posie or word, and arrows of gold in a posie, called La maison du refuge, made of crimfin damaske bordered with roses & arrows of gold, on the top a greibound of siluer, bearing a tree of pomegranats of gold, the branches whereof were so large that it ouerspyed the pageant in all parts.

Then entered sir Giles Capell, sir Rowland with many other knights richly armed and apparelled. And thus began the iusts, which was valiantly achieved by the king and his aids, among whom his grace attained the prize. These iusts finished, euerie man withdrew, the king was disarmed, and at time convenient he and the queene heard euensong, and that night all the ambassadoes supped with the king and had a great banquet. After supper, his grace with the queene, lords & ladies came into the White hall within the said palace, which was hanged richly, the hall was scaffolded and railed on all parts. There was an enterlode of the gentlemen of his chapel before his grace, and diuerse fresh songs: that done, his grace called to him a great man, or a lord of Ireland called O neall, whom in the presence of the said ambassadoes he made knight: then the minstrels began to plaie, the lords & ladies began to danse. Now in the midst of this pastime, when all persons were most attentue to behold the danfing, the king was suddenly gone, unknown to the most part of the people there, unlesse it were of the queene and certaine other. Within a little while after his departing, the trumpets at the end of the hall began to sound.

A pageant devised to run upon wheeles.

Then was there a deuse or a pageant upon wheels brought in, out of the which pageant issued out a gentleman richly apparelled, that shewed how in a garden of pleasure there was an arbor of gold, where in were lords and ladies, much desirous to shew pastime to the queene & ladies, if they might be licensed so to do: who was answered by the queene, how she & all other there were verie desirous to see them and their pastime. Then a great cloth of arras that did hang before the same pageant was taken away, and the pageant brought more nere. It was curiously made and pleasant to behold, it was solemne and rich; for euerie post or pillar thereof was couered with frised gold, therein were trees of bathorne, eglantine, roses, vines, and other pleasant flowers of diuerse colours, with gilliflowers, and other hearbs all made of sattin, damaske, siluer and gold, accordingly as the naturall trees, hearbs, or flowers ought to be.

In this arbor were six ladies, all apparelled in white sattin and greene, set and embroidered full of gold, and of gold, knit together with laces of gold of damaske, and all their garments were replenished with glittering spangles gilt ouer, on their heads were bonets all opened at the four quarters, overfrised with flat gold of damaske, the orlelets were of rolles, twyethed on lampas hauche holow, so that the gold shewed through the lampas hauche; the hatts of their head set full of new devised fashions. In this garden also was the king and five with him apparelled in garments of purple sattin, all of cuts with gold, and a euerie edge garnished with frised gold, and euerie garment full of posies, made of letters of fine gold in bullion as thicke as they might be, and euerie person had his name in like letters of masse gold. The first Cure loial, the second Bon voloir, the third Bon espoir, the fourth Valiant desire, the fifth Bon foy, the sixth Amour loial, their hosen, caps, and coats were full of posies, with gold, & of fine gold in bullion, so that the ground could scarce appere, & yet was in euerie bold place spangles of gold. When time was come, the said pageant was brought forth into presence, and then descended a lord and a lady by couples, and then the minstrels which were disguised also danced, and the lords and ladies danced, that it was a pleasure to behold.

In the meane season the pageant was conveyed to the end of the palace, there to tarie till the dances were finished, & so to haue receiued the lords & ladies againe; but suddenly the rude people ran to the pageant, and rent, tare, and spoiled the pageant, so that the lord steward nor the head officers could not cause them to abstaine, except they should haue foughten and dauen bloud, and so was this pageant broken. When the king with the queene and the ladies returned to his chamber, where they had a great banquet, and so this triumph ended with much glories. At this solemnitie a shipman of London caught certaine letters, which he sold to a goldsmith for three pounds fourtene shillings & eight pence; by reason whereof it appeared that the garments were of a great value. After this great toy came a sorrowfull chance, for the yong prince which was borne upon felwpeares day last past, upon the two and twentieth daie of Februarie, being then the euen of saint Papathe, departed this world at Richmond, and from thence was caried to Westminster and buried. The king like a wise prince took this dolorous chance wonderous wiselie; and the more to comfort the queene he dissembled the matter, and made no great mourning outwardly: but the queene, like a naturall woman, made much lamentation; howbeit, by the kings good perswasion and behauiour, his sorrow was mitigated, but not shortlie.

In the moneth of Februarie this yeare came ambassadoes from the king of Arragon and Castile, to require an aid of sixtene hundred archers to be sent to the same king, hauing at that time war against the Moors, enemies of the christian faith. The king hearing their message gentlie granted their request. And because the lord Thomas Darcie a knight of the garter, made humble sute to the king to be generall of the crue that should be thus sent into Spaine, the king upon trust of his approued ballance granted his desire. There were appointed to go with him the lord Anthoine Greie brother to the marquess Dorset, Henrie Guilford, Weston Bolune, and William Stoneie esquiers of the kings house, sir Robert Constable, sir Roger Hastings, and sir Rafe Elderton, with other gentlemen to be captains.

An. Reg. 23.

In this second yeare, the king being forth on his progresse, heard euerie daie more & more complaints of Empson and Dudley, set forth and advanced no doubt by the drift of their deadie enemies. Wherefore he sent writs to the Sherriffes of London, to put them to execution, and so the seuententh daie of August, they were both beheaded at the Tower hill, and both their bodies and heads buried, the one at the White friers, and the other at the Blacke friers. The king about this season was much giuen to plaie at tennis, and at the dise, which appetite certeine craftie persons about him perceiuing, brought in Frenchmen and Lombards to make wagers with him, & so lost much monie; but when he perceiued their craft, he eschued their companie and let them go.

¶ On the first daie of Maie the king accompanied with manie lustie batcheles, on great and well doing hollies rode to the wood to fetch Maie, where a man might haue seene manie a hollie raised on high with carrier, gallop, turne, and stop, meruellous to behold: where he & thre other, as Sir Edward Howard, Charles Brandon, and Edward Perell, which were challengers with the king, thifted themselves into coats of greene sattin garded with crimson velvet. On the other part the earles of Essex, of Devonshire, the marquesse Dorset, & the lord Howard were all in crimson satin, garded with a pounced gard of greene velvet. And as they were returning on the hill, a ship met with them under saile: the maister hailed the king and that noble companie, and said that he was a mariner, and was come from many a strange port, and came thither to see if anie deeds of armes were to be done in the countrie, of the which he might make true report in other countries. An herald demanded the name of his ship; he answered he is called Flame, & is laden with good Renowme: then said the herald, If you will bring your ship into the baie of Hardinesse, you must double the point of Gentlesse, and there you shall see a companie that will meddle with your merchandize. Then said the king, Shewens Renowme is their merchandize, let vs buie it if we can. Then the ship shot a peale of guns, and sailed forth before the kings companie, full of flags and banners, till it came to the tilt yard.

At after noone, the king and his thre fellows entered into the field, their bards and bases of crimson and blue velvet, cut in quadrant cuts, embzodered full of pomegranats, and all the waiters in silke of the same colour. The other partie were in crimson sattin and greene velvet. Then began the trumpets to sound, and the hollies to run, that manie a speare was burst, and manie a great stripe giuen: and so a truth the king excceeded in number of stanes all other euerie daie of the thre daies. Wherefore on the third daie, the queene made a great banket to the king and all them that had iustled: and after the banket done, she gaue the chiefe pisse to the king, the second to the earle of Essex, the third to the earle of Devonshire, and the fourth to the lord marquesse Dorset. Then the heralds cried; My lordes, for your noble feats in armes, God send you the loue of your ladies that you most desire. The king euer desirous to serue Mars, began another iusts the sixteenth daie of the said moneth. The king & his band were all in greene silke, and the earle of Essex and his band in blue, garded with gold, and all the speares were painted of the same colours. There was good running and manie a speare burst: but for all the sport euerie man feared least some ill chance might happen to the king, and saue would haue had him a looker on rather than a doer, and spake thereof as much as they durst: but his courage was so noble that he would euer be at the one end.

pointed to the biage against the Mores, made such diligence, that the yans and all their people were readie at Wlthimouth by the middes of Maie, and there mustered their souldiers before the lord Wroke, and other the kings commissioners. The lord Darcie as capteine generall, ordeined for his prouost marshall Henrie Gullford esquier, a lustie yong man, & wel beloued of the king, for his manifold good seruice. On the mondaie in the Rogation weeke, they departed out of Wlthimouth haueu with foure ships roiall, and the wind was so fauourable to them, that the first daie of June, being the euen of the feast of Pentecost, he arriued at the port of Calis in south Spaine; and immediatlie by the aduise of his counsell, he dispatched messengers to the king, whom they found beside the citie of Ciuill where he then late, and declared to him, how the lord Darcie by the king their maisters appointment, was come thither with sixteen hundred archers, and late still at Calis to know to his pleasure. The king of Castile answered them gentle, that the lord Darcie and all other that were come from his louing sonne were welcome, and hartlie thanked them of their paines, requiting the messengers to returne to their capteine, and tell him that in all hast he would send certeine of his counsell to him.

¶ Hereupon they departed from the king, and made report to the lord Darcie, which kept his ship in great estate, and would not land, but onelie suffered such as were sicke and feeble, and few other to go a land. The Englishmen which went a land, fell to drinking of hot wines, & were scarce maisters of themselves, some ran to the selues, some brake hedges and spoiled orchards and vineyards, and oranges before they were ripe, and did manie outrageous deeds: wherefore the chiefe of the towne of Calis came to complaine to the lord Darcie in his ship, which sent forth his prouost marshall, who scarcelie with paine restrained the peoman archers, they were so hot and wilfull, yet by commandement & policie they were all brought on board to their ships.

Then upon saturdaye, the eight of June, a bishop and other of the kings counsell came to Calis, and there abode till wednesdaye, being the euen of Corpus Christi; at which daie, the lord capteine took land, and was honozablie receiued of the king of Aragons counsell, and on the morrow was highlie feasted at dinner and supper. And at after supper, the bishop declared the king his maisters pleasure, giuing to the lord capteine as heartie thanks for his pains and trauell, as if he had gone forward with his enterprise against the Mores. But whereas by the aduise of his counsell, circumspectlie considering the suertie of his owne realme, upon perfect knowledge had that the Frenchmen meant to inuade his dominions in his absence, he had altered his former determination, and taken an abstinence of war with the Mores, till an other time.

He therefore required the lord Darcie to be contented to returne home againe, promising him wages for all his souldiers; and if it should please him to come to the court, he should receiue high thanks of the king, and such chere as there could be made him. The lord Darcie was nothing pleased with this declaration, but sth he saw there was no remedie, he said, that whatseuer the king had concluded, he could not be against it, considering he was sent to him: but suerlie it was against his mind to depart home, without doing anie thing against Gods enemies, with whome he had euer a desire to fight. And as for his continuing to court, he said, he could not leaue his men whome he had brought out of their countrie, without an head; and as for the kings banket, it was not the thing that he desired.

Edw. Hall.

On the next daie in the morning, monie was sent to paie the souldiers their wages for their conduct on againe into England, with diuerse gifts giuen to the lord Darcie, and other gentlemen, yet notwithstanding, he was highlie displeased: howbeit, like a wise man he dissembled the matter. The same daie, being the fourteenth daie of June, and fridaie, there chanced a fraie to be begun in the towne of Calis, betwixt the Englishmen, and them of the towne; by reason that an Englishman would haue had for his monie a loafe of bread from a maid that had bene at the bakers to buie bread, not to sell, but to spend in his mistress house. Howbeit the Englishman followed him, as making proffer not to be denied, in so much that the maid perceiuing what he went about, cried out; A force, a force. Then was the common bell rung, and all the towne went to harnesse, and those few Englishmen that were a land, went to their bowes. The Spaniards cast darts, and the Englishmen shot. But the captains of England, and the lords of the counsell for their part, took such paine, that the fraie was ceased; and but one Englishman slaine, though diuerse were hurt: and of the Spaniards diuerse were slaine. Thus of a sparkle was kindled a flame to the spoiling of manie; which is no rare thing to see, according to the scriptum est:

After this, upon request made by the lords of Spaine, the lord Darcie and all his men the same night went aboard their ships, but Henrie Guilford, Weston Broome, and William Sidonie, young and lustie esquiers, desired licence to see the court of Spaine: which being granted, they went thither, where they were of the king highlie interteined. Henrie Guilford and Weston Broome were made knights by the king, who also gaue to sir Henrie Guilford a canton of Granada, and to sir Weston Broome an egle of Sicill on a chefe, to the augmentation of their armes. William Sidonie so excused himselfe, that he was not made knight. When they had sojourned there a while, they took their leaue of the king and quene, and returned through France into England.

Henrie for aid against the duke of Gelders.

During which season, the lord Darcie made saile toward England, and arriuing at Plimmouth, came to the king at Windsor, and so this tourneie ended. During the time that the lord Darcie was in Spaine, the ladie Margaret duchesse of Saunoy, and daughter vnto Maximilian the emperor, and gouernour of Flanders, Brabant, Holland, & Zeland, & other the lowe countries appertaining to Charles the yong prince of Castile, sent in the end of Maie to the king of England, to haue sixtene hundred archers, to aid him against the duke of Gelders, which sore troubled the countries aforesaid. The king tenderlie regarding the request of so noble a ladie, most gentlie granted his request, and appointed sir Edward Poynings, knight of the garter, and comptroller of his house, a valiant capteine and a noble warrior, to be lieutenant and leader of the said sixtene hundred archers.

This gentleman accompanied with his sonne in law the lord Clinton, sir Mathew Broome, sir John Digbie, John Werton, Richard Wethill, & Schelie esquiers, with other gentlemen and yeomen, to the foresaid number of sixtene hundred, took their ships a mile beside Sandwich, the eighteenth daie of Iulie, and landed at Armele the nineteenth daie, not without some trouble, by reason of a little storme. From thence they were conducted to Barowe, whither the ladie Regent came to welcome them. On the sundae, being the seuen & twentieth of Iulie, they departed to Rosendale, and on thursdaie the last of Iulie they came to Walduke. And the next daie the whole armie of the Almanax Flemings, and other appertaining to the said ladie, met with the English, men without Walduke, where they set forth in order, the ladie Regent being there present, which took his leaue of all the captains, and departed to Walduke.

The armie, to the number of ten thousand, beside the sixtene hundred English archers, passed forward; and the tenth daie of August, being saint Laurence daie, came before a little castle, standing on the higher side of the Mase, called Westmolt, belonging to the balliard of Gelderland. The same night, Thomas Hert, cheefe gouernour of the ordinaunce of the English part, made his approach; and in the morning, made batterie so, that the assault thereupon being giuen, the castelle was wonne, and the capteine with eightie and six men were slaine, and nineteene taken; of the which, eleven were hanged. John Foxton, capteine of one hundred Englishmen, and one Guiot an esquier of Burgognie, crying saint George, were the first that entered; at which assault, there was but one Englishman slaine. On thursdaie, the fourteenth of August, the armie feried ouer the riuer of Mase into Gelderland. The next daie, they came to a little towne called Aiske.

The people were fled, but there was a little castle raised, and cast towne, which was newlie built by on the side of the said riuer. Upon the twentieth daie of August, they burnt the foresaid towne of Aiske, and all the countrie about it, and came at the last to a towne called Straulle, being verie strong, double diked and walled. Within it were three hundred & fiftie god men of war, beside the inhabitants. At the first, they shewed good countenance of defence but when they saw their enemies approach nere vnto them with rampiers and trenches, they yielded by composition, so that the souldiers might depart with a little rike in their hands. But the towne men refused prisoners, at the will of the prince of Castile. And so on St. Bartholomewes day the admerall of Flanders, and sir Edward Poynings entred the towne with great triumph.

On the six and twentieth daie, the armie came before Wenlow, and sent an herald called Arthois, to summon the towne; but they within would not heare but shot guns at him. On the eight and twentieth daie, the armie remoued vnto the north side of Wenlow, and part went ouer the water, and made trenches to the water, & so besieged the towne as straitlie as their number would giue them leaue; but yet for all that they could do without, they within kept one gate euer open. At length, the English captains perceiuing that they late there in vaine, considering the strength of the towne, and also how the armie was not of number sufficient to entron the same on each side, wrote to the king, who willed them with all speed to returne, and so they did. Sir Edward Poynings went to the court of Burgognie, where he was receiued right honozable of the yong prince of Castile and of his aunt the ladie Margaret.

John Foxton, John Fog, John Scot, and Thomas Linde, were made knights by the prince. And the ladie Margaret perceiuing the souldiers coates to be woone and foule with lieng on the ground (for euerie man laie not in a tent) gaue to euerie peoman a coate of wollen cloth of pealowe, red, white, and graine colours, not to his little laud & passe among the Englishmen. After that sir Edward Poynings had bene highlie feasted and more praised of all men for his valiantnesse and good order of his people, he returned with his crue into England, and had lost by war and sickness not fallie an hundred persons. When the Englishmen were departed, the Gelders issued out of the gates of Wenlow, daile skirmished with with the Bargognions, and asked for their archers, and herewith winter began sharple to approach, and the river of Paze by abundance of raine rose so high, that it drowned up the trenches: so that all things considered, the captains without determined to raise their siege, and so they did, and after they had wasted all the countrey about Aenlow, they returned euerie man to his home.

In June the king being at Leicester, heard tidings, that one Andzew Barton a Scottishman and pirat of the sea, sailing that the king of Scots had warre with the Portingals, robbed euerie nation, and stopped the kings streames, that no merchant almost could passe. And when he took Englishmens goods, he bare them in hand that they were Portingals goods, and thus he haunted and robbed at euerie hauens mouth. The king displeased herewith, sent sir Edward Howard lord admerall of England, and lord Thomas Howard, sonne and heire to the earle of Surrie in all hast to the sea, which battell made readie two ships, and taking sea, by chance of weather were seuered. The lord Howard lieng in the dovnies, perceived where Andzew was making toward Scotland, and so fast the said lord chased him, that he overtook him; and there was a soze battell betwixt them. Andzew ener blew his whiffle to encourage his men, but at length the lord Howard and the Englishmen did so valiantlie, that by cleane strength they entered the maine decke. The Scots fought soze on the hatches: but in conclusion Andzew was taken, and so soze wounded, that he died there. Then all the remnant of the Scots were taken with their ship called the Lion.

All this while was the lord admerall in chase of the barke of Scotland, called Jemie Dithvine, which was wont to saile with the Lion in companie, & so much did he wish other, that he laid him aboard: and though the Scots manfullie defended themselves, yet the Englishmen entered the barke, slue manie, and took all the residue. Thus were these two ships taken, and brought to Blackewall the second of August [and all the Scots were sent unto the bishop of Exches place, where they remained at the kings charge, till other direction was taken for them. After this, the king sent the bishop of Winchester, and certeine of his counsell, to the archbishop of Porches place, where the Scots were prisoners: and there the bishop rehearsed to them, whereas peace was yet betwene England and Scotland, that they contrarie to that, as theues & pirats, had robbed the kings subiects within his streames. Wherefore they had deserved to die by the law, and to be hanged at the low water mark. Then said the Scots; We acknowledge our offense, and aske mercie and not the law. Then a preest which was also a prisoner, said; My lords we appeale from the kings iustice to his mercie.

Then the bishop asked him if he were authorized by them to saie so, and they cried all; Yea, yea. Then (said he) you shall find the kings mercie above his iustice. For where you were dead by the law, yet by his mercie he will rentue you; wherefore you shall depart out of this realme within twentie daies, by paine of death, if you be found after the twentieth daie; and praise for the king: and so they passed into their countrey. Thus was their captiuitie converted into libertie, and their liues saved by the kings mercie. The king of Scots hearing of the death of Andzew Barton, and the taking of the two ships, was wonderfull wofull, and sent letters to the king requiring restitution, according to the league and amitie. The king wrote to the king of Scots againe with brotherlie salutation, of the robberies done by the said Andzew, and that it became not a prince to laie breach of peate to his confederat, for doing iustice vpon a pirat and theefe: and that all the Scots that were taken, had deserved to die by iustice, if he had not extended his mercie. And with this answer the Scottish herald departed.

About this season, the French king made sharpe warre against pope Iulie: wherefore the king of England wrote to the French king, that he should leaue off to vex the pope in such wise, being his friend and confederat. But when the French king seemed little to regard that request, the king sent him word to deliuer him his lawfull inheritance both of the duchie of Normandie and Guien, and the countreies of Anjou & Maine, and also of his crowne of France; or else he would come with such a power, that by fine force he would obtaine his purpose: but notwithstanding those writings, the French king still pursued his warres in Italie. Wherevpon the king of England, joining in league with Maximilian the emperor, and Ferdinando king of Spaine, with diuerse other princes, was resolved by aduise of his counsell to make warre on the French king and his countreies, and made preparation both by sea and land, setting forth ships to the sea for safegard of his merchants.

The foresaid pope Iulie, the kings confederat, was (before his aduancement to the popedom) cardinal of saint Petri ad Vincula, a man mightie in friends, reputation, and riches, who had giuene to him the voices of so manie cardinals, that entering the conclaue, he was with an example all new and without shutting the conclaue, elected pope the verie same night following the deceasse of his predecessor pope Pius (those that were of the contrarie opinion not daring to oppose against him.) He, either hauing regard to his first name Iulie, or (as coniectures were made) to signifie the greatnesse of his conceptions, or lastlie because he would not giue place to Alexander, no not in the excellencie of name, took vpon him the name of Iulie, the second of that name. Amongest all the popes that had passed, it was wondered that by so great consent, they had created for pope, a cardinal who was knowne to be of a disposition rigozous and terrible, and in whome was no expectation of rest and tranquillitie, hauing consumed his youth in continuall trauels, offended manie by necessitie, and exercised hatreds against manie great personages; a man to whose wit nothing was moze moze familiar, than the inuention of trouble, faction, and conspiracie.

But on the other side, the causes of his election to that degre appeared clerelie, and surmounted all other difficulties: for he had bene of long time a cardinal of great power and might, & with his magnificence, wherein he had alwayes excelled the residue, and with the greatnesse of his spirit, by the which he did great things, he had not onelie made himselfe mightie in opinion and friends; but by times and degrees had erected high his authoritie in the court of Rome, bearing the name, title, and dignitie of the principall defender of the ecclesiastike libertie. But that which serued most to his aduancement, was the promises immoderate and infinite which he made to the cardinals, princes, and barons, and to all others whome he might make profitable to him in that action. Besides, he had the meane to distribute monie, benefices, and spirituall dignities, as well such as were his owne, as those that were the rights of others; for that such was the hute & renoume of his liberalitie, that manie made willing offers to him to dispose as he best liked of their treasures, their names, their offices, and benefices.

They considered not that his promises were farre too great, than that being pope he was either able or of Basen, to see and vnderstand the maner thereof: but perceiving that the Englishmen had desiered them, suddenly they returned. The Englishmen followed, & coming to the towne of S. Jehan de Lucie, they burnt and robbed it, & slue the inhabitants. Divers other villages they spoiled on the borders of Guen; but because they wanted both hostles of service, and hostles to draw forth their ordnance, they could not do anie such damage as they might and would have done, if they had bene furnished according to their desires in that point. Thus continued the English armie in such wearisome sort till the moneth of October, and then fell the lord marquisse sick, and the lord Howard had the chiefe governance of the armie.

Then were sent from the king of Spaine diverse lords of his privie counsell unto the said lord Howard, to excuse the matter for that he came not according to his promise, requiring them, that sith the time of the yeare to make warre was past, it might please them to breake up their campe, and to divide themselves abroad into the townes and villages of his realme till the spring time of the yeare, that they might then go forward with their first pretended enterprise. The lord Howard shewed well in words that the Englishmen could not thinke well of the king of Spaines falsh excuse, and unprofitable delays, to his much hono^r & their great hinderance & losse, having spent the king their master so much treasure, and done so little hurt to his adversaries. The Spaniards gave faire words; and so in courteous maner departed.

The English
campe in Biscaye broke up.

The armie
dispersed into diverse villages.

Then about the end of October. it was agreed amongst all the lords of the English host that they should breake up their campe, and so they did. The lord marquisse and his people went to saint Sebastian, the lord Howard and his retinue to Renod, the lord Willoughbie to Castang, and sir William Sands with manie other capitaines repaired to Fotherable, and so everie capitaine with his retinue was placed in one towne or other. The king of England advertised of the king of Spaine this meaning, sent an herald called Windsor with letters unto his armie, willing his men there to tarry, & promising to send over to them right hostlie a new supply, under the guiding of the lord Herbert his chamberlaine.

Unappreciable rage amongest the English soldiers.

When this letter was read, and the contents thereof notified, the soldiers began to be so highly displeased, and spake such outrageous words, as it was marvell to heare: & not contented with words, they were bent to have done outrageous deeds, insomuch that in their furie they had slaine the lord Howard and diverse others, if they had not followed their intents: and hereupon they were glad to hire ships, and so embarked themselves in the moneth of November. When the lord marquisse was brought aboard, he was so weake and feeble of remembrance through sickness, that he asked where he was. In the beginning of December they landed here in England, and were glad to be at home, and got out of such a countrey, where they had little health, little pleasure, and much losse of time. The king of Spaine seemed to be sore discontented with their departure, openly affirming, that if they had tarried untill the next spring, he would in their companies have invaded France.

in Britaine.

About the same time that the marquisse went in to Spaine, that is to wit, about the middell of Maie, sir Edward Howard lord admiral of England, being on the sea afoze Portsmouth, made south againe to the sea, and directing his course towards Britaine on Crinitie sundae arrived at Bergham baie with twentie great ships, and suddenly set his men on land, and there was a bulwoke, which the Britains kept and defended a while, but being overcome, fled out of their hold, & left it to the Englishmen. Then the lord admiral passed leaven miles into the countrey, burning and wasting townes and villages, and in returning, furnished with diverse men of armes, and slue some of them: and notwithstanding that the Britains fought valiantlie in defense of their countrey; yet they were put to the worse, and so the lord admiral returned to his ships.

On the thie & twentieth daie of Maie being mon, daie, he landed in the morning, and commanded to burne the house of the lord Piers Hoguns, with the towne of Conquet, & diverse other places, and chased the Britains into the castell of Brest: and notwithstanding all the assemblies and shewes that the Britains made, yet they suffered the English peace, able to returne with their priets and hosties. The first of June the Englishmen took land in Croston baie, and then the lords of Britaine sent word to the lord admiral, that if he would abide, they would give him battell. The admiral rewarded the messenger, and willed him to say to them that sent, that all that day they should find him in that place tarrying their coming.

Hereto encourage diverse gentlemen the more earnestlie to shew their valiance, he dubbed them knights; as sir Edward Bockie, brother to the lord Cobham, sir Griffith Dohone, sir Thomas Windham, sir Thomas Lucie, sir John Burdet, sir William Winton, sir Henrie Shirborne, and sir Stephan Bull. When the lord admiral saw the Frenchmen come, he comforted his men with pleasant words, thereby the more to encourage them. The whole number of the Englishmen was not much above 25 hundred, where the Frenchmen were at the least ten thousand; and yet when they saw the order of the Englishmen, they were suddenly astonished.

Then a gentleman of good experience and credit amongst them, advised the other capitaines not to fight, but to retire a little and take a strong ground, there to remaine till the Englishmen returned to ward their ships: and then to take the advantage. And so the capitaines began to retire, which when the commons saw, they all ran apace as fast as they might, supposing that the capitaines had some unknowne kind great perill at hand, because they were not willing to the purpose of their capitaines. The lord admiral seeing what happened, when the night came departed to his ships. After this the gentlemen of Britaine sent to the admiral for a safe conduct for diverse persons, which they meant to send to him about a treatie. The lord admiral was of his gentleness content to grant their request. Then certeine lords of Britaine took a boat, and came to the ship of the lord admiral, where he was set with all his counsell of the armie about him.

The request of the Britains was, that it might please him to increase his retell kind of warre, in burning of townes and villages; but the admiral plainly told them, that he was sent to make warre and not peace. Their they required a truce for six daies, which would not be granted; and to their request, the admiral told them, that gentlemen ought to defend their countrey by force, rather than to sue for peace. And thus making them a banquet he sent them a waite. And after hearing that there was ships of warre on the seas, he coasted from thence along the countrey of Normandie, still following the sea, so that no enimie durst appeare. And at length he came and late by the Ile of Wight, to see if anie enimies would appeare. During which time, divers ships were kept in the north seas, under the conduct of sir Edward Tschingham, John Welwes, John Luedate, and others.

The French King in this meane while had prepared a number of his best ships in the haven of Brest, for these he ordeined a great Carricke of Brest, appertaining to the Queene his wife, called Cordelier, a verie strong ship, and verie well appointed. This came forth out of Brest the tenth of August, and came to Brittain bay, in the which the same day was the English fleet arrived. When the Englishmen perceived the Frenchment to be issued forth of the haven of Brest, they prepared themselves to battell, and made forth towards their enemy, which came hither to wards; and coming in sight of one another they shot off their ordnance so terrible together, that all the sea coast sounded of it. The lord Admiral made with the great ship of Brest; and killed his first Henrie Gilford, and also sir Charles Brandon made with the great Carricke of Brest, being in the Souveraigne, and laid them to stein to the Carricke, but by negligence of the master, or else by smoke of the ordnance, or otherwise, the Souveraigne was cast at the sterne of the Carricke, with which advantage the Frenchmen fought for joy.

thousand men to the sea. On Maie even, Edmund de la Pole was beheaded on the Tower hill, his brother Richard was after slain in France.]

After this parlement was ended, the king kept a solemn Christmasse at Greenwich, with dances and mummeries in most princelie maner. And on the Twelfe daie at night came into the hall a mount, called the rich mount. The mount was set full of rich flowers of silke, and especiallic full of brome slips full of cods, the branches were greene sattin, and the flowers flat gold of damaske, which signified Plantagenet. On the top stood a goodlie beacon giuing light, round about the beacon sat the king and five other, all in cotes and caps of right crimsin velvet, embrodered with flat gold of damaske, their cotes full of spangles of gold. And foure woodhouses dzeto the mount till it came before the quene, and then the king and his companie descended and danced. Then suddenlie the mount opened, and out came six ladies all in crimsin sattin and plunket, embrodered red with gold and pearie, with French hoods on their heads, and they danced alone. Then the lords of the mount toke the ladies and danced together: and the ladies reentered, and the mount closed, and so was conueied out of the hall. Then the king shifted him, and came to the quene, and sat at the banquet which was verie sumptuous.

The nauie set out againe.

The English nauie purposing to set upon the French in the haven, are defeated by a mischance.

After Candlemasse, the king created sir Charles Brandon vicount Lille. In March following was the kings nauie of ships roiall & other set forth to the number of fortie and two, beside other balangers vnder the conduct of the lord admerall, accompanied with sir Walter Deuereux, lord Ferrers, sir Wolstan Browne, sir Edward Ichingham, sir Anthoine Pointz, sir John Mallop, sir Thomas Willdam, sir Stephan Bull, William Fitz Williams, Arthur Plantagenet, William Sidneie esquires, and diuerse other noble and valiant captains. They sailed to Portsmouth, and there late abiding wind, and when the same serued their turne, they weied anchor, & making saile into Britaine, came into Berthram baie, and there laie at anchor in sight of the French nauie, which kept it selfe close within the haven of Wex, without proffering to come abroad.

The English perceiuing the maner of the French men, determined to set on them in the haven, and making forward in good order of battell, at their first entrie one of their ships, whereof Arthur Plantagenet, was capitaine, fell on a blind rocke, and burst in sunder, by reason whereof, all the other staid: and the English captains perceiuing that the haven was dangerous to enter without an expert lobesman, they cast about, and returned to their harborough at Berthram baie againe. The Frenchmen perceiuing that the Englishmen meant to assaile them, moored their ships so nere to the castell of Wex as they could, and placed bulwarks on the land on euerie side, to shoot at the Englishmen. Also they trapped together foure and twentie great hulkes that came to the baie for salt, and set them on a row, to the intent that if the Englishmen had come to assaile them, they would haue set those hulkes on fire, and haue let them dzue with the streame amongst the English ships.

The lord admerall would haue the king present in person at the encounter, and rebuked.

Dor: Jehan also laie still in Blanke sable baie, and plucked his gallies to the shoze, setting his bassilikes and other ordinance in the mouth of the baie, which baie was bulwarked on euerie side, that by water it was not possible to be wone. The lord admerall perceiuing the French nauie thus to lie in feare, wrote to the king to come thither in person, and to haue the honour of so high an enterpryse: which writing the kings counsell nothing allowed, for putting the king in leopordie vpon the chance of the sea.

Wherefore the king wrote to him Harple againe, commanding him to accomplish that which appertained to his duetie: which caused him to adventure things farther than wisdome would he should (as after ye shall heare) to his bitter vndoying and casting awaie, God hauing ordeined the means by his prouidence, which the pagans implied (though wanting the light of grace) in the name of destinie, of them counted ineuitable. [A destinie lamentable considering the qualitie of the person, with the maner of his dieng. Wherein although manie vaine dispute, that fortune led him to so miserable an accident: yet if we will lift vp our considerations to God, we shall find that he hath reserved such a prerogatiue ouer all things which he hath created, that to him onelie belongeth the authoritie to dispose all things by the same power wherewith he hath created them of nothing.] And yet the foolish world (doting in blind ignozance, but pretending a singular insight in matters of secrecie) bluseth not to talke of rather to asseuere, casualtie, chancemeble, misfortune, and such like foolish imaginations: whereas (indeed) the prouidence of God compasseth all things whatsoeuer, for nothing can be priuileged from the amplenesse of the same.

Dor: Jehan keeping him still within his hold, as a prisoner in a dungeon, did yet sometime send out his small foists to make a shew before the English nauie, which chased them to the baie. But because the English ships were mightie vessels, they could not enter the baie: and therefore the lord admerall caused certeine boats to be manned forth, which toke one of the best foists that Dor: Jehan had, and that with great danger: for the gallies and bulwarks shot so fresshly all at one instant, that it was maruell how the Englishmen escaped. The lord admerall perceiuing that the Frenchmen would not come abroad, called a counsell, wherein it was determined, that first they would assaile Dor: Jehan and his gallies lieng in Blanke sable baie, and after to set on the residue of the French fleet in the haven of Wex. When first it was appointed, that the lord Ferrers, sir Stephan Bull, and other, should go along with a conuenient number to assaile the bulwarks, while the admerall entered with row barges and little gallies into the baie, and so should the Frenchmen be assailed both by water and land.

The lord admerall by the counsell of a Spanis knight called sir Alfonse Charant, affirming that he might enter the baie with little leopordie, called to him William Fitz Williams, William Cobe, John Collete, and sir Wolstan Browne, as his chiefe and most trustie friends, making them pswade to his intent: which was to take on him the whole enterprise, with their assistance. And so on S. Markes daie, which is the five and twentieth of Aprill, the said admerall put himselfe in a small row barge, appointing three other small rowing ships, and his owne ship bote to attend him; and therewith vpon a sudden rowed into the baie, where Dor: Jehan had moored by his gallies tust to the ground: which gallies with the bulwarks on the land, shot so terrible, that they that followed were afraid. But the admerall passed forward, & as soone as he came to the gallies, he entered & dzoue out the Frenchmen. William Fitz Williams within his ship was sore hurt with a quarell. The baie was shallow, and the other ships could not enter, for the tide was spent.

Which thing the Frenchmen perceiuing, they entered the gallies againe with moxie pikes, and fought with the English in the gallies. The admerall perceiuing their approach, thought to haue entered againe into his row barge, which by violence of the tide was dzinen downe the streame, and with a pike he was

thowne ouer the bord, and so drowne, and also the foynamed Alsonse was there slaine: all the other boats and vessels escaped verie hardlie auaie: for if they had taried, the tide had failed them, and then all had bene lost. The lord Ferrers and the other captains were right sorrowfull of this chance: but when there was no remedie, they determined not to attempt anie further, till they might understand the kings pleasure, and so they returned into England.

The Frenchmen perceiuing that the English fleet departed from the coasts of Britaine and drelu towards England, did come south of their hauens, and the lord Jehan set forth his gallees and foists, and drawing alongst the coasts of Normandie and Bri-taine, coasted ouer to the borders of Souther with all his companie, and there landed, and set fire on cer-teine poze cotages. The gentlemen that dwelt nere, raised the countrie, and came to the coast, and droue the lord Jehan to his gallees. The king was right sozie for the death of his admerall; but sorrowfullie not when the chance is past. Therefore the king hearing that the French nanie was abroad, called to him the lord Thomas Howard eldest brother to the late admerall, and sonne and heire apparant to the earle of Surrie, whome he made admerall, willing him to reuenge his brothers death. The lord Howard humbly thanked his grace of the trust that he put in him, and so immediatlie went to the sea, and scotored the same, that no Frenchman durst shew himselfe on the coast of England, for he fought with them at their owne ports.

The king hauing all his prouisions readie for the warre, and meaning to passe the sea in his owne person, for the better taining of the losse Frenchmen, appointed that worthie counsellor and right redoub-ted cheffaine, the noble George Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, high steward of his household, to be captaine generall of his foreward; and in his com-panie were appointed to go, the lord Thomas Stanleie earle of Derby, lord Deuonshire prior of saint Johns, sir Robert Kitchiffe lord Fitzwater, the lord Hastings, the lord Cobham, sir Alice ap Thomas, sir Thomas Blunt, sir Richard Sackeuell, sir John Digbie, sir John Alkew, sir Lewes Bagot, sir Thomas Coznewall, and manie other knights, esqui-ers, and souldiers; to the number of eight thousand men. These passed the sea, and came all to Calis about the middle of Maie.

The lord Herbert called sir Charles Sumner-set, lord chamberleine to the king, in the end of the same moneth followed the said earle of Shrewesburie, with sir thousand men: in whose companie were the erls of Northumberland and Percie, of Kent Greie, of Wilshire Stafford, the lord Doble, the lord Delauiare, and his sonne sir Thomas West, sir Edward Hulleie, sir Edward Dimmoche, sir David Owen, with manie other knights, esquiers, and gentlemen. After they had sojourned certeine daies in Calis, and that all their necessaries were readie, they issued south of the towne, so to begin their campe. And first the earle of Shrewesburie and his companie toke the field, and after him the lord Herbert with his retinues in manner of a reerward.
Then followed that valiant knight sir Alice ap Thomas, with five hundred light horsemen and archers on horsebacke, who ioined himselfe to the foreward, a gentleman of such spirit and hardinesse, that he is named the floure of the Welshmen, as the poet saith:

Ricinus Thomas flos Cambrobritanium.

These two lords thus imbattelled did remoue the seuententh of June to Sandifield, and on the eighteenth they came to Marguison, on the further side of the water, as though they would haue passed straight waies to Bullongne. But they meaning an other thing, the next daie toke an other waie, and so coasted the countrie with such diligence, that the two and twentieth of June they came before the strong citie of Teronan, and pight their tents a mile from the towne. The same night (as certeine captains were in counsell within the lord Herberts tent) the baron Carew was slaine with a bullet shot out of the towne; which sudden aduenture much dismayed the assemblee, but the lord Herbert comforted them with manlie words, and so his death was passed ouer. All the countrie of Artois and Picardie fortified their holds, and made thewes as the English armie passed, but they durst not once assaile them.

The citie of Terrouan was stronglie fortified with walles, rampiers, bulwarks, and large ditches.
The lord Pontremie was gouernour within it, hauing with him sir hundred horsemen, and 2500 Al-mans, besides the inhabitants. The walles & towers were full of ordinance, which oftentimes did much displeasure to the Englishmen. The earle of Shrewesburie planted his siege on the north west side of the towne, and the lord Herbert on the east side, causing great trenches to be made to couer his people with-all: for on that side there was no hill to succour or defend him. The Frenchmen and Almans would di-uerse times issue out, but the archers were cuer readie to beat them into the citie againe. The earle of Shrewesburie got into an hollow ground or ballie nere to the citie, and likewise the lord Herbert (by reason of his trenches) approached likewise verie nere to the ditches.

The seven and twentieth daie of June being mon-daie, sir Nicholas Taur and sir Edward Belknap, hauing with them foure hundred and thre score men set from Guines to conduct foure and twentie carts laden with vittels towards the siege at Terrouan; but the duke of Glansome lieutenant of Picardie with eight hundred horsemen set on them as they passed through Ard, and found them so out of order, that notwithstanding all that the English captains could do to bring men into arraie, it would not be: for the Frenchmen set on so readilie, that they kept the Englishmen in sunder. Yet the horsemen of Guines, being not past foure and twentie in all, toke their speares and ioined with the Frenchmen right manfullie, and likewise thre score archers shot freshlie at their enemies; but the Frenchmen were so manie in number, that they obtained the place, slue eight gentlemen, and diuerse archers. Sir Nicholas Taur and sir Edward Belknap fled toward Guisnes.

Thus were the vittels lost, and yet the Frenchmen went not auaie with cleere hands: for those few archers that closed together, shot so egerlie, that they slue and hurt diuerse Frenchmen; and on the field late foure score and seuen great horses, which died there in the place, and neuer went further. On the fiftenth day of June the 13. departed from Craene-wich, taking his iournete towards Douer, whither he came by easie iournies, and the quene in his com-panie. After he had rested a season in the castell of Douer, and taken order for the rule of the realme in his absence, he toke leaue of the quene, and entring his ship the last daie of June, being the daie of saint Ivanle: he sailed ouer to Calis, where he was recei-ued with great top by the deputie sir Gilbert Talbot and all other there. At his entring into Calis, all the banished men entred with him, and were restored to the libertie of the towne. The king laie in Calis a certeine time, till all his prouisions were readie, but the armie laie in campe at Peluham bridge.

On the one and twentieth of Iulie, the kings maiestie passed south of Calis, and toke the field, din-ding the armie which he had there with him into three battells. The lord Little marshall of the host was captaine of the fore-ward, and under him three thousand men: sir Richard Carew with three hundred kept on the right side of the same fore-ward as a wing thereto: and the lord Darcie with other three hundred men was a wing on the left hand. The fore-riders of this battell were the Northumberland men on light geldings. The earle of Essex was lieutenant generall of the speares, and sir John Perchie was vicegouernour of all the horsemen, and sir John Burdet standard-bearer to the kings speares. An eight hundred Almans went on a plume by themselves before the kings battell, and the duke of Buckingham with six hundred men was on the kings left hand, equall with the Almans, in like maner as sir Edward Poynings was on the right hand, with other six hundred men equall with the Almans.

* This man was afterward carpenter.

In the kings battell, there was the standard of the armies of England borne by sir Henric Guilford, 20 there were three thousand; & the lord of Aburgauenie with eight hundred men was wing on the right hand, and sir William Compton with the retinue of the bishop of Winchester, and of maister * Wolfeie the kings almoner, being in number eight hundred was in manner of a reere-gard. Sir Anthoine Dugh-tred and sir John Penill with the kings speares that followed were four hundred, and so the whole armie contained eleven thousand and three hundred men.
The number of the cariages were thirtene hundred, and the number of them that attended the same were nineteen hundred men, and all these were recruited in the battell: but of good fighting men & soldiers appointed for the purpose, there were not full nine thousand. In this order the king with his armie marched forward through the confines of his enimies to the siege of Terrouan, entering into the French ground the five and twentieth of Julie being mondaye. On the morrow after as the armie marched forward, by negligence of the carters that mistake the waie, a great curtall (called the John Ce-uangelist) was ouerthrowne in a deepe pond of water and could not quicklie be recovered.

The French
armie appro-cheth, & their number.

The king being aduertised that the Frenchmen approched to fight with him, left the gun (because the maister carpenter undertooke to weie it thorowly out of the water) & set forward, passing on by Tornohan, which he left on his right hand, and a little beyond pi-ched downe his field abiding for his enemies, the which (as he was informed) were not far off. On the morrow after being Wednesdaye, the reliefe of the speares brought word that they had ascried the French armie comming forward in order of battell, to the number of eleven thousand footmen, and four thousand horsemen. Captains of this armie were the lord de la Palice, the lord de Wyennes, the duke of Longuile, the earle of S. Paule, the lord of Floringes, the lord of Cleremont, & Richard de la Pole a banished man, son to John duke of Suffolke. They came within two miles of the kings armie, and there the footmen staled, and came no further.

The northern

But certeine of the horsemen to the number of three thousand came forward, and at the end of a wood shelved themselves in open. Out of the English armie. And thus they stood countenancing the Englishmen. Some of the northerne pickers made to them, and in skirmishing with them, took some of them prisoners. About none the same daie, that baliant Welsh knight sir Rice ap Thomas with his retinue of horsemen being departed from the siege of Terrouan came to the king, and freightwaies was sent to the earle of Essex, which with two hundred speares was laid in a scale, if the Frenchmen had come naxer, When they were ioined together, they drew about the hill, having with them sir Thomas Guilford, with two hundred archers on horsebacke, meaning to set on the Frenchmen: which perceiuing that, and doubting least more companie had followed, they suddenlie drew backe, and ioined them with their great battell.

Then the earle of Essex and the English horsemen followed them, till they came nere to the armie of France, and then scaled and sent forth light horsemen to biew the demerces of the Frenchmen. When the Frenchmen of armes were returned to their battell, then both the horsemen and footmen withdrew in order of battell, and still the English curraes followed them for the space of three leagues, and then returned to the earle, making report to him of that they had scene, who then brake by his scale, and came to the king, declaring to him how the Frenchmen were gone backe. This was called the daye Wednesdaye, for the daie was wonderfull hot, and the king with his armie stood in order of battell, from six of the clocke in the morning till three of the clocke in the after none. And some died for lacke of moisture, and generallie euerie man was burned about the mouth with heat of the stomack; for drinke lacked, and water was not nere.

After this the king remoued toward Terrouan, and as he was setting forward, the lord Malon of Flanders came to him with his horsemen, which were already in the kings wages. As the armie passed, by negligence the same daie in a lane was o-uerthrowne one of the kings bombardes of iron, called the red gun, and there left. The king lodged that night two miles from saint Omers on the north side of the towne. On the Thursdaye, being the eight and twentieth of Julie, the maister carpenter with an hundred carpenters and labourers, without knowledge of the marshall, went to weie up the great gun that was in the pond (as ye haue heard) and by force of engins drew it up, and carted it ready to bring awaie: but suddenlie there came an eight hundred Frenchmen with speares, crossbowes, and handguns, which set on the labourers so fiercelie, that notwithstanding their manfull defense, the most part of them were slaine and the residue taken, and both they and the peece of ordinance conueied to Bullangne.

The Frenchmen glad of this chance, assembled a great number to fetch the other gun, which lay yet in the lane. But the lord Berners being captaine of the pioners, and hearing all these things, prepared to recover that gun, and so in the morrow went to fetch it.
There were appointed to go backe to see him safe conducted, the earle of Essex with his companie of speares, sir Rice ap Thomas with his retinue, and sir John Penill with the Northumberland men. The Almans also were commanded to retire backe to the succours of them that were gone for the gun. The Al-mans went forth, till they came within two miles of the place where the gun lay, and further they would not go. The Frenchmen to the number of nine or ten thousand men (as some esteemed) were abroad, and came toward the place where the Englishmen were carting the peece of ordinance.

The Northumberland horsemen having espied them, gaue knowledge to the residue of the English men; who prepared themselves to defend their ground against the enemies: and the earle of Essex sent to the lord Malon, willing him with his compa-nie to come to his aid: but the lord Malon sent word again, that he was come to ferre the king of England more than for one daie, and therefore he wished that all the Englishmen would returne, with that with the great power of France they were not able to match. This answer was much displeasing to the earle of Essex and the other captains. In this maner time the foreriders of the French part were come to the hands of the Englishmen, and so they fell in skirmish very hotlie: but at length all things considered, and specially the small number of the Englishmen, and bring not above seven hundred horsemen, it was thought best that they should returne and follow the gun, which they had sent forward.

Whereupon they retreated in order, and not in any strong manner, still following the gun. The Frenchmen perceiving that, pitched forward to the number of two thousand horsemen, & came in to the backs of the Englishmen, who there with cast about, and made returne to the Frenchmen. Sir William Eller and Sir John Sharpe were the first that charged, and after all the other Englishmen. The Frenchmen fled immediately so fast backe, that happie was he that might be foremost. The whole host seeing their horsemen thus had in chase, suddenly returned. The earle of Essex withdrew to an hill, and there caused his trumpet to blow to the standard for feare of subtle dealing; and when his men were come in, and gathered together, he returned. On the same daie being fridaie, the nine and twentieth of Julie, the king came to Arkes, & there incamped; whither the earle of Essex came to him, and declared that had bene done that daie, the king thanking him and other the capitaine for their paines and diligence.

The king late here at Arkes till mondaie the first of August, and then removed to a village midwaie between Terwine and saint Omers, where he lay till thursdaie the fourth of August, and came that daie in good order of battell before the citie of Terwine, & there pitched by his tents and pavillions in most royal manner, sending his campe right stronglie with ordinance and other warlike deuises. [The king for himselfe had a house of timber with a chimney of iron, and for his other lodgings he had great and goodlie tents of blew water worke garnished with pelloie and white, diuerse comes within the same for all officers necessarie. On the top of the pavillions stood the kings beasts holding fanes, as the lion, the dragon, the grehound, the antelope, the dun cow: all within the lodging was pointed full of the sunnes rising, the lodging was one hundred and five and twentie fote in length.]

The king lieng before Terwine, his great ordinance did soe beat the towne walles, & they within likewise shot ordinance out of the towne, and due diuerse Englishmen in the trenches, among which shots they had one gun that euerie daie and night was ordinance shot at certaine houres without faile: this gun was of the Englishmen called the whistling gun, but it neuer did harme in the kings field. The siege thus lieng before the citie of Terwine, Sir Alexander Batnam a capitaine of the miners, caused a mine to be enterprised to enter into the towne: but the Frenchmen perceiving that, made a countermine, and so destroyed the other mine, and diuerse miners slaine within the same. The French armie houred euery farre to take the Englishmen at advantage, as they went a foraging; and manie a skirmish was done, and manie good feates of armes achieved on both sides, and diuerse prisoners taken. Among the Frenchmen were certaine light horsemen called Stradiots, with short stirraps, better hats, small speares, and swords like cinniteries of Turkie: diuerse times the northerne light horsemen under the conduct of Sir John Penill skirmished with these Stradiots and took diuerse of them prisoners, and brought them to the king.

While the king laie thus before Terwine, the capitaine of Bullongne knowing by his espials, that manie of the garrison of Calis were with the king at the siege, and also that vittells were daily brought out of England to Calis to succour the campe, imagined a great enterprise, and sent for all the men of warre under his dominion and rule, and declared to them what honour they should obtaine if they hurted or spoiled the out parts of Calis, the king of England on that side of the sea. The men of warre perceiving the good courage of the capitaine, assented to his purpose, and so with all diligence they, to the number of a thousand men, in the evening set forward, & came to Betonam bidge by three of the clocke in the morning, and found the watchmen that kept the bidge asleepe, & so entered the bulworke and slue the watchmen, and took the ordinance of the bidge, and then let the bidge fall, so that all entered that would.

The capitaine of Bullongne kept six hundred men for a sale at the bidge, & sent the other into the marshes and medows to fetch afoote the beasts and cattell which they should find there. This was done, and some of them came so nere the walles of Calis, that they were eiesied. And about a six score coupers, bankers, shipmen & other which laie without the towne, hearing the alarme, got together, & setting on those Frenchmen which were advanced so nere the towne, slue them downe that abode, chased them that fled euen into Betonam bidge, and recovered the same, and put backe their enemies. About five of the clocke in the morning, the gate of Calis called Bullongne gate was opened, and then by permission of the deputie, one Culpeper the under-marshal with two hundred archers under a banner of saint George issued forth.

All these in great hast came to Betonam bidge, where they found the other Englishmen that had borne the bidge of the Frenchmen, and so altogether set forward to assaile the Frenchmen that kept the sale, and taried till the residue of their companie which were gone a foraging unto Calis walles were come: for the other that had spoiled the marshes were returned with a great bootie. At the first, when the Frenchmen saw the Englishmen approach, they thought they had bene their owne fellows. But when they saw the banner of saint George, they perceived how the matter went, & so determined to defend themselves against their enemies; but the Englishmen set so fiercelie on, that finally the Frenchmen were discomfited, and foure and twentie of them slaine, beside twelue score that were taken prisoners, and all the ordinance and bootie againe recovered.

These prisoners were brought to Calis, & there sold in open market. [Among all other, a couper of the towne of Calis bought a prisoner of this bootie that dwelt in Bullongne, and had of the prisoner an hundred crowns for his rancome. When the monie was paid, the Frenchman praised the couper to see him safe deliuered, and to conduct him out of danger. The couper gentlie granted, and without any knowlledge of his friends, all alone went with the Frenchman till he came beyond the causeie, & there would haue departed: but the Frenchman perceiving that the couper was aged, and that no rescue was nie, by force took the couper prisoner, and carried him to Bullongne, & made him paie two hundred crowns for his rancome: thus thorough follie was the poore couper deceived. Wherefore it is wisdome for a man to hold fast his possession, and to supplie his want of strength by subtiltie; imitating therein the fox, which although in force he be inferior to the lion, as not able to beate the perking of his taile, or a pelt of his paw; yet in craft he goeth beyond that boisterous beaust, and so escapeth danger, which otherwise he might suffer.]

On the eleuenth day of August, being thursdaie, the king lieng at the siege of Terwine, had knowlledge that Maximilian the emperor was in the towne of Aire.

The effect of the Scottish kings letter to H. Henrie the eighth, p. 295, and Edw. Hall, in H. 8. fol. xxix, xxx.

The king of France a day without reason, and so.

The king of England a day without reason, and so.

Subscribed by a day without reason, and so.

their adherents, being by generall counsell expellie excommunicated & interdicted, trusting in time con venient to remember his friends, & requite his foes.
Whereover, he willed him to set before his eyes the example of the king of Spaurre, who for assistance giuen to the French king was now a king without a realme. And as touching answers to be made to the manifold griefs in the Scottish kings letters fur nished, if law or reason could haue remoued him from his sensall opinions, he had borne manie times al readie answered sufficientlie to the same; vnlesse to the pretended griefs therein amongst other compai sed, for denieng of a safe conduct to the Scottish an balladour to haue bene lastly sent vnto him. Where vnto thus he answered; that the same safe conduct had bene granted, if the Scottish herald would haue taken it with him.

And finally, as touching the Scottish kings re quest, to desist from further attempting against the French, he signified to him, that he knew him for no competent iudge of so high authoritie, as to re quire him in that behalfe, and therefore God willing he ment with the aid and assistance of his confede rats & allies to prosecute his begun attempt. And as the Scottish king should doe to him, & to his realme, so it should be hereafter remembred and acquitted.
These letters were written in the campe before Teruine the twelue of August, and giuen vnder the kings signet, and therewith deliuered to Lion king of armes, who had of the king 100 angels in reward.

Then departed he with his letters into Flan ders, there to take ship to saile into Scotland, but per he could haue a vessel and wind for his purpose, his maister was laine, as after ye shall heare. In this meane while the Frenchmen being assembled and lodged in campe at Blangie on this side Antiena, the French king appointed that all the hoisemen to the number of eight thousand (as Paulus Iopius recoz deth) should go with vittels vnto Teruine, and put the same into the towne, if by any meanes they might, for that those within stood as then in great necessitie for want of vittels.

The charge of this conuete was committed vnto Honsieur de Biennes, because he was lieutenant of those marches: notwithstanding there were a mongst the number, other noble men of more high degree in honor, and also of great prowesse, fame, and experience, furnished with sundrie bands of men at armes of long appoyued valiance, and used to go a waie with victorie in manie a dangerous conflict and battell, wanting at this present nothing but their old accustomed good fortune. Whilst the Frenchmen were thus prepared to come with vittels to Ter uine, the emperor Maximilian came from Aire to the kings campe before Teruine the twelue of Au gust, wearing a crosse of saint George as the kings souldier, & receiuing of him salarie for seruice; which Anglorum praelia noteth as noteworthie, saieing: Sub rege Anglorum magnus meret induperator.

The emperor was honourable received, and lod ged in a rich tent of cloth of gold prepared for him, according as was conuenient for his estate. He tar ried until sundae being the fourteenth of August, and then returned to Aire: and on the morrow after came againe being mondae the fiftenth of August, on which daie there chanced a great frate betwixt the Almans of the kings campe, and the Englishmen, insomuch that manie were laine. The Almans ran to the kings ordinance and toke it, and imbattelled themselues, and bent the ordinance against the king and his campe. The English prepared their bowes, and the Almans made redie their pikes: but the cap tains toke such paines in the matter, that the fraie was appeased.

Now as this trouble was in hand, the emperor came from Aire, and saw all the demeanour of both parts, and was glad to behold the discret behauiour of the capitains. After that the emperor was thus come to the kings field, the king called a counsell, at the which the emperor was present, where it was de bated, by what meanes they might best constreine them within to deliuer vp the towne, and especial lie how to keepe them from vittels & other succours, which the French armie (as it was knowne) want verie thortlie to minister vnto them. Some were of this mind, and namelie the emperor; that bridges should be made ouer the riuer, to passe ouer a part of the armie to besiege the towne on that side; where o therwise the French armie might hitell the towne at their pleasures.

Others were of a contrarie mind, doubting what might happen, if the armie should be so diuided, least the Frenchmen setting on the backe of the one part of the armie, and they within the towne to fallie out in their faces, some misfortune might happen per the other part could passe the riuer to the succour of the fellowes. Yet at length the former purpose was al lowed as most necessarie; and therefore commande ment was giuen to the maister of the ordinance, that in all hast he should cause fise bridges to be made ouer the water for the armie to passe. The car penters so applied their worke that night, that the bridges were made by the next morrow, and all the hoisemen first passed ouer, and then the king with his whole battell, and the great ordinance followed and passed ouer to the other side of the water. This was on the sixteenth daie of August being tuesday.

On the same morning the Frenchmen were com ming with their conuete of vittels to refresh the towne, hauing appointed one part of their troops to keepe on that side the riuer where the English armie was first incamped, and where the earle of Shrewes burie still kept his field; that in offering the skir mish on that side, the residue of the hoisemen might with more ease and safetie put the vittels and other necessarie things into the towne on the other side.
Here might a man haue sene of what force in wars sudden chance is oftentimes. For the king thus with his battell passing the riuer, meaning to besiege the towne on euerie side, and the Frenchmen at that same instant hauing also passed the riuer with other carriages laden with vittels, purposing to releue the towne on that side, caused no small doubt to be conceiued of ech others meaning, on both parts, least that the one, hauing knowlege of the others purpose, had bene prepared for to hinder the same.

And yet was it nothing so, for neither the king knew of the Frenchmens approach that daie, neither they of his passing ouer the water. But when the king had aduertisement giuen him (by the light hoisemen that were sent abroad to discover the countrie) how the Frenchmen were at hand; he pre pared himselfe to the battell, and first set forth his hoisemen, and then followed himselfe with his bat tell of footemen. The French capitains being hereof advised, determined not to fight without their foot men; and therefore with all speed sent backe their carriages, and staled with their hoisemen, until the carriages might haue leasure to get out of danger.
In the meane time the Englishmen advanced for ward, and their hoisemen mounted by the hill, where the French hoisemen were in troope, with thirtie and thre standards sped, & might see the Eng lishmen comming, and the kings battell marching forward with the Almans.

There were amongst the Frenchmen certeine companies of Estradiots, which being placed before the French host, as they came downe the hill to the k k k.

The king and the emperor confer which wayes were best to besiege Teruine, to prevent the bittelling of it.

Five bridges made in one night for the armie to passe ouer the riuer at Teruine.

skirmish with the Englishmen saw where the banners of the English horsemen were coming, and the kings battell following upward, wearing verelie that all had bene horsemen, whereupon they cast themselves about and fled. The Frenchmen were so fast in arraie, that the Estradiots could not enter; and so they ran still by the ends of the Frenchmens ranks. Herewith the English horsemen set on, and about an hundred archers on horse-backe, being lighted beside their horses, and set by an hedge all alongest a village side called Bomie, shot freshlie at their enemies; & also certeine culuerings being placed on the top of an hill were discharged amongst the thickest prease of the Frenchmen; so that finally the French were discomfited: for those that were behind saw the fall of some of their standards, which the Englishmen overthrew, and their Estradiots also (in whome they had great confidence) returned.

throw given to the French, king Henrie in person being present.

They that were furthest off fled first, and then the Englishmen & Burgognian horsemen, which were with them, egerlie followed the chase, in the which were taken the duke of Longue, brother to the earle of Dunois that had married the daughter and heire to the marquesse of Rothlois, the lord of Clermont, capteine Baiard, monsieur de Buse, and other, to the number of twelue score prisoners, and all brought to the kings presence with six standards, which were likewise taken. The Burgognians brought not their prisoners to fight. Monsieur de la Palice, and monsieur de Imbreccourt being taken of them and knowne, were put to their ransomes, and licenced maintenanthe to depart vpon their word. Thus was the power of the French horsemen by the sharpe encounter of the English horsemen, and full flight of the battels of the footmen, following in arraie at the backs of the horsemen, and the discharging of certeine culuerings amongst them, quickelie put to flight without any great resistance.

The emperor
courageously his Almans to play the men.

The emperor Maximilian was present with the king, and wore saint Georges crosse, greatlie encouraging the Almans to shew themselves like men, with the place was fortunate to him and them, to trie the chance of battell in: as they might call to remembrance by the victorie there obtained against the Frenchmen a foure and twentieth yeares past. This encounter chancing thus on the sixteenth daie of August, being tuesday, in this fift yeare of king Henries reigne, which was the yeare after the incarnation 1513, was called the battell Des espours, by the Frenchmen themselves, that is to saie, the battell of spurs: forsomuch as they in stead of sword and lance used their spurs, with all might and maine to pike forth their horses to get out of danger; so that in them was verified the old proverbe, One paire of heles is worth two paire of hands.

spurs.

That wing of the horsemen also, which was appointed to skirmish with the Englishmen on the other side the river, whilest the other might have conveyed the vittels into the towne, was fiercelie beaten backe by the martiall prowesse of the valiant erle of Shrewesburie, sir Alice ap Thomas, and other worthy capteins, which laie on that side the water. The duke of Alancon, the earle of saint Paule, and monsieur de Florences, had the leading of those Frenchmen. They within the towne were in great hope of succour this daie, and when they saw the French power approach, they sallied forth on that side where the lord Herbert laie, and skirmished with his people verie proudly, but they were repelled to the gates of their towne, and manie of them slaine by the high valiancie of the said lord Herbert and his capteins.

After that the Englishmen were returned from the chase of the Frenchmen, whome they had followed a thre long miles from the field, the king made sir John Bedeie a baneret, and John Care knight, which was sore hurt: sir John Bedeie had his gubdon taken, and diuers of his men hurt, they followed so farre in the chase. After this overthrow of the French horsemen, the king compassed the towne more streightlie on eche side, and the batterie was brought so nigh the walls as might be, with breaches were made in sundrie places, by meanes whereof the lord Pontremie despairing any long time to keepe the towne, fell to a composition, and yielded it vp to the kings hands. This encounter and overthrow, with the giving vp of Teruine, is extant to the knowledge of foreyn nations (to be read) recorded as followeth:

*Francorum pugnax equitatus praelia miscet, succurritque suis, sed frustra infirmior arma Turba capit; palmam bellando potentior Anglus Aufert, latibifera transfusus hostibus hastis.
Diruta turris fragis bombardis mania prebent Brutigena ingressum facilem, Gallique timorem Injuunt, tandem Terronana deditur Anglis.*

Wherewith this yielding vp of the said towne was with condition, that the souldiers might depart with horse and armour, & that such townesmen as would there remaine, might haue their liues and goods saved. Thus (I saie) was the citie of Teruine deliuered vp to the king of England, with all the ordinance and munitions then being found within the same. This was on the eighteenth of August. The earle of Shrewesburie entered the same night, and caused the banner of saint George to be set vp in the highest place of the towne in signe of victorie. When the lord Pontremie, and all the souldiers were departed, and that the earle of Shrewesburie had searched all the towne to see that euerie thing was sure, he called the townesmen afoze him, and swore them to be true to the king of England. The foure and twentieth of August the king himselfe entered the towne with great and roiall triumph, and dined in the bishops palace. At after none he returned to his campe, and on the six and twentieth daie of August he remoued againe to Cotingate, where he first incamped after the chase of the French horsemen.

Here it was determined in counsell, that the walls and fortifications of Teruine should be razed, which was done, and the towne burned; except the cathedrall church and the palace. All the ordinance was sent to Aize to be kept there to the kings vse. After this, it was concluded that the king should laie siege to the citie of Coignate; whereupon he set forward in thre battels: the earle of Shrewesburie leading the backward, the king and the emperor governing the battell, and the lord Chamberleine following with the reerward. The first night they incamped beside Aize. Diuerse Englishmen tarieng behind at Teruine for pilage, were surprised by the Frenchmen, which slew some of them, & cast some into the fire. Those that fled escaped verie narrowlie. The king with his armie passed forward towards Coignate, and by the waie visited the young prince of Castile and the ladie Margaret, gouernor of the prince, in the towne of Lille, whilist his armie laie abroad in the fields beyond Pont Amandien.

There was appointed to attend the king vnto Lille the duke of Buckingham, the lord marquesse Dorset, the earle of Essex, and the lord Aile, with diuerse other; the charge of his campe he committed for the tyme to his counsell. Then mounted the king vpon a conser, his apparrell & hard were cloth of siluer of small quadzant cuts trauesed and edged with cut cloth of gold, and the bozard set full of red roses, his armour fresh & set full of ietwels. The matter of his horse sir Henrie Guilford, and the henchmen followed.

followed (as you haue heard before) and the coursers richly apparelled, and so were manie captains that waited on the king: by the waie met the king the lord Kamester with manie noble men. And a mile without the towne there met with him the burge ses of Lille, and presented to him the keyes of the towne, saleng, that the emperour their soueraine lord had so commanded them to do.

The king praised their obedience to their soue reigne, and thanked the emperour and them for so high a present as the keyes of such a towne. Fewer thelike, he had such confidence in them, that he trust ed them no lesse than his owne subiects, and so deli uered the keyes to the prouost of the towne, which was well accompanied. Then met the king a great number of nobles of Flanders, Babant, Holland, and Henand, which noble received him. After them came the countie Palatine of Rhalgrane, one of the electors of the empire, with thirtie horses, all his men gorgeouslie apparelled after the fashion of his countie, and humbly saluted the king. At the gate of Lille the capitaine of the towne stood with a gar rison in armes well appointed, all the streets were set on both sides with burning torches and diuerse good lie pageants pleasant to behold. Thus he passed thro ugh the towne with his sword and maces boine be fore him, and alighted at the hall doore with his sword borne, where met with him the emperour, the prince of Castile, and the ladie Margaret, and humbly salu ted him.

Then for reuerence of the emperour, the king caused his sword to be put up, and his maces to be laid downe; & so was the king and all other nobles lodged and feasted according to their degrees. In the towne of Lille was a noise that three gunners with handguns should haue slaine the king: for which ru mor manie were attached, but nothing proued. But when these tidings came to the campe, they were ne uer merrie till they saw the king againe. Great was the chere, with bankets, plates, comedies, maskes, and other pastimes that were shewed to the king in the court of Burgognie, and so in solace he sojourned there sundae and mondae the nineteenth daie of September. On the twentieth daie he sent word that his armie should remoue toward Cozaine, and so they remoued to a place conuenient betwene Coz naie and Lille, and certeine capitaines were appoin ted to keepe the passage at the bridge of Amanden.

After that the king had taried at Lille three daies, and had well repored himselfe, he took his leave, and thanked the emperour and the young prince, the la die Margaret & all the ladies for all his high chere and solace; and about six of the clocke at night, he de parted out of Lille, and the noble men brought the king forth and so returned, and then the capitaine shut the gates. When the king was a mile and more out of the towne, he asked where his campe laie: And no man there could tell the waie, and guide had they none, the night was so darke & mistie. Thus the king taried a long while, and wist not whither to go; at last they met with a bitteler comming from the campe, which was their guide and brought them thither. The maister of the ordinance shot diuerse peeces of ordi nance, but they were not heard; but in safetie the king with all his companie returned.

On the one and twentieth daie of September the king remoued his campe toward Cozaine, and lod ged within three miles of the citie, on a soine ground by the riuer. On which night came to the king the emperour and the Rhalgrane, which were lodged in rich tents, and noble serued of all viands and things necessarie. The people about Cozaine were with their goods fled to the citie, and yet the citie had no men of warre to defend it, but with multitude of in habitants the same was well replentished. The king commanded Sir Rice and his horsemen to vield one quarter, and the earle of Essex and his companie an other quarter; and the lord Mallon and the lord Lignie the other quarters. Then the two and twen tith daie of September, these foure capitaines at one time were sone openlie with banners displayed be fore the towne, and there made a long scale, and re turned.

Then the king sent Cartier king of armes to sum mon them to yeld it ouer into his hands, to whome they made answer, that they receiued no citie of the king of England to keepe, nor anie would they ren der him, with which answer he departed. Then they fortified their walls, and made prouision for vittels, corne, wine, and artillerie, and for all fortifications that might be gotten. And the citie of it selfe was strong, well walled, and furnished with good bul works and defences. But when they saw the king with such a puissance draw nere the citie, they were soze abashed, and called a generall counsell. When the prouost said; Wethzen, you know how that the king of England sent an herald to summon vs to render vp to him this citie, or else he would put it and vs to the sword, fier, and blood. We answered we would be at defense. Now he is come in our sight to fulfill the message sent by the herald, & now is come the time of our defense.

Howbeit in this matter standeth three mischees, one is our bounden duetie and allegiance that we owe to our soueraine lord king Lewis of France; the second the liues of vs, our wiues, children, and neighbores; the third how to defend the small destruc tion of this ancient citie, now likelie to fall, which citie was neuer conquered. Now our citie is whole, your liues in safetie, your goods your owne; deter mine whether you will haue war or peace. Then said the prouost, Take compassion of wiues and children and of the old folke; consider if you haue no quicke rescue, you cannot continue against ponder puis sance, although your courages were neuer so great, this the wisest of the citie and I haue considered.
When suddenly was there in the counsell a vaunt parler, a botcher, which hearing this, called a great number of his affinitie, and went out of the counsell and so out of the gates, and set fire of the suburbs on all sides. When the counsell saw the minds of the commons, and that their waies might not be follo wed, they comforted the people, and maintained them for their defense.

After this the king approached the citie with his whole armie, and they of the citie issued forth to pro fer the skirmish: but the archers beat them backe.
Also the carriage men that came with the herbi gers, saw where certeine wagons were entring the citie, unto the which they ran, and take some of them.
At this skirmish the horse of the lord John Grate was slaine vnder him, as he came to defend the car riage men; but he himselfe had no hurt. The king with his battell planted his siege on the north side the citie. The earle of Shrewsburie with the fore ward lodged toward the south side of the riuer, and there laie that night. The lord Herbert with the rear ward incamped himselfe on the west side, and beat the walls and towers of the citie with the great ordi nance. The next daie after their comming thither, being the three and twentieth of September, the earle of Shrewsburie with the foreward passed the riuer, & planted his siege on the southside of the citie, stre ching to the east end, and bent his ordinance against the walles. And thus was the citie of Cozaine besie ged on all parts.

king receiued letters from the earle of Surrie with the Scottish kings gantlet, whereby he was certified of the slaughter of the said king, and how all things had bene handled at the battell of Floddon, whereof hereafter ye shall find further mention. The king thanked God of the newes, and highlie commended the pzonesse of the earle, and other the captiues: howbeit he had a secret letter, that Chet thiremen and other fled from sir Edmund Howard in the battell, which letter caused great hartburning, and manie words: but the king toke all things in good part, and would that no man should be dispai- sed. On the fir and twentieth daie, fiers were made in the hoast, in token of that victorie against the Scots, and on the seauen and twentieth daie being tuesday, masse was song by them of the kings chappell, with Te Deum, and the bishop of Rochester made a sermon, declaring the death of the king of Scots, and lament- ing his euill hap and pericure. But now to our pur- pose of the siege of Tornate.

The king of England lieng afront before To- rnate, caused his great ordnance to be planted round about the citie, and diuerse trenches were cast, and rampiers made, and the lord Aulse and the lord Willoughbie were appointed to mainteine the ordnance with their bands, and the earle of Kent was lodged before the gate called port Valencien; so that the ci- tizens could not issue out, nor no aid could come in. The ordnance daile beat the gates, towres, & wals, which made a great batterie: and a few Englishmen assaulted the port coquerell, but they were too few in number; and if they had bene more in number, they had taken the towne, as the Tornatins confessed after. The citizens of Tornate considering their estate came together to counsell, and there the pzonoff said in effect as followeth. Friends and brethren of this noble citie, I cannot too much praise your trust and fidelitie to your soueraigne lord the king of France; considering how manfully you haue defen- ded this citie since the beginning of this siege.

But alas! although it be written on the gates gra- tien in stone, Iammes ton ne a perdu ton pucelage, that is to saie; Thou hast neuer lost thy maidenhead: yet if this citie had not bene well furnished and euer at the daie appointed sure of rescue, it could not haue continued. Now you see that rescue faileth, our gates be rased, our towres beaten downe, our chiefe tower like to fall, so that if this perillous siege continue, or else if our enemies assault vs, we be not able to de- fend vs: wherefore now, all these things considered, I would know whether you will treat with the king of England or abide the chance. Then they which at the last counsell cried War, war; now cried Peace, peace: yet all were not agreed. Then one wise man said, Sirs if the towne be assaulted once againe with a great number, suerlie it will be taken: you saw the experience at the last assault, and then consider if it be taken by force, who is there that can saie he is sure of his life: but by intreatie, the king of England is so mercifull that we may fortune to saue both life and goods. When finally all agreed to treat.

Then the pzonoff sent to the king a trumpet, besir- ring a safe conduct for him & certaine other to come and to speake with him: which request was to him granted. Then the pzonoff of the citie, accompanied with eleven with him of the best of the citie, came to the armie, & spake with the lords of the counsell, and after were led to the kings presence. The pzonoff kneeled downe and all his companie, and said: Right high and mightie prince, although the citie of To- rnate is strong, well walled, well replenished with people, bittels, artillerie, yea and the people in feare and dread of nothing: yet we know that against your great puissance it can not continue long, although it were ten times as strong as it is. Wherefore we knowing by report your honor, your wisdom, your iustice, & noble hart, are content to become your sub- iects & vassals, so that we may haue and inioy our old lawes, customes, liberties, and franchises, vnder you; as we haue before this done vnder other princes.

Then said the king; We haue well heard your petition, we will common with our counsell & make you answer. And when he had communed with his counsell, he answered saing: Sirs, he that asketh mercie of vs, shall not be denied; and seeing you come to treat, we remit you to our counsell. Then they went into the tent of counsell, & there the To- rnatins fell at a point, and in conclusion they yielded the citie and ten thousand pounds sterling for the re- demption of their liberties, and so departed to the ci- tie, making relation of the king and his noble con- rage. On thursdaie the nine and twentieth daie of September, the king was in his rich tent of cloth of gold vnder his cloth of estate, to whome came the ci- zens of the citie, and were swozne to him, and became his subiects.

Then the king appointed the lord Aulse, the lord A- burgaunie, & the lord Willoughbie to take posses- sion, which with six thousand men entered the citie, and toke the market place and the wals, and searched the houses for feare of treason. Then maister Thomas Wolffe the kings almoner called before him all the citizens yong and old, and swore them to the king of England, the number whereof was foure score thou- sand. Thus the king of England by conquest came to the possession of the citie of Tornate. On sundae the second daie of October, the king entered the citie of Tornate at port founteine, and foure of the chiefe of the citie ouer him bare a canopie with all the armes of England. Euerie person was in his best apparell, the ladies & gentlewomen late in the win- dows beholding the king and his nobilitie, euerie citizen had in his hand a staffe torch. The king him- selfe was richlie apparelled in rich armour on a bar- bed courser, his henchmen bearing his peeces of war, as ar, speare, and other, their coursers were barbed with the armes of England, France, Ireland, and o- ther the kings dominions all richlie broidered. Thus the king with his nobilitie all richlie apparelled with his sword bozne before him, his heralds and serge- ants of armes with trumpets and minstrelle enter- red the citie, and came to our ladies church, and there Te Deum was song.

Then the king called to his presence, Edward Gullford, William Fitz Williams, John Danie, William Ellier, John Sharpe, William Husse, John Savage, Christopher Carnish, and diuerse other ball- ant esquires, and gaue to them the order of knight- hood, and then went to his lodging, and at after none he came to the market place, where was prepared for him a roome. Then he caused a proclamation to be made in his name king of England & France, that no man should greve the citizens. During which pro- clamation the Tornatins scarce looked by, nor shew- ed once to him any amiable countenance, which was much marked. The crie finished, the king departed to his campe, leaving the citie in safe keeping. This weeke the king rode to see the castell of Apoton, and there his grace toke great pleasure. The king re- membryng the great chere that the prince of Castile and the lady Margaret had made him at Aulse, which was but twelue miles English from Tornate, desir- ed the said prince & ladie, with diuerse other to come to him to his citie of Tornate, and made preparation for the same, and appointed a fests, whereof he him- selfe would be orie, and caused a tilt to be made in the market place.

While these things were preparing, the king and his pleyard master of the ordnance, sir Stephan Bull, sir Henrie Shyrburne, sir William Sidneie, sir Edward Ichingham, sir William Bulmer, with the power of the bishopricke of Durham, sir William Cascotigne, sir Christopher Ward, sir John Curing-ham, sir Thomas Metham, sir Walter Griffith, and manie others.

Of the wing on the right hand of the fore-ward, was capteine sir Edward Howard knight marshall of the host, & with him Brian Lunsall, Rafe Wear-ton, John Laurence, Richard Bold, esquiers: sir John Booth, sir Thomas Butler, knights: Richard Done, John Bigod, Thomas Fitz Williams, John Clarus, Brian Stapleton, Robert Marcop, Richard Cholmele, with the men of Hull, and the kings tenants of Hatfield, and others. Of the wing on the left hand, was capteine sir Parmaduke Constable, with his sonnes and kinsmen, sir William Persie, and of Lancashire a thousand men. Of the rere-ward was capteine the earle of Surreie himselfe, and with him the lord Scrope of Bolton, sir Philip Elmete, sir George Darcie, sir Thomas Berkleie, sir John Koccliffe, sir Christopher Pike-ring, Richard Tempest, sir John Stanleie, with the bishop of Elies servants, sir Brian Stapleton, Lipenger, sir Guie Dawneie, maister Hagmus, maister Dalbies servants, sir John Pormanulle, the citizens of Porke, sir Pinian Parkanulle, sir John Willoughbte, with others.

Of the wing on the right hand, was capteine the lord Darcie with his power. Of the left hand wing, was capteine sir Edward Stanleie knight, with the residue of the power of the two counties palantine of Gesser and Lancaster. Thus was the host appointed and divided into wards and wings at the first, though afterward (upon occasion) this order was somewhat altered. And now that euerie man knew what to do, the earle of Surreie with his power com-ming toward the place where he thought to find the Scottish host, was informed how king James being remoued sir miles from Forham, late imbattelled upon a great mountaine called Floddon, a place of such strength, as it was not possible for the Englishmen to come nere him, but to their great disadvantage: for at the foot of the same hill on the left hand, there was a great marshy ground full of reed and water.

On the right hand it was defended with a riuer called Till, the course thereof being so swift, and the chanell in some places so deepe, that it might not con-uenientlie be passed. On the backe halfe there were such craggie rocks and thicke woods, that it was not possible to assaile him to anie advantage that waie forth. And on the forepart of the campe, where nature had left anie easie entrie for men to come to the same, all his ordnance was planted aloft upon the sides of such trenches, as he had caused to be cast for defense on that part. The earle of Surreie hereupon, considering with himselfe, that unlesse he might de-uise some policie to cause the Scottish armie to descend the hill, it were not possible for him to accomplish his desire, he called about him his counsell, and with them toke advise in this point.

At length it was concluded and determined among other things, to send Rouge Crosse, purseuant at armes, with a trumpet to the king of Scots, with a message and certeine instructions: which in substance was, to shew and declare unto the said king of Scots, that where he (contrarie unto his oath and league, and unnaturallie against all reason and conscience) had entered and invaded this his brothers realme of England, and done great hurt to the same, in casting downe castles, towers, and houses, burning, spoiling, and destroying the same, and cruelle murdering the king of England his brothers subjects; he the said earle would be readie to trie the rightfulnesse of the matter with the king in battell, by first daie next comming at the furthest, if he of his noble courage would giue him taring and abode.

And the same did the said earle promise, as he was a true knight unto God & the king of England his maister.

And before Rouge Crosse should depart with the said instructions, the lord admerall gaue him in credence to shew the said king of his comming, and part of his companie from the sea with him, and that he had sought the Scottish nauie then being on the sea, but he could not meet with them, because they were sied into France by the coast of Ireland. And in as much as the said king had diuerse and manie times caused the said lord to be called at daies of truce, to make redresse for Andrew Barton a pirat of the sea, long before that vanquished by the same lord admerall, he was now come in his owne proper person, to be in the vant-gard of the field, to iustifie the death of the said Andrew against him, and all his people, and would see what could be laid to his charge the said daie.

Furthermore, that he no; none of his companie should take no Scottish noble man prisoner, no; anie other, but they should die if they came in his danger, unlesse it were the kings owne person; for he said he trusted to none other courtessie at the hands of the Scots. And in this manner he should find him in the vant-gard of the field, by the grace of God, and saint George, as he was a true knight. Yet before the departing of Rouge Crosse, with the said instructions and credence, it was thought by the earle & his coun-cell, that the said king would faine and imagine some other message, to send an herald of his with the same, onelie to view and ouersce the manner and order of the kings rotall armie, ordnance, and artillerie then being with the earle; whereby might haue insued great danger to the same.

And for the eschuing thereof, he had in commandement, that if anie such message were sent, not to bring anie person comming therewith within thre or two miles of the field at the night, where the said earle would come, and heare what he would saie. And thus departed Rouge Crosse, with his trumpet, appa-relled in his coat of armes. On mondai the first daie of September, the earle toke his field at Bolton in Glendale, as he had appointed, where all the noble men and gentlemen met him with their retinues, to the number of six and twentie thousand men.
And about midnight next insuing came the trumpet which went to Rouge Crosse, and declared how the king of Scots, after the message done to him by Rouge Crosse, according to his instructions, the said king detained him, & sent one Flaie an herald of his with him unto the earle, to declare to him the kings pleasure; to whom the earle sent Porke herald at armes, to accompanie the said Flaie, at a billage called Gpslo, two miles from the field, untill the com-ming thither of the said earle the next morow.

On the first daie of September, earlie in the morning, the earle accompanied with the most part of the lords and knights, and gentlemen of the field, euerie man hauing with him but one seruant to hold his horse, rode vnto the place: and so the said herald met with the earle, and with blunt reuerence declared to him that he was come from his maister the king of Scots, which would know whether the earle sent anie such message by Kouge Crosse. The earle notified the same, saing further; that Kouge Crosse had the same message of him in writing, signed with his owne hand. Whereunto the said Flaie said: As to the abiding for battell betwene that and fridaie then next following, the king his maister bade him shew to the earle, that he was as welcome as anie noble man of England vnto the said king, and that if he had bene at home in his towne of Edinburgh, there receiuing such a message from the said earle, he would gladlie haue come, and fulfilled the said earles desire.

And the herald assured the earle, on the king his maisters behalfe, that the same king would abide him battell at the daie prefixed. Whereof the said earle was right iolous, and much praised the honorable agreement of an high and honorable courage, promising the herald, that he, and good suertie with him should be bound in ten thousand pounds sterling, to keepe the said daie appointed; so that the king would find an earle of his, and thereto a good suertie with him to be bound in like summe, for the performance of the same. And furthermore the earle bade the herald to saie vnto his maister the king; that if he for his part kept not his appointment, then he was content that the Scots should baffall him, which is a great reproch among the Scots, and is vfed, when a man is openlie perjured, and then they make of him an image painted, reuerfed, with his heeles vpiward, with his name, wondering, crieng, and blowing out on him with hornes, in the most despitesfull manner they can, in token that he is worthe to be eriled the companie of all good creatures. Then Flaie deliuered to the earle a little schedule written with the kings secreta- ries hand vnsigned, as followeth.

The tenor of the said schedule.

AS to the causes alledged of our comming into England against our band and promise (as is alledged) thereto we answere; our brother was bound as farre to vs, as we to him. And when we sware last before his ambassador, in presence of our counsell; we expressed especiallie in an othe, that we would keepe to our brother, if our brother kept to vs, and not else. We sweare our brother brake first vnto vs. And since his breach we haue required diuers times him to amend; & lateste we warned our brother, as he did not vs, yet he brake. And this we take for our quarrell, and with Gods grace shall defend the same at your affixed time, which with Gods grace we shall abide.

And forsomuch as the king kept Kouge Crosse with him, who was not yet returned, the same earle caused the same Flaie to be in the keeping of Sir Humfre Lile and Yorke herald in the same vil- lage; untill the time that a seruant of the same Flaie might ride in all hast to the king of Scots, for the deliuering of the said Kouge Crosse. Then the earle iolous of the kings answer, returned to his campe, and set forward five miles, to a place called Woller Hangh, in such order of battell, as euen then he should haue fought, and there lodged for that night, three little miles from the king of Scots. And be- twene the king & him was a goodlie & large comen field called Spillfield, which was a conuenient & faire ground for two hostes to fight on: there either host might perceiue other. The earles desire was to procure the Scots to descend the hill into some euen ground, where he might fight with them without dis- aduantage of place.

But the king, though he had a great desire to fight, yet vpon diuerse considerations, by aduise of his counsell he still kept his ground, and meant not to remoue at all out of his strength. Wherevpon the earle of Surrie not able long to continue in such grounds of disadvantage, by reason of mires, and marishes, amongst the which he lodged with his ar- mie that was almost famished for lacke of sufficient vittels, which could not be recovered in such a barren countrie, determined to take all waies possible, if he might constrain the Scottish king to come downe beside the hill. He therefore raised his campe, and leauing his enimies on the left hand, and passing ou- er the water of Till, he dyed into a more com- dious ground, at the end of Barmoze wood; to the end he might refresh his souldiers somewhat hereby after they had bene toiled for the space of thre daies together in cloggie mires, and foule filthie waies, to their discafe and wearinesse.

The earle of Surrie being thus lodged, the wa- ter of Till ran betwixt the two campos of Scots and Englishmen, diuiding them in sunder: and still by reason the one was within the shot of a culuering of the other, they ceased not to beskow shot and pou- der either at other, though without doing anie great hurt at all. For the English campe on that part which late toward the Scots, was couered with an hill rising from the hither banke of Till water, with an easie steepnesse to the height of a miles space or thereabouts. Thomas lord Howard sonne and heire to the earle of Surrie, from the top of this hill beholding all the countrie on euerie side about him, declared to his father, that if he did effoons remoue his campe, and passe the water of Till againe in some place a little above, and by fetching a small com- passe come & shew himselfe on the backe halfe of his enimies, the Scottish king should either be enforced to come downe forth of his strength and giue battell, or else be stoped from receiuing vittels or anie other thing out of Scotland.

The earle of Surrie desirous of nothing so much as to ioine with the Scots in battell; after he vnder- stood that his sonne had informed him nothing but truth, he raised his field: and marching a thre miles vpiward by the riuer side, passed ouer his armie in two parts at two seuerall brydges, all at one time. King James when he saw this manner of his eni- mies, and perceiuing what their meaning was, by coniecture of their doings, thought it stood not with his hono: to sit still, and suffer himselfe to be forestal- led forth of his owne realme: and againe, that it might soe diminish the opinion of his princelie pow- er, if he seemed to remaine as it were besieged with- in a fortesse, hauing more confidence in strength of the place, than in the manhod of his people: where- vpon immediatlie he raised his campe, and got an hill, which he doubted least the enimie should haue ta- ken before him.

But by such diligence as he vfed, and by reason of the great smoke which was raised and spread ouer all the countrie, by burning of the litter and cabbins wherein the Scots had lodged, purposelie set on fire to the same intent, he was got to the place whither he intended, before the Englishmen knew for anie cer- teintie that he was dislodged, though they were as then within a mile of him. Thus king James keep- ing the tops of the hills, the earle of Surrie with the English armie came to the foot of the same hills, and staing there a while, for so much as he saw how the hill to the which the Scots were gotten, was neither stepe nor hard to ascend, he determined to mount the same, and to fight with the Scottish host per they should haue leasure to fortifie their campe.

Herewith calling his people together, he made vnto them a breife oration, declaring vnto them both what necessitie there was for them to shew their manhood, and what iust causes they had also to fight against those enemies, that against both the lawes of God and man had most cruellie invaded the reime of England, in the quarrell of a schismaticke, and one that was accursed and excommunicated by the censures of the church. The Englishmen kindled with desire to fight, the more thorough those words of the earle, required incontinentlie to be led forth against the Scots, that they might shew what earnest wills they had to be reuenged; not onelie of new receiued wounds, but also of ancient iniuries; for there should neither heighth of hill, nor anie other obstacle hinder them, but they would either returne with victorie, or else lose their liues in the paine.

The ordering of the English armie.

The earle of Surrie conceiued no small hope of victorie in this chearefull readinesse of his souldiers, and thereupon with all speed (as the occasion then moued him at that instant) diuided his armie into three battels, or rather sours: vnto the vant-gard whereof, the lord Howard was capteine, his brother sir Edmund Howard was ioined as a wing; the earle himselfe led the middle ward, and the reere-ward was guided by sir Edward Stanleie, afterwards created lord Mounteagle. The lord Dacres with a number of horsemen was set apart by himselfe to succor where need should seme to appeare. The ordinance was placed in the front of these battels, & in places betwene, as was thought expedient. In this order, forward they made with manlie courages towards the Scots a good marching pace.

kings thought at the view of
armie.

In the meane time, king James beholding all the demeanour of the Englishmen, from the heighth of the hill, thought with himselfe, that there was offered him that daie a goodlie occasion of victorie, if he might come to fight with the enemies at such aduan-tage of place and number. And therefore, being hasti-ned forward through the strenable force of destinie, or rather Gods ordinance, he commended his standards to be raised and sped, and euerie man to resort to his appointed place, that they might forthwith in-counter the enemies, that presumed thus to seke battell. And herewith turning him to the lords and cap-teins that stood about him, he spake vnto them manie comforttable words touching the occasion offered them at that present, to gaine both a famous victo-rie, and to reuenge so manifold iniuries and displeasures, as they had sustained diuerse waies forth at the Englishmens hands.

King James and all the rest

He had scarce made an end of his tale, but the soldiers with great noise and clamor cried; forward, vpon them; shaking their weapons in signe of an earnest desire they had (as then they shewed) to bukle with the Englishmen. Whereupon, without de-laie, king James putting his horse from him, all other as well nobles as meane men did the like, that the danger being equall, as well to the greatest as to the meaneest, and all hope of succour taken awaie, which was to be looked for by sight, they might be the more willing to shew their manhood, with their safe-gard onelie rested in the edges and points of their weapons. Then was the whole armie diuided into five wards or regiments, to this intent, that the battell therein the king himselfe stood with his standard, might be inclosed as it were with two wings, on either side one. In the right wing, the earles of Hunt-leie, Crawford, and Montrose, were placed as chiefe leaders thereof; and in the left, were the earles of

The order of the Scottish host.

Lenor, and Argile, with the lord Hume, lord cham-berleine of Scotland, being men of great skill in warlike affaires, as was reported.

Moreover, in euerie band (almost generallie thro-roughout) there was a knight appointed for capteine and guider, and amongst them certaine French cap-teins, the which king Lewes had sent ouer into Scotland latelie before, to traine the Scots in the practise of warres. The ordinance was lodged in places most conuenient; though by reason they marched downe the hill, their shot did small damage to the Englishmen comming bywards towards them, and yet they bestowed it freshlie on either side one vpon an other.
Herewith sir Edmund Howard with his wing was got by on the hill side, with whom the lord Hume and the two foresaid earles of Lenor and Argile in-countered with such violence, that this battell of Scots with speares on foot on that part, beat downe and broke that wing of the Englishmen, in such wise that sir Edmund Howard was in maner left alone, and felled to the earth, that (had not bassard Heron come to his succours at that instant) he had bene slaine there without all remedie.

On the other part, the lord Dacres watching to aid where need appeared, came in on the sides of the Scots, & gaue a charge on them with his horsemen, whereby sir Edmund Howard being some what relieued, escaped to the English vant-gard, which was led (as before is mentioned) by his brother, lord Howard, who being now also got aloft on the hill, pressed still forward to renew the battell, & to succour those whome he saw put to the worke, so that thereby they tooke new courages, & laid about them againe. Herewith the earles of Crawford & Montrose came with their battell of speares also on foot, and incounting with the said lord Howard, after some fight on both sides continued, with more malicious hatred than force of the parties, both the said earles were slaine, besides a great number of other; the whole battell which they led being put to flight and chased out of the field, maimed, wounded, and slaine. And though they did what they could to the uttermost resistance, in hope to haue bathed their blades in English blood; yet the contrarie came to passe, as in stories is left recozded, to the honour of the English; namely:

Sustinet infictos duris umbonibus istis,

Imbuat & gladius manante cruore Britannia.

On the left hand at the same instant, sir Edward Stanleie hauing begun to incounter with the Scots on that side, forced them to come downe into a more euen ground; and brought to that point with such incessant shot of arrowes as his archers bestowed amongst them, that to auoid the danger of that force and sharpe strome, the Scots were constrained to breake their arrate, & to fight not closed together in order of battell, but insunder one separated from another, so that their standards began to thinke here and there. Which thing when sir Edward Stanleie perceiued, forthwith bringing about three bandes; which he had kept in store for such like purpose; he in-uaded the open sides of his enemies by a fresh onfet, and put them in such disorder, that they were not able anie longer to abide the violence of the Englishmen mightilie pressing vpon them: so that taking themselues to flight, and running headlong downe the stepe descent of the mountaine, they escaped to the woods and there saved themselves. But the earles of Argile and Lenor, doing what they could to save their people from running awaie, were slaine in the same place.

In the meane time, the king, who a little before had ioined with the earle of Surrie, perceiuing that the wings of his battell were distressed, and that his enemies began to inclose him on eith side, he bathed nothing at the matter, but with assured countenance exhorted thoe that were about him to flicke to him, and to remember their woorthie ancelloz, in committing nothing that might anie waies forth found to their reproch. And herewith rushing against his en-mies, a new battell moze egre than the first began to arise; for that battell being well appointed and armed passed litle for the Englishmens arrowes, in so much that perking the earles battell, they entred well nere so farre within the same, that they were at point to haue ouerthrowne his standards.

There were on either part a number of fall men of bodie, chosen forth of purpose by the capteins, for the good opinion conceiued of their hardie valiance, the battell betwixt them seemed long time doubt-full and variable, now one while fauourable to the one part, and an other while to the other. The king himselfe on foot euen in the foremost ranke, fought right balliantlie, encouraging his people, as well by example as exhortation, to do their deuoirs. Bet-ther did the earle of Surrie for his part faile in the dutie of a right woorthie generall. But while the battell was thus foughten in most earnest uauer about the standards with doubtfull chance of victorie, the lord Howard and sir Edward Stanleie hauing ban-quished the enemies in either wing, returned to the middle ward, and finding them there thus occupied, they set on, in two parts severallie, with great violence.

At the same time, the lord Dacres came with his hozemen upon the backs of the Scots; so that they being thus assailed behind and before, and on either side, were constrained (as mistrusted about) to fight in a round compasse. King James as he beheld sir Adam Forman his standard-bearer beaten downe, thought suerlie then, there was no waie for him but death, and that euen out of hand. Wherefore to deli-uer himselfe from such despitefull reproch, as was like to follow, he rushed forth into the thickest prease of his enemies; and there fighting in most desperat wise, was beaten downe and flaine. And a little beside him, there died with like obstinate wilfulnesse, or (if ye list so to terme it) manhood, diuerse honorable prelats, as the archbishop of saint Andrews, and two other bishops, besides foure abbats; also of lordes and knights of honoz a fix and thirtie.

The lord Hume and the earle of Huntleie got horses, and escaped awaie together with certeine bands, placed in two the hindermost wards, which of all that daie neuer came to handstrokes, but stod still and gaue the looking on. Thus thorough the potuer of God, on fridaie being the ninth of September, in the yeare 1513 was James the fourth of that name, king of Scots, flaine at Bannockton, and his armie discomfited by the earle of Surrie, lieutenant to Henrie the eight king of England, which a little before had toone the towne of Perwaine, and was then preparing to go to besiege Cornate. There were flaine in this battell on the Scotish party, of all sorts, the number of eight thousand persons at the least: some saie twelue thousand, besides prisoners that were taken, as sir William Scot, chancelloz to the said king, and sir John Forman his sergeant porter, with diuerse others. Also in manner, all the Scotish enignes were taken, and a two and twentie peeces of great ordinaunce, amongst the which were seauen culuerings of a large adize, and verie saire peeces.
King James named them (for that they were in making one verie like to an other) the seauen sisters.
This conflict with egernesse on both sides was continued thre full houres, as Anglorum prelia saith: Iam tres integras pugnamus est communis horae.

Though the victorie thus remained with the Englishmen, yet they bought it dere, loosing no small number of their people, as well of those that were flaine in the field, as of others that were taken prisoners; for the Scots fought verie stoutlie, and gaue it not ouer for a litle, inso much that there were taken and flaine about fiftene hundred men, as appeared by the booke of wages, when the soldiers were paid.

Manie Englishmen that followed ouer rashlie in the chase of the Scots, went so farre, that they wist not which waie to returne, and so were taken of the Scots that were in the two battels that went awaie with cleare hands, and neuer fought. Also, diuerse were taken by the lord chamberleine, which fought with the wing of sir Edmund Howard, and were caried awaie by him and his companie into Scotland, as John Fittou esquier, and others. During the time of the fight, and the night after, manie Englishmen lost their hozles, and such stoffe as they left in their tents and pavillions, by the robbers of Tindale and Tuidale.

When the field was done, and that the skouts brought word that there was no moze appearance of the Scots, but that they were all auoided and gone, the earle gaue thanks to God, and called to him cer-teine lordes and gentlemen, and them made knights; as sir Edmund Howard his sonne, the lord Scrope, sir William Perrie, sir Edward Gorge, and diuerse others. The earle and the lord admerall departed to Bermar wood, & there lodged that night, leauing sir Philip Tlneie knight and diuerse other woorthie cap-teins, with a conuenient power of men, to keepe the place where the field had bene fought, for safeguard of the ordinaunce. The bodie of the king of Scots was not found untill the next daie, and then being found and knotone by the lord Dacres, there appeared in the same diuerse deadlie wounds, and speciallie, one with an arrow, and an other with a bill. But some saie he died of two, both which were inflicted upon him to his deadlie bane (and well woorthie for) truce-breaking by the sword; as Anglorum prelia reporteth: Pulueribus Scotus acceptis cadit ense duobus, Perfidia meritis fuso dans sanguine penas.

The same daie, there appeared some Scots on a hill, but one William Blackenall that had the cheefe rule of the ordinaunce, caused such a peale to be shot off at them, that the Scots fled; or else the lord admerall, which was come to view the field, had bene in great danger; as was supposed. But now that the Scots were fled, and withstowne, all the ordinaunce was brought in safetie to Cstall, and there remained for a time. After that the earle of Surrie had taken order in all things, and set the forth parts in good quiet, he returned to the queene with the dead bodie of the Scotish king cered. When the king was returned into England from his conquest made in France of the cities of Perwaine and Cornate, he forgot not the good seruice of those that had bene with the earle of Surrie at the battell at Bannockton: wherefore he wrote to them his louing letters, with such thanks and fauourable words, that euerie man thought himselfe well rewarded.

On the daie of the Purification of our ladie, at Lambeth, the king created the earle of Surrie duke of Suffolke, with an augmentation of the armes of Scotland, and sir Charles Brandon vicount Lisle he created duke of Suffolke, and the lord Howard high admerall he created earle of Worcester: and after this, he also made sir Edward Stanleie (for his good seruice shewed at Bannockton field) lord gounteaigle: and in March following was master Thomas Wolle the kings almoner, consecrated bishop of Exeter. This man was bozne at Ipswich, wolle des and was a good philosopher, verie eloquent and full of wit; but passinglie ambitious, as by his doings it well appeared. In the time of king Henrie the seanenth it was agréed betwixt the said king and Philip king of Castile that Charles king Philips eldest son should marrie the ladie Marie, daughter to the said king Henrie, with a dowry to be appointed: but for want of sufficient assurance of the dowry, the rest of covenants were made void, and yet had the king by his provision for the sending of his over, now after his coming from Tornaie.

This yeare the citizens of London, finding themselves grieved with the inclosures of the common fields about Hington, Horton, Shorhitch, and other places nere to the citie, whereby they could not be suffered to exercise their bowes, nor other pastimes in those fields, as before time they had bene accustomed, assembled themselves on a morning, and went with spades and shovels into the same fields, and there (like diligent workemen) so besetted themselves, that within a short space, all the hedges about those towne were cast downe, and the ditches filled. The kings counsell coming to the grate fiers, to understand what was meant by this doing, were so answered by the mayo: and council of the citie, that the matter was dissolved: and so when the workemen had done their worke, they came home in quiet maner, and the fields were neuer after hedged.

George Donor for this yeare Mayo: of London, of his goodlie disposition reedified the decayed steeple of the parish church of Walthamstow, in the countie of Essex, adding thereunto a side Ale, with a chappell, where he lieth buried. And on the northside of the churchyard there, he founded a faire large almshouse for an almshouse priest or schoolmaster, and thirtene poore almes folke, eight men, and five women, appointing to the said almes priest or schoolmaster for his yearelie wages, six pounds thirtene shillings foure pence; and to euerie one of the said almes folke seven pence a weeke, and five pounds to be bestowed yearelie amongst them in coles. And ordeined that the said almes priest should on sundaies and festiual daies, be helping and assistant to the vicar or curat there in celebration of diuine seruice, & on the weeke daies frelie to applie and teach yong children of the said parish, to the number of thirtie, in a scholehouse by him there builded for that purpose. Moreover, he gaue to the parish cleark there for the time being, a yearelie stipend of twentie six shillings eight pence, for euer, and a chamber by the said almes house, to the intent he should helpe the said schoolmaster to teach the said children. And hath giuen faire lands and tenements in the citie of London, for the perpetual maintenance of the premises to Gods glorie for euer. He also for the great commoditie of travellers on foot, made a continuall canlie of timber ouer the marshes from Walthamstow to Locke bridge towards London.

Edw. Hall in Hen. 8. fol. 46.
The king and the new duke of Suffolke defenders at the tilt against all commers.

In the moneth of Maie, the king and the new duke of Suffolke were defenders at the tilt against all commers. The king was in a scolaparie mantle, an hat of cloth of siluer, and like a white hermit, and the duke apparelled like a blacke hermit, all of blacke velvet, both their berds were of damaske siluer: and when they had ridden about the tilt, & shewed themselves to the quene, then they threw off their apparell, and sent it to the ladies for a largesse. Then was the king in blacke, and the duke in white, with blacke stauces, on the stauces was written with white letters, Who can hold that will away: this posie was indged to be made for the duke of Suffolke, and the duchesse of Sanoie. At these times were the duke of Longuile, & the lord Cleremont, and there the king & duke did so balliantlie, that they obtained the prize. At these times were broken an hundred and fourtene speares in a short space. The king at this season sent againe into Flanders, for the performance of the marriage of the yong prince of Castile, and the faire ladie Marie his sister, and shewed how he had prepared all things necessarie and conuenient for such an high estate. The counsell of Flanders answered, that they would not receiue him that yeare, with manie subtill arguments, by reason whereof, the perfect loue betwene England and the low countries was much slaked.

On the nineteenth daie of Maie was receiued into London a cap of maintenance & a sword, sent from pope Iulie, with a great companie of nobles and gentlemen, which was presented to the king on the Sunday then next ensuing, with great solemnitie in the cathedrall church of saint Paule. Touching this pope (saith Guicciardine) disappointed of so manie hopes, we may late him in comparison with that which is written by the poets of Anteus, that being famed by the forces of Hercules, as often as he was throlone to the ground, so often did appeare in him a greater strength and courage; such waning had the pope amidst his aduersities, for when he seemed most abused and oppressed, it was then that he did most lift by him selfe with a spirit more constant and resolute, promising better of his fortune than euer.

After he had plaied all his troublesome pageants, and had got by sundrie aspiring practices I trust not what pœrelesse primasie, he fell sicke. And haplic he was then more full of high conceits and travelling thoughts than at any time before: for notwithstanding he had brought his fortune to be equal with his desires, & obtained the thing he aspired unto, yet his deuises and plots did nothing diminish, but grew increasing by the same meane which should haue satisfied them. He had determined in the beginning of the spring and first opening of the yeare, to send to the enterprise of Ferrara which he so much desired, and his opinion was, that that state was able to make no resistance, both for that it was naked of all succours; and because the Spanishe armie was to ioin with his companies: he had secretlie bought of Cesar for the price of thirtie thousand duckets, the citie of Sienna for the behoofe of the duke of Arbin, to whome (except Desera) he would neuer giue any thing of the estate ecclesiastike, to the end to reserve to himselfe the whole glorie to haue simple and one lie studied for the exaltation of the church. He agreed to lend to Cesar fortie thousand duckets, receiuing Spodona in gage. He threatened them of Luquio, who in the heat of the affaires of the duke of Ferrara, were become lords of Caragnana; making in France that they would deliver it to him.

He was out of conceit with the cardinal of Medici, for that he thought him to cleaue more to the king catholike, than to him. And because he knew he was not able to dispose of the citie of Florence as he thought, he studied alreadie new plots, and new practises to alter that estate: He was ill contented with the cardinal of Solon, from whome he took the name of legat; and intoided him to come to Rome, for that in the duchie of Milan he had appropriated to himselfe a yearelie rent of more than thirtie thousand duckets, of the estates and goods of diuers persons. The better to assure the duke of Arbin of Sienna by intelligences of his neighbours, he had of new taken into his pate Charles Bailion, to chafe out of Verona: John Paule, who by amitie was verie nere ioined to the sonnes of Pandolfe Petrucchio successors to the greatnesse of their father. He would of new create duke of Genes, Dauidan Fregosa, deposing Janus from that dignitie: an action whereunto did consent the others of the house of Fregosa, because for the degree that his ancestors held in that state, it seemed best to apperteyne unto him.

He studied continually either how he might take out of Italie the Spanishe armie, or cut it in pieces by the aid of the Swizzers, whom above all others he exalted and embraced. In this deuise he had this intention, that the kingdome of Naples being occupied by him, Italie should remaine free from strangers; a speech that often passed out of his mouth: and to that end he had hindered that the Swizzers did not confederate with the king catho-like. And yet, as though it had bene in his power to batter all the world at one time, he continued his accustomed rigour against the French king. And notwithstanding he had hard a message from the queene, yet he stirred by to make warre, the king of England, to whom he had transferred by publike decree of the conncell of Lateran, the name of Christianissimo, whereof there was already a bull written, and in it likewise was contained the pination of the dignitie & name of the king of France, giving his kingdome to who could occupie it.

In these conceptions, no lesse strange for their varietie, than great for the importance they drew, and perhaps in other thoughts more secret and singular (for in a mind so fierce and terrible, all sorts of imaginations, how great and daime so euer they be, are not incredible) after the continuation of his sick-nesse for manie daies, he declined towards death: and feeling the end of his mortalitie to hasten on, and the same to prevent the execution of his high thoughts, he caused to call together the consistorie, which albeit he could not assist in person by reason of his disease; yet by the authoritie of it, he caused to be confirmed the bull which he had published before against such as by simonie would clime by vnto the pope-dome. He declared, that the election of his successor appertained to the college of cardinals, and not to the councell: and that the cardinals schisma-tikes could haue no presence or communitie there, to whom he protested there to pardon the injuries they had done him, and prayed to God to forgive them the wrongs they had done to his church. After this he besought the college of cardinals, that in his fauor, and for his sake, they would grant to the Duke of Cleu his nephew, the citie of Bescra in patronage or vicarage, alledging the consideration, that by meane of the duke it had bene recovered to the church after the death of John Sforce. In no other matter he expressed anie private or particular affection.

Inasmuch as Madame Felice his daughter (toning with hir the petitions of manie others) beseech-ing him with great importunitie, to create cardinall Guido de Montfalcon being hir brother by the mothers side, he answered roundlie, that he was not worthie of that degree. He made not his affections conformable to their desires. In that last action of life he shewed no parcialitie in worlde causes: his present debilitie could diminish nothing of his ancient resolution, but expressed in all things the same constancie and seueritie, together with that iudge-ment and force of mind which he had before his sick-nesse: in which firme estate and disposition of spirit, he receiued deuoutlie the offices of the church, and the one and thirtieth daie of Februarie he ended his course of these mortall and present paines. He was a prince of incredible constancie and courage; but so full of furie & brutish conceptions, that the reuerence that was borne to the church, the respect of princes, the exhortations of times, did more to keele him from his crime, than either his moderation or his discretion; wothie no doubt of great glorie, if either he had bene a prince secular, or if that care and intention which he had to raise the church into temporall great-nesse by the meane of warre, had bene imployed to exalt it by the meane of peace in matters spirituall.

Heuerthelesse, he was lamented about all his predecessors, & no lesse esteemed of those, who hauing either lost the true consideration of things, or at least ignorant how to distinguish and pesse them rightlie, iudged it an office more due to appertaining to popes to increase the inuidition of the see apostolike by armes and blood of christians, than by good example of holie life and due caring and correction of corrupt manners, to trauell for the sauing of those soules, for whom they glorie so much that Iesus Christ hath named them his vicars in earth: and therefore it is a god consequent that he is a brand or rather a brand of the diuell, as one concludeth against him, saying:

Impius est igitur natus eacodemone papa, Turpibus & genij est homicida satius.

About the same time the warres yet continuing betwene England & France, Prior Jehan (of whom ye haue heard before in the fourth yeere of this kings reigne) great capteine of the French nauie, with his gallies and foists charged with great basiliiks and other artillerie, came on the borders of Souther in the night season, at a poze village there called Bighthelmston, & burnt it, taking such goods as he found.
But when the people began to gather, by firing the becons, Prior Jehan sounded his trumpet, to call his men aboard, and by that time it was daie. When cer-teine archers that kept the watch folowed Prior Jehan to the sea, and shot so fast, that they beat the gallie men from the shore, and wounded manie in the foist, to the which Prior Jehan was constrained to waide and was shot in the face with an arrow, so that he lost one of his eyes, and was like to haue died of the hurt: and therefore he offered his image of war before our ladie at Bullongne, with the English arrow in the face for a miracle.

The lord admerall offended with this proud part of the Frenchmen, in making such attempt on the English coasts, sent sir John Wallop to the sea with diuers ships, which sailing to the coasts of Normandie, landed there, and burnt one and twentie villages and totones, with diuerse ships in the haven of Trepont, Staples, and other where. Men marvelled greatlie at the manfull doings of sir John Wallop, considering he had not past an eight hundred men, and toke land there so often. In June sir Thomas Lowe was sent ouer to Calis with six hundred men to strengthen that totone, and other the fortresses within the English pale, for doubt of anie sudden attempt to be made by the Frenchmen; because monsieur de Pontremie, with a mightie armie and great ordnance was come downe nere to Ard: howbeit he taried not long, but raised his campe within a while after his comming thither, and returned without anie more doing. The French king perceiving that losses he had sustained by the warres against England; and doubting least one euill lucke should fall follow in the necke of an other, determined to make sute for peace; and first agreeing with pope Lea, desired him to be a meane also for the procuring of some agreement betwixt him and the king of England.

dinals were the principall causers of it by their in-bustrie, hauing long time afore secretlie agreed amongst themselves to create the first pope of their number. The most parts and nations of christen-dome reioiced much at this election, euerie one in-well by the present and grane memoire of the baloy of his late father, as for an vniuersall reputation that went of his owne inclinations and liberalities. To this estimation was ioined a generall opinion of his continencie and life not atteinted, together with a glad some hope, that by the example of his father, he would be a furtherer of learning, and beare sauoy to wits disposed to studie and knowledge. So that vnto these hopes was much helping the manner of the election, being made in his person sincerelie, and without simonie or suspicion of other corruption.

Coronation
the tenth.

The first act of this new pope was his coronation, which was represented according to the vage of his predecessors in the church of saint John de Lateran. The pompe was so great both of his familie and his court, and also of the prelates and multitudes that were there, together with the popular and vniuersall assemblies of people, that by the opinion and iudgement of men, the pride and maiestie of that action did farre surpasse all the celebrations done in Rome since the tyrannies of the Goths and sauage nations. In this same solemnitie the Consalon of the church was caried by Alfonso de Este, who hauing obtained a suspension of his censures & paines, was come to Rome, with great hope, that by the clemencie and facilitie of the pope, he should be able to compound for his affaires. The Consalon of the religion of Rhodes was borne by Iulio de Medicis mounted vpon a statelie courser armed at all points: by his nature he bare an inclination to the profession of armes; but by destinie he was drawen to the life ecclesiastike, in which estate he made serue as a wonderfull example of the variation of fortune.

One matter that made the memoire of that date wonderfull, was this consideration; that the person who then in so high & rare pompe was honozed with the most supreme and soveraigne dignitie of the world, was the päre before, and on the verie same date miserable made prisoner. The great magnificence that appeared vpon his person, and his expences, confirmed in the generalitie and multitude of men, the expectation that was had of him; euerie one promising that Rome should be happye under a pope so plentifullie indued with the vertue of liberalitie, whereof that date he had given an honozable experience, his expences being aboue an hundred thousand duckats. But wise men desired in him a greater grauitie and moderation: they iudged that neither such a maiestie of pompe was conuenient for popes, neither did the condition of the present time require, that he should so vnprophitablely disperse the treasures that had bene gathered by his predecessour to other viles.

concluded.

The vessell of amitie betwene the king of England & the French being first broched by this popes letters, the French king by an herald at armes sent to the king of England, requiring of him a safe conduct for his ambassadoys, which should come to intreat for a peace and attonement to be concluded betwixt them and their realmes. Upon grant obtained thereof, the French king sent a commission with the president of Rome and others, to intreat of peace and alliance betwixt both the princes. And moreover, because they understood that the marriage was broken betwene the prince of Castile and the ladie Marie, they desired that the said ladie might be ioined in marriage with the French king, offering a great dowrie and forties for the same. So much was offered, that the king moued by his counsell, and named by Wolsey the bishop of Lincolne, consented vpon condition, that if the French king died, then the should, if it stood with his pleasure, returne into England againe with all his dowrie and riches.

After that they were accorded vpon a full peace, and that the French king should marrie this young ladie, the indentures were drawen, ingrossed, & sealed, and peace therevpon proclaimed the seventh daie of August; & the king in presence of the French ambassadoys was swoorne to keepe the same: and likewise there was an ambassage sent out of England to see the French king sweare the same. The dowrie that was assigned vnto the bride to be receiued after his husbands decesse, if she suruiued him, was named to be 320000 crownes of yearelie reuenues, & to be receiued out of certeing lands assigned for that purpose during all his naturall life. And moreover, it was further agreed & couenanted, that the French king should content and paie yearelie vnto king Henrie, during the space of five yeares, the summe of one hundred thousand crownes. By conclusion of this peace was the duke of Longue with the other prisoners deliuered, paying their ransoms, and the said duke assied the ladie Marie in the name of his maiester king Elwes.

In September following the said ladie was conueied to Douer by the king his brother & the queene, and on the second daie of October she was shipped, and such as were appointed to giue their attendance on her, as the duke of Suffolke, the marquesse Dorset, the bishop of Durham, the earle of Surreie, the lord de la Ware, the lord Berners, the lord Pontefract, the four brethren of the said marques, sir Maurice Berkeley, sir John Pechie, sir William Sands, sir Thomas Willeine, sir John Car, and manie other knights, esquires, gentlemen and ladies. They had not sailed past a quarter of the sea, but that the wind arose and seuered the ships, diuining some of them to Calis, some into Flanders, and his ship with great difficultie was brought to Bullen not without great seopardie at the entering of the haven, for the maiester ran the ship hard on shoze.

But the boats were readie, and receiued the ladie out of the ship, and sir Christopher Gurnith stood in the water and toke her in his armes, and so caried her to land, where the duke of Wandolme, and a cardinall, with manie other great estates receiued her with great honor. From Bullen with easie iourneis she was conueied vnto Abulle, & there entered the eighth of October [where she was receiued by the Dolphin with great honor, she was apparelled in cloth of siluer, her hoshie was trapped in goldsmiths worke be-ric richlie. After her followed 6 ladies all their palfries trapped with crimsin velvet emboidered. After them followed one chariot of cloth of tisse, the second cloth of gold, & the third crimsin velvet emboidered with the kings armes & hers, full of roses. After them followed a great number of archers, and then wagons laden with their stuffe. Great was the riches in plate, iewels, monie, apparell, and hangings that this ladie brought into France.]

On the morrow following being mondaie, and s. Denise day, the marriage was solemnized betwixt the French king and the said ladie, with all honour, joy, & roialtie, both apparelled in goldsmiths worke. Then a great banquet and sumptuous feast was made, where the English ladies were honozable interlined, according to the dignitie of the persons, and to the contentment of them that had no deges of malice or mistaking settled in their hearts. For vnpossible it is, that in a great multitude meeting together, though all about one matter, be it of pleasure and delight, there should not be one of a repugnant disposition, and (though not apparantie perceived) travelling with grudge, malignant mind; as we see some apples vnperished and other some wormeaten, albeit one bough beare them, and one tree giue them sap. cers with the said queene, were discharged, which was a great sorrow for them, for some had served hir long in hope of preferment, & some that had honest comes left them to serve hir, and now they were without service, which caused them to take thought, in so much some died by the waie returning, and some fell mad, but there was no remedie. After the English lords had done their commission, the French king willed them to take no longer paine, and so gaue to the god rewards; and they took their leaue of the queene and returned. Then the Dolphin of France called lord Francis duke of Valois, and by his wife duke of Britaine, for the more honour of this marriage before the Englishmen departed from Abouille, caused a solemne iusts to be proclaimed, which should be kept at Paris in the moneth of Nouember next ensuing.

Amelie, that he with his nine aids should answer all comers, being gentlemen of name and of armes. First to run five courtes at the tilt with pe-ces of aduantage, & also five courtes at random with sharpe speares, and twelue strokes with sharpe swords; and that done, he and his aids to fight at the barriers with all gentlemen of name and of armes.
First for foines with hand speares, and after that eight strokes to the most aduantage if the speare so long held, and after that twelue strokes with the sword: and if anie man be vnbossed or felled with fighting on foot, then his houlle and armour to be rendered to the officers of armes: and euerie man of this chalenge must set up his armes and name vpon an arch triumphant, which shalbe made at the place where the iusts shalbe, and further shall write to what point he will answer, to one or to all.

When this proclamation was reported in England by the noble men that returned from the ma-riage: the duke of Suffolke, the marquesse Dorset, and his four brethren, the lord Clinton, Sir Edward Penell, Sir Giles Capell, Thomas Cheney, and other sued to the king to be at the chalenge, which request he gracionlie granted. Then the lords and knights prepared all things necessarie for their en-terpryse, and shipped there houlles and harnesse, and did so much by tourneie, that they came to Paris at the end of October, which were hartlie welcomed of the king and the Dolphin: but most of all of the French queene which then late at saint Denise, and was not yet crowned nor entered into Paris. The Dolphin desired the duke of Suffolke and the lord marquesse Dorset, to be two of his immediat aids, which thereto assented.

Wherefore was erected an arch of widdnesse at the tornels beside the street of saint Anthoine, breacilie before the bassell, on the which were set four targets or scutchions, the one silver, and he that set his name vnder that shield, to run at tilt according to the articles. He that put his name vnder the golden target should run with the sharpe speares and fight with sharpe swords. They that put their names to the blacked shield, should fight on foot with speares and swords for the one hand. And he that touched the sa-nie shield should cast a speare on foot with a target on his arme, and after to fight with a two hand sword.
On this arch aboue stood the armes of the king & the queene, and beneath them stood the armes of the Dolphin and his aids, and underneath stood the four scutchions that you haue heard of, and vnder them all the armes and names of such as set their names to anie of the said four scutchions.

While all these things were preparing, the ladie Marie of England the first daie of Nouember, then being iudaie, was with great solemnitie crowned queene of France in the monastrie of S. Denise, and the Dolphin all the season held the crowne ouer his head, because it was of great weight to his greeuance, at which coronation were the lords of England, all according to their degrees well intertel-ned. On mondaie the first daie of Nouember, the said queene was receiued into the citie of Paris after the order that followeth. First the gard of the citie met with hir without saint Denise all in coats of goldsmiths worke, with ships gilt, and after them met hir all the priests and religious, esteemed to be three thousand. The queene was in a chaire couered about (but not ouer hir person) in white cloth of gold; the horses that drew it, in cloth of gold; on hir head a coronall all of great pearles, hir necke and brest full of iewels.

Before hir went a gard of Almans after their fashion, and after them all noblemen, as the Dolphin, the duke of Alanson, the duke of Bourbon, the duke of Wandosme, the duke of Longeuille, and the duke of Suffolke, the marquesse Dorset, five cardinals, and a great number of estates; about hir person rode the kings gard, which were Scots. Thus was this queene receiued into Paris, and so conueied to the cathedraall church, and there offered, & from thence to the palace, where she offered at the holie chappell; and from thence she went to hir lodging for that night: for whome was provided a great supper, and the heralds cried a largesse, and had to them giuen a ship of silver and gilt, and other plate, to the value of two hundred marks, and after supper began dancing and pastime. On the morrow began the iusts, and the Dolphin with his aids entered the field, the apparell and barbs were cloth of gold, cloth of silver, and crimsin velvet kanteled together all in one sute, they shewed themselves before the king and queene, who were on a goodlie stage, and the queene said so that all men might see hir, and wondered at hir beautie: but the king was feeble & laie on a couch for weakenesse.

Then entered the counter part by a raille for combing the place. These iusts continued three daies, in the which were answered three hundred and five men of armes, and euerie man ran five courtes, and with sharpe speares; bluerse were slain & not spoken of.
At the random and turneie the duke of Suffolke hurt a gentleman, so that he was like to die. The Marques Dorset stroke monsieur Grue an Albanois with his speare, peried his headpiece, and put him in iecopardie. The duke of Suffolke in the turneie ouerthrew a man of armes, houlle & man; and so did the lord Mar-quesse another, and yet the Frenchmen would in no wise praise them. At this turneie the Dolphin was hurt in the hand, so that he could not performe his chalenge at the barriers, and put one of his aid in his roume. The next daie after began the fight at the barriers. And because the Dolphin was not present, the duke of Suffolke and the lord Marques Dorset that daie began the field, and took the barriers with speares in his hand abiding all comers.

The Dolphin brought a man secretlie, which in all the court of France was the tallest & the strongest man, and he was an Alman, and put him in the place of an other person to haue had the duke of Suffolke rebuked. The same great Alman came to the bars sterrelie with face hid, because he would not be knowne, and bare his speare to the duke of Suffolke with all his strength, and the duke him receiued and for all his strength put him by strong strokes from the barriers, and with the but end of the speare strake the Alman that he staggered: but for all that the Alman strake stronglie and hardlie at the duke, and the iudges suffered manie more strokes to be foughten than were appointed; but when they saw the Alman reele and stagger, then they let fall the raille betwene them. The lord marquesse Dorset at the same time, even at the same barre fought with a gentleman of France that he lost his speare, and in maner withdrew. When the raille was let fall, these two noble men put by their visers and toke aite, and with swoords, the points and edges abated, they came to the barriers.

The duke foiles the Alman,

The Alman fought sore with the duke, which imagined that he was a person set on for the nonce, but the duke by pure strength toke him about the necke, and pomeled him so about the head that the bloud issued out of his nose, and then they were parted, and the Alman was conuected by the Dolphin least he should be knowne. These two noblemen of England that daie fought valiantlie diuerse feats, and the Frenchmen likewise noblie them defended. But it happened the lord Marquesse on a time to put for his aid his yongest brother called the lord Edward Greie of the age of nineteene yeare, and to him was put a gentleman of France of great stature and strength, to the intent to plucke him ouer the barres, but yet the yong lord was of such strength, power, & policie, that he so stroke his aduersarie that he disarmed him, all the face bare. Thus were these enterprises finished to the land of all parties, & the Englishmen receiued much honoz and no spot of rebuke, yet they were pitulie set at & in manie ieopardies.

For the declaration of this triumph, he that saw it can tell how goodlie the couriers trotted, bounded, and quicklie turned: how valiantlie the men of armes behaued themselves, and how the duke of Burbons band was apparrelled and balled in fatunie beluet, and cloth of siluer clondie, the band of the earle of saint Paule apparrelled and barded in purple beluet all to cut on purple sattin, the infant of Arragon, sonne to Frederike last king of Naples, and his band all in cloth of gold and siluer paled. This lord was but yong, but yet verie toward. The duke of Gandouine and his band in cloth of gold and plauket beluet. The Dolphin and his aids were euerie daie new apparrelled at his cost, one daie in siluer and gold, another in crimsin beluet and yelow beluet, and another daie in white beluet and greene, some daie mixed with sattin, some daie embroidered, some daie pounced with gold, and so euerie daie in change as the workes fantasie could deuise, but the Englishmen had euer on their apparrell red crosses to be knowne for loue of their countrie.

At this triumph the countie Galeas came into the place on a genet trapped in blew sadden, and he himselfe likewise apparrelled, and ran a course with a speare, which was at the head five inches on euerie side square, that is twentie inches about, and at the butt nine inches square, that is six and thirtie inches, this speare was massie timber, and yet for all that he ran cleane with it a long course and slightlie avoided it to his great honour. Also there was another gentleman called Antonie Bounarime, which came into the field all armed, and on his bodie brought in eight ten speares, that is to wit, three speares set in euerie stirrop forward, and vnder euerie thigh two speares backward, and the tenth in his hand; and when he came before the queene, he let his horse run, and neuer stopped till he had taken euerie speare after another and broken it on the ground, and he neuer stopped his horse till all were broken. This gentleman was highlie praised, and so he was worthy. When all this great triumph was done, the lords of England toke their leaue, and were highlie thanked of the king, queene, Dolphin, and all the lords, and so departed and came into England before Christmas. In Nouember the queene was deliuered of a prince which liued not long after.]

Touthing the accord of peace betwene England and France, you shall heare the report of Guicciardine, which to this place maketh passage to knowledge, as sile giurth maintenance of light to the lampe. [At the first opening of this practice for peace, there fell out manie difficulties, for that the king of England demanded Bullongne in Picardie, with a great summe of monie: but at last all the differences fell vpon the towne of Lozmaie, the king of England struing to retaine it, and the French obiecing some difficultie: in so much as the king of England dispatched in post to the French king the bishop of Tricarco, whome he charged, without imparting in what nature of particularitie considered the difficultie, to declare to the king from him, that in regard of so great a benefit, he should not stand vpon so manie subtle difficulties, but to consider that in a prince reason should heare more imperie than passion.

The French king, because he would neither do wrong to his crowne, nor ill content his people, the towne of Lozmaie being verie noble and tollall to the crowne of France, caused the matter to be debated in full counsell, wherein was an assistance of the principals of his court, who advised him with one voice to embrace peace, yea vnder the condition offered. And yet in that time the king catholike did what he could to breake it, offering the king manie plots and deuises, but speciallie to minister to him all his means and fauours to conquer the duchie of Spillan. But the answer being returned into England, that the French king stood content with the resolution of Lozmaie, the peace succeeded & was concluded in the beginning of August betwene the two kings during their liues, & a yeare after their death.

In the capitulation it was expessed, that Lozmaie should remaine to the king of England, to whom the French king should paie six hundred thousand crownes, and that in such sort of distribution, that the French king should make payment of an hundred thousand frankis euerie yeare, untill the full payment was satisfied: that they should be bound to defend their estates mutuallie and reciprocally with ten thousand footmen if the warre went by land, and with six thousand onelie if the warre were made by sea: that the French king should be bound to serue the king of England in all his affaires with twelue hundred lances, and the king of England likewise to minister to his seruices with ten thousand footmen: the expenses to be defraied by either of them that should haue need of the men: both the one and the other of them named the Scotish king, the archduke, & the empre: but Cesar and the king catholiks were not named: the Switzers had a nomination, but it bare a condition, that whosoener would defend against the French king, the estate of Spillan. Venes, or Als, should be excluded out of the nomination.

This peace, which was made with a wonderfull readinesse, was confirmed by the marriage of the kings sister of England with the French king, vnder condition, that he should acknowledge to haue receiued foure hundred thousand crownes for his dowrye: the contract of handfastings were made in England, where the king catholiks ambassadoz was not in presence, for the great hatred the king of England bare to the king his master. And euen vpon the conclusion and resolution of this peace, came to the court of France the instrument of ratification which Cesar had made, together with his commission, and the king catholiks, for conclusion of the marriage that was solicited betwene Ferdinando de Austria and the second daughter of France not yet foure yeares of age: but the practice of that marriage vanished presentlie by reason of the peace that was now established: and the French king to satisfie better the king of England, gave order that the duke of Suffolke, capitaine generall of the lance knights that were in his paie, should depart the dominions of France, in whome the honours and recompenses compenseth that the king made to him, overcame all occasions of discontentment, the bountie and liberallie of the one being no greater than the affabilitie and disposition of the other.]

In December, one Richard Hun a merchant tailor of London, that was laid in Lollards tower by commandment of the bishop of London, called Richard Fitz James, and his chancelor doctor Hozie, was found dead, hanging by the necke in a girdle of silke within the said tower. That ye male understand the cause of his imprisonment, the beginning was this. The same Hun had a child that died in his house, being an infant; the curat claimed the bearing of it for a mortuarie. Hun answered, that the infant had no propertie in the sheet. Whereupon, the prelat ascerted him in the spirituall court. He taking to him counsell, sued the curat in a prementie: and when this was knowne, meanes was found, that Hun being accused of heresie, was attached, and laid in Lollards tower, where he was found dead, as ye have heard. Such adu was made about his death, for the bishop and the chancelor said, that he hanged himselfe.

But manie of the tempozaillie affirmed, that he was murdered, greatlie lamenting the case: for he was well beloved, and namelie of the poe, which cried out against them that were suspected to haue made him awaie. He was a good almes-man, and greatly releued the needie. The question of his death was so farre put forth, that upon the suspicion he should be murdered, twelve men were charged before the coroner. After they had taken view of the bodie, the same was burned in Smithfield by the bishopps appointment: notwithstanding the coroners quest indicted doctor Hozie, with one John Spalding, otherwile called Belringer, and Charles Fogges the summoner of the murdered; howbeit, upon his arraignment, through great sute and corruption of monie (as manie iudged) the kings attorneie declared doctor Hozie not to be giltye.

This Christmasse on Newyears night, the king, the duke of Suffolke, & two other were in mantels of cloath of siluer lined with blew velvet, the siluer was pounst in letters that the velvet might be seene thorough, the mantels had great capes like to the portingall hoods, and all their hosen, dublets, and coats were of the same fashyon cut, and of the same stuffe. With them were foure ladies in gowns, after the fashon of Sauoie, of blew velvet, lined with cloath of gold, the velvet all cut, and mantels like tipets knit together all of siluer, and on their heads bonets of burned gold, the foure torch-bearers were in sattin white and blew. This strange apparell pleased much euerie person, and in especiall the queene. And thus these foure lords & foure ladies came into the queenes chamber with great light of torches, and danced a great season, and then put off their visors, and were all well knowne, and then the queene hartlie thanked the kings grace for hir goodlie pastime and dispos.

Likewile on the Twelue night, the king and the queene came into the hall of Greenwich, & suddenlie entered a tent of cloath of gold; and before the tent stood foure men of armes, armed at all points with swordes in their hands; and suddenlie with noyse of trumpets entered foure other persons all armed, and ran to the other foure, and there was a great and a fierce fight. And suddenlie came out of a place like a wood eight wildmen, all appareled in greene molle, made with leued silke, with ouglie weapons & terrible visages, and there fought with the knights eight to eight; and after long fighting, the armed knights drove the wild men out of their places, and followed the chase out of the hall: and when they were departed, the tent opened, and there came out six lords and six ladies richlie appareled, and danced a great time: when they had danced their pleasure, they entered the tent againe, which was conueied out of the hall; then the king & the queene were serued with a right sumptuous banquet.

On the third day of February, the king made a solemne iusts, and he and the marquesse Dorset would answer all comers, their apparell and barres were of blew velvet and cloath of siluer, all to cut in subtil knots, richlie embroidered, all the scrutours in white & blew silke. The counterpart, which were foure, seene in number, richlie appareled in velvet, cloath of gold, and embroidery, euerie man after his owne devise. The king was that date highlie to be praised, for he brake thre and twentie speares beside atteints and bare downe to ground a man of armes and his horse: the lord marquesse and all other did ballantlie, and had much praise, for euerie man did passing well, which is selde seene in such a case. But the king for a suertie excused all other.

On the fourth date of October, the king removed to Lambeth, and on the morow began the high court of parlement, sir Thomas Speuill was then speaker. In this parlement were diuerse acts made, but in especiall two, which were much spoken of: the one was the act of apparell, and the other act for labourers: of these two acts was much communing, and much businesse arose. For the labourers would in no wise labour by the date, but all by taske & in great, and therefore much trouble fell in the countrie, and in especiall in harvest time, for then husbandmen could scarce get workemen to helpe in their harvest. This parlement continued untill Easter, in the which diuerse subsidies were granted to the king, toward his great costs and charges that he had bene at in his viage roiall to France.

After Easter the nineteenth date of the moneth of Aprill, the king deliting to set forth yong gentlemen, called Nicholas Carew, and Francis Winton, and caused diuerse other yong gentlemen to be on the counterpart, and lent to them horse and harness to incourage all youth to seeke deeds of armes. This yeare died at Rome by poison (as was reported) the archbishop of Poike and cardinall, called doctor Benbrike, who was the kings ambassadour there: this was a wiseman and of a tollie courage. The king then gaue the said archbishop like to Thomas Wolle, then bishop of Lincolne, who at that time bare all the rule about the king, and what he said was obeyed in all places. Now when he was once archbishop, he studied daie and night how to be a cardinall, and caused the king, and the French king to write to Rome for him, and at their request he obtained his purpose, as you shall heare afterward.

At this time was much communing, and verelie (as it appeared) it was intended, that the king in person would passe the sea to Calis, and there on the marches of the same, the French king and queene to come and see the king their brother: and for the same iournie manie coslie woorks were wrought, much rich apparell provided, and much preparation made against the next spring; but death which is the last end of all things let this iournie. For before the next spring the French king died at the cite of Paris, the first date of Januarie, when he had bene married to the faire ladie Marie of England foure scoze and two daies (whom he so feruentlie loued, that he gaue himselfe ouer to behold too much hir excellent beautie bearing then but eightene yeares of age, nothing considering the proportion of his owne yeares, nor his decayed complexion; so that he fell into the rage of a feauer, which drawing to it a sudden stup, ouer came in one instant the life, that nature gaue ouer to preferue anie longer. He was a king iust & much beloued of his people, but touching his condition, neither before he was king, nor after he had the crowne he neuer found constancie nor stabilitie in either fortune.

For, rising from a small duke of Orleans with great happinesse to the crowne, and that by the death of Charles yonger than he, and two of his sonnes, he conquered with a verie great facilitie the duchie of Millan and the kingdome of Naples, and almost all the residue of the regions of Italie, being gouerned for manie yeares by his direction: he recovered with a verie great prosperitie, the state of Genes that was in rebellion: and vanquished with no lesse glorie the armie of the Venetians, being in person at both those victories. But on the other side, euen when he was in his youth and best disposition of bodie, he was then constrained by king Lewes the eleuenth to marrie his daughter that was both barren and deformed; and yet could neuer get the good will nor countenance of his father in law.

And after his death, such was the greatnesse of the laue of Warbon, that he could neuer get the institution of the new king, being then in minority, being almost compelled to retire himselfe into Brittain: where being taken in the battell of saint Aubin, he liued two yeares in the calamitie of a prisoner. To these afflictions maie be added the sieg and famine of Pauarte, the manie discomfites he had in the realme of Naples, the losse of the estate of Millan, Genes, and all the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: and lastlie the greuous warre he had in France against verie mightie enemies, his eyes beholding into what lamentable perills his realme was brought: neuertheless, before he died it seemed he had conquered all his aduersities, and fortune shewed good tokens of his reconciliation, both for that he had defended his kingdome against mightie enemies, and also established a perpetuall peace and alliance with the king of England, with whom by how much his amitie was great and assured, by so much it gaue him hope to be able to reconquer the duchie of Millan.]

The king of England being aduertised of the French kings death, caused a solemne obsequie to be kept for him in the cathedra church of S. Paule, with a costlie hearfe: at which manie nobles were present. After this he sent a letter to comfort the queene his sister, requiring to know hir pleasure, whether she would continue still in France, or returne into England. And when he was aduertised of hir mind (which was to returne into England) the duke of Suffolke, sir Richard Wingfield deputie of Calis, and doctor West, with a goodlie band of gentlemen and yeomen, all in blacke, were sent into France, and comming to Paris, were well receiued of the new French king, Francis the first of that name [who was the next heire male of the blood roiall and of the same line of the dukes of Orleans: he was preferred to the succession of the kingdome before the daughters of the dead king by vertue and disposition of the law Salike, a law verie ancient in the realme of France, which excludeth from the roiall dignitie all women; so long as there is anie issue male of the same line,

The world had such a hope in his vertues, and such an opinion of his magnanimitie, and such a conceipt of his iudgement and wit, that euerie one confessed, that of verie long time there was none raised by to the crowne with a greater expectation. He was made the more agreeable to the families of men, by the consideration of his age bearing then but two and twentie yeares; his excellent stature and proportion of bodie, his great liberalitie, and generall hu-manitie, together with the ripe knowledge he had in manie things. But speciallie he pleased greatly the nobilitie, to whom he transferred manie singular and great fauours. Unto this king Francis de Angouleme did the foresaid English nobilitie declare the effect of their commission, which was to receiue the queene Dowager, according to the contents of the marriage.]

The counsell of France (by the kings appointment) assigned forth hir dowrie, and the duke of Suffolke put in officers, and then was the queene deliuered to the duke by indenture, who behaued himselfe so towards hir, that he obtained hir good will to be hir husband. It was thought, that when the king created him duke of Suffolke, he perceiued his sisters good will towards the said duke; and that he meant then to haue bestowed hir vpon him; but that a better offer came in the waie. But howsoeuer it was now, he won hir loue; so as by hir consent, he wrote to the king hir brother, meekelie beseeching him of pardon in his request, which was humble to desire him of his good will and contentation.

The king at the first said, but after long sute, and speciallie by meane of the French queene his selfe, and other the dukes friends, it was agreed that the duke should bring hir into England vnmarrried, and at his returne to marrie hir in England: but for doubt of change he married hir secretly in Paris at the house of Clugnie, as was said. After he had receiued hir with hir dower appointed, & all hir apparell, iewels, and household stuffe deliuered, they toke leaue of the new French king, and so passing thorough France, came to Calis; where she was honourable interteined, and after openlie married with great honour vnto the said duke of Suffolke. Doctor West (as then nominated bishop of Elie) remained behind at Paris, to go thorough with the full conclusion of a new league betwixt the king of England, and the new French king.

The court lieng at Grénewich, the king and the queene, accompanied with manie lords and ladies, rood to the high ground of Shoters hill to take the open aire; and as they passed by the waie, they espied a companie of tall yeomen, clothed all in greene with greene hoods, and bowes and arrowes, to the number of two hundred. Then one of them, which called himselfe Robin hode, came to the king, desiring him to see his men shot; and the king was content. Then he whistled, and all the two hundred archers shot and lofed at once; and then he whistled againe, and they likewise shot againe; their arrowes whistled by craft of the head, so that the noise was strange and great, and much pleased the king, the queene, and all the companie. All these archers were of the kings garde, and had thus apparelled themselves to make solace to the king.

Then Robin hode desired the king and queene to come into the greene wood, and to see how the outlawes liued. The king demanded of the queene a hit ladies, if they durst aduenture to go into the wood with so manie outlawes. When the queene said, that if it pleased him she was content. Then the homes blew, till they came to the wood vnder Shoters hill, & there was an arbor made of boughes with a hall, and a great chamber; and an inner chamber verie well made and covered with flowers & sweet hearbs, which the king much praised. Then said Robin hode; Sir, outlawes breakfasts is venison, and therefore you must be content with such fare as we vse. When the king and queene sat downe, and were serued with venison and wine by Robin hode and his men, to their great contentation.

Then the king departed and his companie, and Robin hode and his men them conducted; and as they were

Three of two were returning, there met with them two ladies in a rich chariot drawn with five horses, and every horse had his name on his head, and on every horse sat a lady with his name written. On the first courser called Cande, sat Humidite, or Humide. On the second courser called Spemcon road ladie Mer. On the third called Pheton sat ladie Vegetive. On the fourth called Limphon sat ladie Pleasant. On the fifth called Lampace sat sweet Odour. And in the chaire sat ladie Paic, accompanied with ladie Floza, richlie apparelled, and they saluted the king with diuerse goodlie songs, and so brought him to Crænewich. At this making was a great number of people to behold it to their great solace and comfort.

The same after none, the king, the duke of Suffolk, the marquess Dorset, and the earle of Essex, their barbes and bases of greene velvet and cloth of gold, came into the field on great coursers, on whom waited diuerse gentlemen in like of the same colour. On the other side entered sirtene lords and gentlemen, all apparelled richlie after their deuises, and so valiantlie they ran their courses appointed: after that, they ran volant one as fast as he might overtake another, which was a goodlie sight to see: and when all was done they departed, and went to a goodlie banquet. This summer the king took his progress westward, and visited his townes and castles there, and heard the complaints of his poore communitie, and ever as he roode he hunted and liberalie departed with venison.]

This yeare in September, the king being at his manour of Oving, after his returne from his progress which he made that yeare into the west parts, the archbishop of Yorke came thither to him. Whilste he sojourned there, a letter was brought to the said archbishop from Rome, aduertising him that he was elected cardinall, which letter incontinentlie he shewed to the king, disabling himselfe in wordes, though his intent was otherwise; and so the king did incourage him, and willed him to take that dignitie upon him, and called him from thenceforth my lord cardinall. But his hat, bull, nor other ceremonies were not yet come. In Nouember, the king assembled his high court of parlement at Westminster, wherein, diuerse acts made in the first yeare were reformed and altered, and especiallie the act of apparell, and the act of labourers, as by the booke of statutes more plainelie appereth.

At the end of this parlement, doctor Warham archbishop of Cantuarie, and as then lord chancellor, perceiving how the new lord cardinall medled further in his office of chancelorship than he could well suffer, except he should aduenture the kings displeasure; for this and for other considerations gave up his office of chancelor into the kings hands, and deliuered to him the great seale, which incontinentlie was deliuered by the king vnto the lord cardinall, and so was he made lord chancellor. He was no longer in that office, but he directed forth commissions into euerie shire, for the execution of the statutes of apparell and labourers, and in all his doings shewed himselfe more losse and presumptuous than became him. And he himselfe on a daie called a gentleman named Simon Fitz Richard, and took from him an old lacket of crimsin velvet and diuerse hatches, which extreme doing caused him greatlie to be hated; and by his example manie cruel officers for malice euill intreated diuerse of the kings subiects, in so much that one skining, mayor of Rochester, set a young man on the pillorie for wearing of a riuen or gathered shirt.]

In the end of Nouember, the cardinals hat was sent into England, which the gentlemen of Kent received, and brought to London with such triumph, as though the greatest prince in Europe had bene come to visit the king [much like that of the people at Rome in the yeare 1515, when were scene in the said citie two elephants, a nature of creatures which happlie had not bene scene in Italie since the triumphs and publike plaies of the Romans. Emanuel king of Portugall sent to pope Leo the tenth a verie honorable ambassage, and withall presented him with these huge and statelie elephants, which his ships had brought by sea from India; their entring into Rome was celebrated with a verie great course of people, some wondering at the strange forme and stature of the beasts, some marrelling to what uses their nature inclined them, and some conjecturing the respects and purposes of such a present, their ignorance making their wonder farre greater than their reason.]

No lesse adu was there at the bringing of the cardinals hat, who on a sundae (in St. Peters church at Westminster) received the same, with the habit, the pillar, and other such tokens of a cardinall. And now that he was thus a perfect cardinall, he looked about all estates, which purchased him great hatred and disdaine on all sides. For his ambition was no lesse discernable to the eyes of the people, than the sunne in the firmament in a clere and cloudlesse summer daie; which procured against him the more hatred among the noble and popular sort; for that his base linage was both noted and knowne, in so much that his insatiable aspiring to supereminent degrees of dignitie kindled manifest contempt and detestation among such as pretended a countenance of god will and honorable dutie vnto him, though in verie deed the same parties (if freelie and without cheeke they might haue spoken their fanthe) would haue intitled him a proud popeling; as led with the like spirit of swelling ambition, wherewith the table of popes haue bene bladder like puffed and blowne up: a diuelish and luciferian vice, in the iudgements of men abominable, and in the sight of God most damnable; as the poet in this dishon tralie witnesseth:

Dij superi fastum, fastum mortales abhorrent,

Ha homini leuitas displicet atque Deo.

After the end of the parlement, sir Edward Poynings laboured to be discharged of the keeping of Rozaie, because he could not haue health there: and so he was discharged, and sir William Blunt lord Mountjoy was sent thither to haue that roome, and for marshall was appointed sir Sampson Bozton. Incontinentlie vpon their coming thither chanced a great riot, raised by the souldiers, so that to appeale them, the lord Mountjoy was put in jeopardy of his life. In conclusion, to quiet them sir Sampson Bozton was banished the towne for ever, but what the matter was I haue not found rehearsed by anie writer. After that the citie was appealed, and euerie thing thought to be forgotten, diuerse of the offenders were executed, and diuerse banished the towne, some fled, and were confined both out of England and the towne.

After the parlement was ended, the king kept a solempne Christmase at his manor of Eltham; and on the Twelue night in the hall was made a goodlie castell, wonderouslie set out; and in it certeine ladies and knights, and when the king and queene were set, in came other knights and assailed the castell, where manie a good stripe was giuen; and at the last the assailants were beaten awaie. And then issued out knights and ladies out of the castell, which ladies were rich and strangelie disguised: for all their apparell was in braids of gold, set with mooring spangles of silver and gilt, set on crimsin sattin hose and not fastned: the mens apparell of the same sute made like Julis of Hungarie; and the ladies heads and third was kept in the lord treasurers chamber beside the starr chamber, and the fourth at the rols at the after none. These courts were greatlie haunted for a time: but at the last the people perceiued that much delaie was vsed in these courts, and few matters ended, and when they were ended, they bound no man by the law, then euerie man was werie of them and resorted to the common law.

It was strange to see the cardinal (a man not skilled in the laws) sit in the seat of iudgement and pronounce the law, being aided at the first by such as (according to the ancient custome) did sit as associats with him: but he would not sticke to determine sundry causes, neither rightlie decided nor adiudged by order of law. And againe, such as were cleare cases, he would sometime prohibit the same to passe, call them into iudgement, frame an order in controuer-sies, and punish such as came with vntrue surmises afore the iudges, & sharpelie repproue the negligence of the iudges themselves, which had receiued such surmises, and not well considered of the controuer-sies of the parties. And such was the administration of the cardinal vnder a colour of iustice at the first: but because the same seemed at length to be but a vertis shadow or colour in deed, it quicklie banished awaie, he taking vpon him the whole rule himselfe, for that he saw the king made small account of anie other but onlie of him.

Whereby it came to passe, that manie of the pères and high estates of the realme withdrew them from the court; as first the archbishop of Canturburie, and the bishop of Winchester, which got them home into their diocesses. But yet before their departure (as good fathers of their countrie) they instantlie besought the king that he would not suffer anie seruant to exceed and passe his maister: hoping that sentence out of the gospell of saint John, where our Sa-uiour speaking to his disciples, saith to them, Where-lie, verelie, I say vnto you, the seruant is not greater than his maister. Wherevnto the king, knowing that they meant this by the cardinal, made this answer, That he would diligentlie see, that euerie seruant should obeye, and not command. But the cardinal notwithstanding (during the time of his flattering felicitie) held out, thinking to come to be countermanded; behauing himselfe more like a prince, than a prelat, so blinded was he with vaine glorie, and drunken with the transitorie delights of the world: obliuious to the permanent ioies of heauen, as the poet saith:

Delicias mundi fragiles qui mente sequitur, Perdidit aeterni certissima gaudia cali.

After this, the duke of Suffolke departed home into his countrie, and last of all the duke of Suffolke also followed the other. For he hauing spent liberal-lie in his iournies when he went as ambassadoe into France, also in the solemnization of his marriage, and in housekeeping since he was married, borrowed great summes of monie of the king, which he hoped should haue bene forgiven him: but the cardinal would not haue it so, to the intent that the duke being behind hand in debt, should be the more at commandement. For as wealth maketh men lottie, so debt want make them lowlie. In the moneth of October, in this eight yeare of king Henrie, at that time bishop of Sion or Sittin, a cardinal commonlie called the cardinal of the Switzes, came into England from the emperor Maximilian.

At the contemplation of this cardinal, the king lent to the emperor a great summe of monie. But the chiefest matter that moued the king to be so free to Maximilian, was because the same monie should be employed on men of warre against the French king, towards whome the king (or rather cardinal Wolfeie) of late had conceived a grudge, as thus.

True it is, that the king bestowed the reuenues of the see of Coznaie vpon the cardinal, at that time that he came into the kings hands: and therefore the cardinal being desirous to assure to himselfe the same, made late to the French king, that he would prouide Guillard the former bishop of Coznaie of some other bishopricke in France, so that he might resigne the bishopricke of Coznaie clearelie into his hands. The French king, perceiuing how much this should make against his purpose, that vpon occasion hoped euer to recouer the possession of Coznaie, would not gratifie the cardinal herein.

Wherevpon the cardinal turning the kings mind at his pleasure, perswaded him, that the next way to abate the French kings puissance (which in the beginning of his reigne had recouered Milan, and grew euerie daie in power more than other) should be to mainteine the emperor with monie against him, so as the Frenchmen should be chastised without the travell of him or his people. Wherevpon was Richard Dale sent first into Germanie with a great summe of monie to wage the Switzes, which vnder the conduct of the emperor Maximilian inuaded the duchie of Milan; but without anie great gaine returned from thence, leaving Milan in the Frenchmens hands at that time. And now for a new reliefe was this cardinal of Sion sent from Milan, at whose instance monie was assigned to be deliuered, and certaine Genowates undertooke the exchange, which made not payment thereof at the day, although they had receiued it of the king.

In this yeare the king kept his Christmasse at his manor of Greenwich, & on the Twelue night, according to the old custome, he and the queene came into the hall: and when they were set, and the queene of Scots also, there entered into the hall a garden arti-ficiall, called the garden of Esperance. This garden was towred at euerie corner, and railed with railles gilt, all the banks were set with flowers artificiall of silke and gold, the leaues cut of greene sattin, so that they seemed verie flowers. In the midst of this garden was a pillar of antique worke, all gold set with pearles and stones; and on the top of the pillar, which was six square, was a lower or an arch em-bowed, crowned with gold: within which stood a bush of roses red and white, all of silke and gold, and a bush of pomegranats of like stuffe. In this garden walked six knights, and six ladies richlie apparelled; and then they descended and danced manie goodlie dances, and so ascended the garden againe, and were conueied out of the hall, and then the king was serued of a great banquet. After this Christmasse the king exercised himselfe much in hauking.

This yeare, and about this time, Richard For-bush of Winchester builded and founded Corpus Christi college in Oxford, and minded to haue appointed the same for a house of monks: but Hugh Wdom then bishop of Excester changed his mind from that purpose by these meanes. This Hugh Wdom albeit he were not the best learned of himselfe, yet verie much and well affected towards learning and learned men; and was minded to haue enlarged Excester college. But being denied the preferment of a scholer, which stood then in election for a come, his good will was withdratone from that college, and he would haue joined with William Smith bishop of Lincolne, who then was in building of Walsen rose college; but it toke no effect. And then being aduertised that Richard Forbush of Winchester was in hand to build Corpus Christi college, he did send his letters vnto him, and offered to ioint with him therein, who was verie glad thereof and well contented. Now these two bishops conferring together tuesday this Lent, six hundred strangers footing at the popingale with crobowes, and they keepe such as-semblies and fraternities together, and make such a gathering to their common box, that euerie bell other will hold pke with the citie of London. Well said the doctor, I will do for a reformation of this matter as much as a priest maie do, and so recited his lincolns bill, and studied for his purpose. Then Lincoln berie zealous of his enterpryse, went from man to man, saing that whottlie they shoud heare news, and darlye excited yong people and artificers to beare malice to the frangers. When Casler came, and doctor Beke shoud preach the tuesday in Casler wake, he came into the pulpit, and there declared, that to him was brought a pitifull bill, and read it in this wise.

The tenor of the bill of complaint *which doctor Bele read in open audi-

Tall you the worshipfull lordes & maisters of this citie, that will take compassion ouer the poore people your neighbours, and also of the great importable hurts, losses, and hinderances, whereof proceedeth the extreame pouertie to all the kings subiects, that inhabit within this citie and suburbs of the same. For so it is, that the aliens & strangers eat the bread from the fatherlesse children, and take the liuing from all the artificers, and the intercoure from all merchants, whereby pouertie is so much increased, that euerie man bewaileth the miserie of other; for craftmen be brought to beggerie, and merchants to needinesse. Wherefore the premисses considered, the redresse must be of the commons, knit and banited to one part. And as the hurt and damage greueth all men, so must all men see to their willing power for remedie, & not to suffer the said aliens so highlie in their wealth; & the naturall bozne men of this region to come to confusion. ¶ Of this letter was more, but the doctor read no further.

Inbudscreet Fischer.

When he had read this letter, of the chiefest part thereof, comprehending (as ye haue heard) much sedition matter, he began with this sentence, Calum calidano, terram autem dedisti filijs hominum, and upon this text he intreated, how this land was giuen to Englishmen. And as birds defend their nests, so ought Englishmen to cherish and mainteine themselves, and to hurt and grieue aliens for respect of their common-wealth. And upon this text Pugna pro patria, he brought in, how by Gods labo it was lawfull to fight for their countrie. And thus he subtilly moued or rather vndercraetlie prouoked the people to rebell against strangers. By this folish sermon, made a light person tooke courage, and openlie spake against strangers. And as vnhap would, there had bene diuerse euill parts played of late by strangers, in and about the citie of London, which kindled the peoples rancour the more furiouslye against them.

Now as the dwell world, the fundate after at Frenchin in the kings gallerie was Francis de Bar, who (as y^e haue heard) kept an Englishmans wife and his goods, and yet he could haue no remedie; and with him were Domingo, Antonie Cauer, and manie more strangers, and there they talking with sir Thomas Dabner knight, jested and laughed how that Francis kept the Englishmans wife, sa-ieng that if they had the maiors wife of London they would keepe hir. Sir Thomas said, Sirs you haue too much fauour in England. There were diuers English merchants by, who heard them laugh, and were not content, in so much as one William Bolt a mercer said, Well you whorsons Lombards, you reioice and laugh, by the masse we will one day haue a sting at you, come when it will. And that saieing the other merchants assented. This tale was reported about London, and the poore and euill disposed people said they would be reuenged on the merchants strangers as well as on the artificers strangers. ¶ On monday the morow after, the king remoued to his manor of Richmond. }

On the eight and twentieth daie of Aprill, diuerse young men of the citie piked quarels to certaine strangers as they passed by the streets, some they did strike, some they bueted, and some they threw into the kennell: wherefore the maior sent some of the Englishmen to prison, as Stephan Stubleie Skinner, Wets, Stephanfon, and diuerse other. When sudden-lie rose a secret rumour, and no man could tell how it began, that on Paie daie next the citie would rebell and slea all the alieins, insomuch that diuerse strangers fled out of the citie. This hysse ran to into euerie mans eares, that it came to the knowledge of the kings counsell, whereupon the lord cardinall sent for the maior, and other of the counsell of the citie, gi-uing them to vnderstand what he had heard.

The maior, as one ignorant of the matter, told the cardinal that he doubted not but to goeuerne the citie, as peace should be obserued. The cardinal willed him so to do; and to take good heed, that if any such riotous attempt was intended, he should with god policie prevent it. The maior came from the cardinals house at foure of the clocke in the after noone on spate euen, and in all hast sent for his brethren to the Guildhall; yet was it almost seuen of the clocke, per the assemblie was set. Upon conference had of the matter touching the rumour that was spread abroad of the rebellion against the strangers, some thought it necessarie that a substantiall watch should be set, of the honest citizens householders which might withstand the euill doers, if they went about any misrule.

But other sorte of this opinion, that it was dangerous to raise men in armour, because it was hard to tell whome they might trust: but rather they thought it best that commandment should be given to euerie man though euerie ward, to shut in his doores, & to keepe his seruants within. Before eight of the clocke the recorder was sent to the cardinal with these opinions; who hearing the same, allowed the latter for best and most surest. And then the recorder and sir Thomas Poore (late undersecretarie of London, and now of the kings private counsell) came to the Guildhall halfe an houre before nine of the clocke, and there shewed the pleasure of the kings counsell; whereupon euerie alderman sent to his ward, that no man should stirre after fraction of the clocke out of his house, but to keepe his doores shut and his seruants within, till nine of the clocke in the morning.

After this commandement given, In the evening as sir John Dundle (an alderman) came from his ward, and found two young men in Cheape playing at the bucklers, and a great number of young men looking on them (for the commandement was then scarcely knowne) he commanded them to leave of. And for that one of them asked, why? he would have had him to the Counter. When all the young gentlemen drept to, and refused the alderman, taking the young fellow from him, & cried: Dventiles and clubs, their out at euerie doore came clubs and weapons. The alderman fled and was in great danger. Then more people arose out of euerie quarter, and forth came seruimgmen, watermen, courtiers, and others; so that by eluuen of the clocke, there were in Cheape, sir or seuen hundred; and out of Pauls churchyard came three hundred, which knewe not of the other. So out of all places they gathered, & brake by the counters, toke out the prisoners that the maior had thither committed for hurting the strangers, and came to Pelwgate, and toke out Stindley and Petit committed thither for that cause.

The maior and shiriffes were present there, and made proclamation in the kings name, but nothing was obeyed. Whereby being gathered in plumpes, they ran thorough saint Nicholas shambles, and at saint Martins gate there met with them sir Thomas More, and others, desiring them to go to their lodgings. And as they were thus intreating, and had almost persuaded the people to depart, they within saint Martins threwe out stones, bats, and hot water; so that they hurt diuerse honest persons that were there with sir Thomas More, persuading the rebellious persons to cease, inasmuch as at length one Nicholas Downes a sergeant of armes being there with the said sir Thomas More, & soze hurt amongst others, in a furie, cried; Downe with them. And then all the misdeuiled persons ran to the ryces and winnowes of the houses with saint Martins, and spoiled all that they found.

After that, they ran headlong into Coznehill, & there likewise spoiled diuerse houses of the French men that dwelled within the gate of maister Petras house called Crane gate. This maister Petras was a Picard bozne, and reputed to be a great beater of Frenchmen in their occupiengs and trades, contrarie to the lawes of the citie. If the people had found him, they would surely haue striken off his head; but when they found him not, the watermen and certeine young preests that were there fell to riling, and some ran to Blanchapelson, and brake by the strangers houses, and spoiled them. Thus from ten or eluuen of the clocke, these riotous people continued in their outrageous doings till about three of the clocke, at what time they began to withdraw, and went to their places of resort: and by the waie they were taken by the maior and the heads of the citie, and sent some of them to the Tower, some to Pelwgate, and some to the Counters, to the number of three hundred.

Marie fled, and speciallie the watermen, preests, & seruimgmen, but the prentises were caught by the backs and had to prison. In the meane time, whilst the hottest of this ruffling lasted, the cardinall was aduertised thereof by sir Thomas More: whereupon the cardinall strengthened his house with men and ordinance. Sir Thomas More rode in all hast to Richmond, where the king laie, and informed him of the matter; who incontinentlie sent forth basilie to London, to vnderstand the state of the citie, and was truelie aduertised how the riot was ceased, and manie of the misdoers apprehended. The lieutenant of the Tower sir Roger Cholmeleie (no great friend to the citie in a frautike furie, during the time of this uprore, shot off certeine peeces of ordinance against the citie. And though they did no great harme; yet he wan much enill will for his hastie doing, because men thought he did it of malice, rather than of any discretion.

About five of the clocke the earles of Shreshyre and Surrie, Thomas Dokerie lord of saint Johns, George Beuill lord of Aburgauennie, and others, which had heard of this riot, came to London with such strength as they could make upon that sudden, and so did the Juries of court. But before they came, whether with feare of the buite of their coming, or otherwise, the riotous assemblie was broken up, and manie of the misdoers taken (as ye haue heard.) Then were the prisoners examined, and the sermon of doctor Beke called to remembrance, and he taken and sent to the Tower. Whereby was a commission of oler and determiner directed to the duke of Norfolk, and to diuerse other lords, to the lord maior of London, and the aldermen, and to all the iustices of England, for punishment of this insurrection. [The citie thought the duke bare them a grudge for a lewd preest of his, which the yeare before was slain in Cheape, inasmuch that he then in his furie said; I praie God I maie once haue the citizens in my danger! And likewise the duke thought that they bare him no good will; wherefore he came into the citie with thirtene hundred men in harnelle to keepe the oler and determiner.

Now upon examination it could neuer be proued of anie meeting, gathering, talking, or conuenticle, at anie date or time before that date; but that the chance so happened without anie matter prepered of anie creature sauing Lincoln, and neuer an honest person in maner was taken but onelie he. Then proclamations were made, that no women should come together to babble and talke, but all men should keepe their homes in their houses. All the streets that were notable and full of harnessed men, which spake manie opprobrious words to the citizens, which grieved them sore; and if they would haue bene reuenged, the other had had the worse: for the citizens were two hundred to one, but like true subjects they suffered patientlie. Now for the due correction (according to law) of this disorder, all the iustices with all the kings counsell learned in the lawes, assembled at the house of sir John Fincur lord chiefe iustice of England nere to saint Wides by Fleetstreet, to take advise, and conclude upon the order which they should follow in this matter, and first there was read the statute of the third yeare of Henrie the first, the effect whereof insuch in these wordes following.

anie of the lieges & subiects of this realme of England, Ireland, & Wales, are to be adiudged and determined as guiltie of high treason committed against the crowne & dignitie of the king. And further, in euerie haven and port of the sea, there shall be from hence forth made and assigned by the king, by his letters pattents, one lawfull officer named a conseruator of truces and safe conducts granted by the king, which officer shall dispend at the least ten pounds in land by yeare, &c: as in the statute moze at large is expessed.

The which statute being read and well considered of, bicause there was diuerse leagues of truces betwixt the king and diuerse other princes, as one betwixt him and the French king, and another betwixt him and the archduke of Burgognie, and another betwixt him & the king of Spaine (all the which truces were violated by the said insurrection) it was determined by the whole councell there assembled, that the kings sergeants and attournies should go to the lord chancellor, to haue a sight of all the said leagues and charters of truces, to the intent they might frame their indictments according to the matter. And note that iudge Fineux said, that all such as were parties to the said insurrection, were guiltie of high treason, as well those that did not commit anie robberie, as those that were principall doers therein themselves, bicause that the insurrection in it selfe was high treason, as a thing practised against the regall honour of our soueraign lord the king.

And the same law holdeth of an insurrection (said Fineux) made against the statute of laborers. For so (said he) it came to passe, that certeine persons within the countie of Kent began an insurrection, in disobedience of the statute of laborers, and were attainted therfore of high treason, and had iudgement to be drawne, hanged, and quartered. He shewed where and when this chanced. It was further determined by the said Fineux, and all the iustices of the land, that upon the said commission of oier and terminer in London, the iustices named in the said commission, might not arreigne the offenders, and proceed to the trial in one selfe daie, no moze than might the iustices of peace. But iustices in oier might do so, as well as the iustices of gaole deliuerie: and as the sufficiency of the iurors within the citie to passe betwixt the king and the said traitors, the iustices determined, that he that had lands, and goods, to the value of an hundred marks, should be inabled to passe upon the said indictments. And this by the equitie of the statute of Anno undecimo Henrici septimi, the which will, that no man be admitted to passe in anie inquest in London in a place of lands, or other action, in which the damages shall passe the value of fourtie shillings, except he be worth in lands or goods the value of an hundred marks.

On saturday the second of Aprill, in this ninth yeare, all the commissioners, with the lord maior, aldermen, and iustices, went to the Guildhall, where manie of the offenders were indicted, as well of the insurrection, as of the robberies by them committed against the truces. Whereupon they were arreigned, & pleading not guiltie, had day giuen till monday next ensuing. On which daie being the fourth of Aprill, the lord maior, the duke of Norfolk, the earle of Surrie and others came to sit in the Guildhall, to proceed in their oier and terminer as they were appointed. When the lords were set, the prisoners were brought through the streets tied in ropes, some men, and some lads of thirtene yeres of age. Among them were diuerse not of the citie, some pyleys, some husbandmen, and labourers. The whole number amounted unto two hundred thre score and eightene persons.

This daie was John Lincolne indicted as a principall procurer of this mischievous insurrection, and thereupon he was arreigned, and pleading not guiltie, had daie giuen ouer till wednesday, or as Hall saith till thursday next ensuing. He was charged with such matter (as before ye haue heard) concerning his sute unto doctor Standish, and doctor Beke, for the reading of this bill in their sermons, and opening the matter (as before ye haue heard) all which matter with the circumstances he had confessed on sundae the third of Aprill, unto sir Richard Cholmeie, sir John Danie, & sir Hugh Skevington. Divers other were indicted this monday, and so for that time the lords departed. The next daie the duke came againe, & the earle of Surrie with 2000 armed men, which kept the streets. When the maior, the duke, the earles of Shrewsburie and Surrie were set, the prisoners were arreigned, and thirtene found guiltie, and adiudged to be hanged, drawne, and quartered. For execution whereof were set by eleuen paire of galloves in diuerse places where the offenses were done, as at Algate, at Blanchappellon, Grations streete, Leaden hall, and before euerie counter one, also at Newgate, at saint Martins, at Aldersgate, and at Bishopsgate.

Then were the prisoners that were iudged brought to those places of execution: and executed in most rigorous maner, in the presence of the lord Edmund Howard son to the duke of Norfolk, & knight marshal, who shewed no mercie, but extreme crueltie to the poore younglings in their execution: and likewise the dukes seruants spake manie opprobrious words, some bad hang, some bad draw, some bad set the citie on fire, but all was suffered. On thursdaie the twentieth of Aprill, was Lincolne, Skirwin, and two brethren called Wets, and diuerse other adiudged to die. When Lincolne said, My lords, I meant well: for if you knew the mischiefe that is infused in this realme by strangers, you would remebee it, & manie times I haue complained, and then I was called a busse fellow: now our Lord haue mercie on me. They were laid on hardels, & drawne to the standard in Cheape, and first was John Lincolne executed. And as the other had the ropes about their neckes, there came a commandement from the king to respite the execution. When the people cried, God saue the king, and so was the oier and terminer deferred till another daie, and the prisoners sent againe to ward: the armed men departed out of London, and all things set in quiet.

On the eleuenth daie of Aprill, the king came to his manor of Greenwich, where the recorder of London and diuerse aldermen came to speake with his grace, and all wore gownes of blacke colour. And when they perceiued the king comming out of his priue chamber into his chamber of presence, they knaeled downe, and the recorder said: Our most naturall, benigne, and soueraigne lord, we know well that your grace is displeased with vs of your citie of London, for the great riot late done: we ascerteine your grace, that none of vs, nor no honest person were condescending to that enormitie, and yet wee, our wiues, and children, euerie house lament that your fauour should be taken from vs. And forsomuch as light and sole persons were the doers of the same, we most humbly beseech your grace to haue mercie of vs for our negligence, and compassion of the offenders for their offense and trespass.

stantial persons were not consenting to the same, it appeareth to the contrarie. For you neuer moved to let them, nor stirred once to fight with them, which you say were so small a number of light persons. Wherefore we must thinke, and you can not denie, that you did winke at the matter, but at this time we will grant to you neither our fauour nor good will, nor to the offenders mercie, but resort to the cardinall our lord chancellor, and he shall make you an answer, and declare our pleasure. And with this answer the Londoners departed, and made relation to the maior.

On the eighteenth day of this moneth, the queene of Scots, which had bene at the court, and at Walsingham castle, a whole yeare at the kings charge, and was richlie appointed of all things meet to hir estate, both of ieiwels, plate, tapistrie, arras, coine, horses, & all other things of the kings gift & liberalitie, departed out of London toward Scotland with great riches, albeit she came into England with great povertie, and she entered into Scotland the thirtieth date of June, whome hir husband receiued at Berwick, but the Englishmen smallie regarded him. All hir charges within the realme, comming to the court and returning, were of the kings purse.

The king cometh to Westminster hall, and there sitteth in iudgement himselfe.

On thursdaie the two & twentieth date of Maye, the king came into Westminster hall, for whome at the upper end was set a cloth of estate, and the place hang'd with arras. With him was the cardinall, the dukes of Norfolkke and Suffolke, the earles of Shrewsburie, of Essex, of Wiltshire, & Surrie, with manie lords and other of the kings counsell. The maior & aldermen, with all the chiefe of the citie were there in their best luerie (according as the cardinall had appointed them) by nine of the clocke. When the king commanded that all the prisoners should bee brought forth, so that in came the poore ponglings and old false knaues bound in ropes all along, one after another in their shirts, and euerie one a halter about his necke, to the number of foure hundred men, and eleuen women. And when all were come befoze the kings presence, the cardinall soze laid to the maior and communalitie their negligence, and to the prisoners he declared that they had deserued death for their offense. When all the prisoners togither cried; Mercie gracious lord, mercie. Herewith the lords altogether besought his grace of mercie, at whose sute the king pardoned them all. When the cardinall gaue vnto them a good exhortation, to the great gladnesse of the hearers.

The kings gracious and generall pardon.

Now, when the generall pardon was pronounced, all the prisoners shrowted at once, & all togither cast by their halters into the hall rose, so that the king might perceiue they were none of the discreetest sort. Here is to be noted, that diuerse offenders, which were not taken, hearing that the king was inclined to mercie, came well apparelled to Westminster, and suddenlie stripped them into their shirts with halters, and came in among the prisoners willinglie, to be partakers of the kings pardon. By which doing, it was well knowne, that one John Nelson yeoman of the crowne was the first that began to spoile, and exhorted other to do the same: and because he led and was not taken, he came in with a rope among the other prisoners, and so had his pardon. This companie was after called the blacke wagon. Then were all the gallows within the citie taken downe, and manie a good praiser said for the king, and the citizens toke more heed to their seruants. But the kings mercie ministred abundant matter of communication, euerie one (speciallie the pardoned and their allies) founding the benefit of his roial clemencie, whereby of dead men they became liuing, and had sustained the seuerer sentence of law, had not mercie remitted the fault and the punishment, which breaketh the force of iudgement, as the poet trulie saith: Indicij nervus frangit miseratio clemens.

In June the king had with him diuerse ambassadors, for solace of whome he prepared a collie lutes, he himselfe & twelue more against the duke of Suffolke and other twelue. His bace and bard was the one halfe cloth of siluer, & the other halfe blacke finell. On the siluer was a curious lose worke of beluet imbodered with gold, cut on the siluer, and euerie cut ingrailed with gold, so that that side was gold, siluer, and beluet. On the blacke finell side was blacke beluet imbodered with gold, and cut, and euerie cut was ingrailed with flat gold of damaske. The bace and bard were bodered with great letters of massie gold bullion, full of pearles and stones, marvellous rich: all his companie were in like sute, sauing that they had no ieiwels. The king had on his head a ladies heue full of diamonds. On the king attended gentlemen, armourers, and other officers, to the number of an hundred and thwentie five persons, all in white beluet and white sattin, horse and harnesse for horsemen, caps and hosen for footmen, all white, at the kings cost. Thus roiallie the king and his companie with his waiters came to the tilts end.

Then entered the duke of Suffolke, with the marques Dorset, the earls of Essex and Surrie, and eight other of his band, in bards and baces of white beluet and crimson sattin losenged, set full of letters of C. M. of gold, for Charles and Marie, and they toke the other end of the tilt. When the trumpets blew, and the king and the duke ran fiercely togither, and byake manie speares, and so did all the other, that it was hard to saie who did best. But when the courses were run, they ran volant one at another, so that both by the report of sir Edward Clifford maister of the armourie, and also of the iudges and heralds, at these lutes were broken five hundred and sir speares: and then the king the same night made the ambassadors a sumptuous banquet, with manie ribbels and much pastime. After this great triumph, the king appointed his ghefts for his pastime this summer; but suddenlie there came a plague of sicknesse, called the sweating sicknesse, that turned all his purpose.

This maladie was so cruell, that it killed some within thre houres, some within two houres, some merrie at dinner, and dead at supper. Marie died in the kings court, the lord Clinton, the lord Graie of Wilton, and manie knights, gentlemen, and officers. For this plague Michaelmasse tearme was adourned. And because that this maladie continued from Iulie to the middest of December, the king kept himselfe ever with a small companie, and held no solemne Christmasse, willing to haue no resort for feare of infection: but much lamented the number of his people, for in some one towne halfe the people died, and in some other towne the third part, the sweat was so feruent and infectious. By the extremitie whereof, and the multitudes with such suddennesse and present mortalitie dropping auaie: it should seme that they little remembered, or at least, wise neglected the preseruatiue remedie vied in the first great sweating sicknesse in king Henrie the seuenths time, whereby as then manie a mans life was saued, so now the like benefit (by applying of the same wholsome meanes) might haue rebounded to the patients.]

In the beginning of this yeare, Trinitie tearme was begun at Orenford, where it continued but one date, and was againe adourned to Westminster. This yeare came to Calis from pope Leo, a legat De latere, called Laurence Campeius borne in Valognes logne la Gresse, commonlie called cardinall Campetius, to require the king of aid against the Turke.

At the request of the king of England, and also of the french king (which sought now to be receiued into friendship with the king of England chieflie by card-nall Wolles meanes) pope Leo constituted the said cardinall Wolles his legat in England, joining him in commission with the said Campeius, the which said at Calis vntill the bulles were brought from Rome touching that matter. There was also an other cause that said Campeius at Calis, & that was a sute which cardinall Wolles had moued for the obtaining of the bishoprike of Bath, which benefice cardinall Adrian Castilian inioined by the collation of king Henrie the seventh.

This cardinall Adrian being fallen in the popes displeasure, withdrew out of the court of Rome vnto Venice: and in the meane time cardinall Campetius, at the instance of cardinall Wolles, wrote to the pope, that cardinall Adrian might be depriued of that bishoprike, to the end that cardinall Wolles might haue the same. Which request was accomplished, and the bulles sent vnto Calis; so that then cardinall Campeius, after he had remained at Calis thre moneths, came ouer into England, and was receiued with all pompe & honour that might be deuisd. Inasmuch that cardinall Wolles had sent to the legat (whilist he laie at Calis) red cloth to cloath his seruants, which at their comming to Calis were but meanelie appareled. And when all things were readie, he passed the sea and landed at Douer; and so kept forth his iourne toward London.

At euerie towne as they passed, he was receiued with procession, and accompanied with all the lords & gentlemen of Kent. And when he came to Blacheheath, there met him the duke of Suffolke, with a great number of prelates, knights, & gentlemen, all rightly appareled. And in the waie he was brought into a rich tent of cloth of gold, where he shifted himself into the robe of a cardinall, edged with ermins; and so toke his mule riding towards London. The night before he came to London, the cardinall of Bozke, to furnish the carriages of the cardinall Campetius, sent to him twelue mules with emptie coffers couered with red: which twelue mules were led thorough London amongst the mules of Campetius, which were but eight; and so these twentie mu-lets passed thorough the streets, as though they had bene full of treasures, apparell, & other necessities.

Now when they came into Cheape, one of the mu-lets brake from his keeper, and ouerthrew the chests, and ouerturned two or thre other mules carriages, which fell with such a violence, that diuerse of them vnbloked; & out of some fell old hosen, broken shoes, and roasted flesh, peeces of bread, egges, and much byle baggage. At which sight the boies cried; Se, se my lord legats treasure: and so the mulesters were ashamed, and toke vp all their trusse and passed forth.
About thre of the clocke in the after none on the twentie ninth day of Julie the said legat entered the cittie, and in Southwozke met him all the clergie of London, with crosses, censors, and copes, and censured him with great reuerence. The maior, and aldermen, with all the occupations of the cittie in their best liueries stood in the streets, and him highlie honoured: to whome sir Thomas Spore made a brieue oration in the name of the cittie.

Now when he came to Paules, there he was recei-ued with bishops mitred, and vnder a canopie entered the church: which canopie his seruants toke for their fees. And when he had offered, he gaue his benediction to all the people, & toke againe his mule, & so with all his traine aforesaid was conueied to Bath place, and there rested: where he was welcommed of cardinall of Bozke. On sundae next insuing, these two cardinals as legats toke their barges, & came to Grenewich, ech of them had besides their crosses two pillars of siluer; two little ares gilt, and two cloake-bags embroidered, & the cardinals hats borne before them. And when they came to the kings hall, the cardinall of Bozke went on the right hand: and there the king roiallie appareled and accompanied, met them euen as though both had come from Rome and so brought them both vp into his chamber of presence.

Then a solemne oration was made by an Italian, declaring the cause of the legacie to be in two articles, one for aid against Gods enemies, and the second for refozation of the clergie. And when masse was done, they were had to a chamber, and serued of lords and knights, with much solemnitie: and after dinner they toke their leaue of the king, and came to London, and rode throught the citie together, in great pompe and glorie to their lodgings. This cardinall Campeius for his friendship shewed in helping the cardinall of England to the bishoprike of Bath, was considered (besides other great rewards) with the bishoprike of Salisburie, the profits whereof he receiued, vntill the act was established, that no forrenner should inioine any spirituall benefice within this realme. But for the chiefest errand that this cardinall Campeius came, he could haue no towarde answer: which was (as you haue heard) to haue leaued a summe of monie by waie of tenths in this realme, to the maintenance of the waite in defense of the christian confines against the Turke.

There were at the same time other legats sent into other parts of Christendome about the same matter, as into France, Spaine, and Germanie. For pope Leo calling to remembrance, that the seare con-ceiued of the Turkes had brought no small gainnes to diuerse of his predecessors, he began to feare so. But for that such feare was now too well knowne to be fed as an ordinarie thist of the popes, when they stood in need of monie, this practise was at this time vied in vaine; so that Campeius hearing that it toke not place in other parties, left off his earnest sute about it, and with great rewards receiued of the king and cardinall, returned to Rome, not without hope yet (by reason of promises made vnto him by his friends) that the popes request might hereafter be granted, according to his motion. There attended him to Rome one John Clarke a lawiour, as am-bassadour from the king.

This man obtained for the cardinall, authoritie to dispense with all men for offenses committed against the spirituall lawes, which part of his poluer legantine was verie profitable and gainefull. For then he set up a court, and called it the court of the legat: in the which he proued testaments, and heard causes, to the great hinderance of all the bishops of this realme. He visited bishops, and all the clergie exempt and not exempt, and vnder colour of refoz-mation he got much treasure. For thorough bribes & rewards, notorious offenders were dispensed with, so that nothing was refozmed, but came to more michefe. The example of his pride, caused prebts and all spirituall persons to war so proud, that they rubbed it out in velvet and silks, which they wore both in gounes, iackets, doublets, and shoes. They vied open lecherie, and bare themselves so stout by reason of his authorities and faculties, that no man durst reproue any thing in them. So that we see here vied in proue how forcible the examples of great men be in the inferior sort; as the wise man truelie saith; Qualis erit princeps, talis prefectus habetur, Nobilis qualis, plebs quoque talis erit.

pened the way, and established the meane to per-cute the regions of Italie with continuall beatti-ons: so that the pope together with the whole court of Rome being made astonished with so great successe, and no lesse proud to eschew so great a danger, making their first recourse vnto the aid and succour of God, caused to be celebrated through Rome most deuout inuocations, which he did assist in presence bare-footed.

And afterwards calling vpon the helpe of man, he wrote letters to all christian princes, both admonishing them of the perill, and perswading them to lay aside all ciuill discords and contentions; and attend spediue to the defense of religion & their common safetie, which he affirmed would more and more take increase of most grieuous danger, if with the vntie of minds, and concordances of forces, they sought not to transference the warre into the empire of the Turkes, & invade the enimie in his owne coun-trie. vpon this aduise and admonition, was taken the examination and opinion of men of warre, and persons skillfull in the discouerie of countries, the disposing of prouinces, and of the nature and vsage of the forces and weapons of that kingdome, and there-vpon a resolution was set downe to make great leuies of monie by voluntarie contributions of princes, and vniuersall imposts of all people of christen-dome.

It was thought necessarie that Cesar accompanied with the horsemen of Hungaria and Polonia, nations warlike, and practised in continuall warre against the Turke, and also with the footmen of Ger-manie, should saile along Danubi into Bosnia called ancientlie Dria, and from thence to Dacia, and so to draw neare Constantinople, the seat of the empire of Ottomanes: that the French king with all the forces of his kingdome, the Venetians, and the other potentates of Italie, accompanied with the infanterie of Swizzerland, should passe from the port of Brindisi in Albania, a passage verie easie & short, to invade Greece, a countrie full of christian inhabitants, and for the intolerable yoke of the Turkes, most ready to rebell: that the kings of Spaine, of England, and Portugall, assembling their forces together in Cartagena, and the ports thereabouts, should take their course with two hundred ships full of Spanish footmen and other souldiers, to the streit of Calipoli, to make rodes by to Constantinople, hauing first of all subdued the castels and forts standing vpon the mouth of the streit: and the pope to take the same course, imbarcking at Ancona, with an hundred ships armed.

With these preparations, seeming sufficient to couer the land, and ouerspread the sea, it was thought that of a warre so full of deuotion and pietie, there could not be but hoped a happie end, speciallie adding the inuocation of God, and so manie feuerall inua-sions made at one time against the Turkes, who make their principall foundation of defense, to fight in the plaine field. These matters were solicited with no small industrie, and to stop all matter of imputation against the office of the pope, the minds of princes were thoroughlie founded, and an vniuersall truce for five yeares betwene all the princes of christen-dome, published in the consistorie, vpon paine of most grieuous censure to such as should impugne it.
So that the negociation continuing for all things appertaining to so great an enterpryse, he assigned ambassadors to all princes: to the emperor he sent the cardinall S. Sisto, to the French king he dispatched the cardinall of S. Maria in Portico, the cardinall Giles to the king of Spaine, and the cardinall Campeius to the king of England.

All cardinals of authoritie, either for their experience in affaires, or for opinion of their doctrine, or for their familiaritie with the pope. All which things albeit they were begun with great hope and expectation, and the vniuersall truce accepted of all men, and all men with no little ostentation and bzaurie of words, made shew of their readinesse with their forces to aduance so good a cause: yet, that with the consideration of the perill esteemed vncertaine and farre off, and extending more to one prince than to another, and that by the difficulties and long tract of time that appeared, to introduce a zeale and vnion so vniuersall, priuat interests and respects particular seemed to preuaile more, than the pietie of the expedition: inso much that the negociation stood not one-lie naked of all hope and issue, but also it was followed verie lightlie, and as it were by ceremonie.

This being one propertie in the nature of men, that those things which in their beginnings appeare fearefull, do daile take such begrees of diminution and vanishing, that vnles the first feares be reniued by new accidents, they lead men in proceesse of time to securitie. Which propertie of negligence, both touching the affaires publike, and affection of priuate and particular men was well confirmed by the death that succeeded not long after to Selim, who, hauing by a long maladie suspended the preparations of the warre, was in the end consumed by the passions of his disease, and so passed into the other life, leauing so great an empire to Soliman his sonne, young in yeares, and iudged to beare a wit and mind not so disposed to the warres, although afterwards the effects declared the contrarie.

At this time appeared betwene the pope and the French king a most great and streit coniunction: for the king gave to wife to Laurence his nephew, the ladie Agadoalen noble descended of the blood and house of Bullognie, with a yearelle reuenue of ten thousand crownes, whereof part was of the kings gift, and the residue rising of his owne patrimonie.
Besides, the king hauing borne to him a sonne, the pope required that in his baptisme, he would impose vpon him his name. By which occasion Laurence making preparations to go to marrie his new wife, for his moze speed, performed his iourne by post into France, where he was receiued with manie ami-ties and much honour of the king, to whom he became verie gracions and of deare account, the rather for that (besides other generall respects) he made a dedication of himselfe wholie to the king, with promise to follow in all accidents, his fortune.

And now to returne to cardinall Wolse, who grew so into exceeding pride, that he thought himselfe equall with the king. For when he said masse (which he did offer to shew his pompe, rather than for anie deuotion) he made dukes and earles to serue him of wine, with a say taken, and to hold to him the bason at the lauatorie. Thus was the pride of the cardinall and other priests so past the compasse of reason, that in maner all god persons abhorred and disdained it (as altogether degenerating from the example of Christ & his pore traine, of whome in name and title they seemed to be professors), but of their manners and trade of life open defiers; yea in such manifest sort, both in apparell and diet, as also in all other respects, that few there were (if they perceiued anie thing by discretion) but sawe the euident abuses of their behauiours, tending greatlie to the disho-nour of the place which they possessed, as also to the no small offense of the modest sort of the cleargie, whereof some did so well like of this ruffling and making presbyterie, that they abhorred it as strong poison in their bosome.

ned his powter legantine, the which letter after his old familiar manner he subscribed thus: Pour l'ho-neur de William of Canturburie. With which subscription, because the archbishop wrote him brother, he was so much offended, as though the archbishop had done him great iniurie, that he could not temper his mood, but in high displeasure said, that he would so worke within a while, that he should well understand how he was his superiour, and not his brother. When the archbishop (being a sober wise man) heard of the messenger that bare the letter, how the cardinal took it not well, but so as it might seeme there was a great fault in the letter, and reported the tale as one that disliked the cardinals presumption herein: Peace (said the archbishop) knowest thou not how the man is become mad with too much ioy. And thus the cardinal forgetting to hold the right path of true land and praise, sought to be feared rather than beloved of all good men.

king writeth

wolfe.

In this meane time the French king greatlie coueting to redeeme the citie of Loznate out of the hands of the king of England, and knowing that he must make waite thereunto thorough the cardinals friendship, called not with high gifts to win his good will, and moreover in often writing to him, exalted him with titles of honor, and so magnified him, that the cardinal, as one tickled with vaine-glorie more than can be imagined, thought that he could not do pleasure enough to the French king, that did esteem so much of him. Whereupon the French king hoping to compass his desire, after he perceived the cardinals good will towards him, signified his meaning unto the said cardinal; who found meanes to breake thereof to the king, in such wise as he was contented to heare the French kings ambassadoys, that should be sent hither to talke of that matter.

Ambassadors
from the French king.

The French king then understanding the king of England his pleasure, sent over the lord Bontuet high admerall of France, and the bishop of Paris as chiefe ambassadoys, accompanied with a great sort of lustie gentlemen of the French kings court, to the number of foure score and above, on whome attended such a companie of other of the meaner sort, that the whole number amounted to twelue hundred one and other, which were thought to be manie for an ambassade. ¶ On mondate the twentieth seventh date of September, the earle of Surrie high admerall of England, in a coat of rich tisse cut on cloath of siluer, on a great courser richlie trapped, and a great whistle of gold, set with stones and pearle, hanging at a great and massie chaine baudycke wise, accompanied with an hundred and sirtie gentlemen, richlie appareled, on goodlie horses came to Blackheath, and there amiable received the ambassadoys of France. The yong gallants of France had coats garded with one colour, cut in ten or twelue parts verie richlie to behold: and so all the Englishmen ac-coupled themselves with the Frenchmen longinglie together, and so road to London. After the two ad-meralls followed foure and twentie of the French kings gard, accompanied with foure and twentie of the English gard. And after them a great number of archers, to the number of foure hundred. And in this order they passed thorough the citie to sailors hall, and there the chiefe ambassadoys were lodged, and the remnant in merchants houses about.

court.

When these lords were in their lodgings, then the French harder men opened their wares, & made the sailors hall like the pound of a mart. At this doing manie an Englishman grudged, but it auailed not. The last daie of September, the French ambas-sadoys toke their barge, and came to Grenewich.
The admerall was in a gowne of cloath of siluer rail-sed, furred with rich fables; and all his companie almost were in a new fashioned garment, called a shemew, which was in effect a gowne cut in the middle.

The gentlemen of France were brought into the kings presence, where the bishop of Paris made a solemne oration; which being ended, & answer made thereto, the king highlie interteined the admerall and his companie, and so did all the English lords and gentlemen.

The ambassadoys after this were daltie in coun-cell, till at length an agreement was concluded, under pretence of a marriage to be had betwene the Dolphin of France, and the ladie Marie, daughter to the king of England: in name of whose mariage monies Loznate should be delivered unto the French king, he paying to the king of England for the castle which he had made in that citie, six hundred thousand crownes, to be paid in twelue yeares space, that is to saie, fiftie thousand euerie yeare during that terme. And if the marriage chanced not to take effect, then should Loznate be againe redoyed to the king of England. For performance of which article, hostages should be delivered: that is to wit, monsieur de Montmorancie, monsieur de Montpesac, monsieur de Poise, monsieur de Porret. Moreo-uer the French king should paie to the lord cardinal of England a thousand marks of yearelie pension, in recompense of his revenues before time received of the bishopricke of Loznate: and likewise to other of the kings counsell he should also giue certeine summes of monie as yearelie pensions, in like maner as his ancestors had done to the counsellors of the kings of England before time.

The French king agreed to call backe the duke of Al-banie out of Scotland, that the suertie of B. James might the better be provided for, and lesse occasion of trouble ministred to the king of England. And further the French king was contented that the said king James should be received as a confederat in his peace. When all things were concluded, the king and the ambassadoys road to the cathedrall church of saint Paule in London from Durham place, where the cardinal of England sang the masse in most pompous maner: and after that masse was ended, doctor Pace the kings secretaire made an eloquent oration in praise of peace: and that done, the king and his nobles with the ambassadoys went to the bishops palace, and there dined, and after dinner, the king rode againe to Durham place. That night the cardinal of Poise made to the ambassa-doys a solemne banquet, and them accompanied manie lords and ladies of England. And when the banquet was done, in came sir minstrels, richlie disguised, and after them followed thre gentlemen in wide and long gobones of crimson sattin, euerie one having a cup of gold in their hands.

The first cup was full of angels and roials, the second had diuerse bales of dice, and the third had cer-teine paires of cards. These gentlemen offered to plai at murtherance, and when they had plaied the length of the first boyd, then the minstrels blew up, and then entered into the chamber certeine ladies disguised, on whome attended twelue knights disguised bearing torches. All these thirtie & six persons were in one sute of fine greene sattin, all covered ouer with cloth of gold, under tied together with laces of gold, and masking hoods on their heads: the ladies had tiers made of bzards of damaske gold with long haire of white gold. All these maskers dancd at one time, and after they had dancd, they put off their visors, and so were they all knowne. The admerall and lords of France hartlie thanked the king, that it pleased him to visit them with such disposit. Then the king & his companie were banketed, and had high chere: and so they departed euerie man to his lodging.

gung. The eight of October at Greenwich, was long a solemn made by the bishop of Durham, and after masse, doctor Tunstall, maister of the colles, made an eloquent proposition in praise of the matriculation to be had betwixt the Dolphin and the ladie Marie. All that daie were the strangers feasted, and at night they were brought into the hall, where was a roche full of all manner of stones, verie artificiallie made, and on the top stood five trees, the first an olive tree, on which hanged a shield of the armes of the church of Rome; the second a pineapple tree, with the armes of the emperor; the third a roser, with the armes of England; the fourth a branch of lillies, bearing the armes of France; and the fifth a pomegranat tree, bearing the armes of Spaine: in token that all these five potentates were joined together in one league against the enemies of Christs faith.

In and upon the midst of the roche sate a faire ladie, richly apparelled with a dolphin in hir lap. In this roche were ladies and gentlemen apparelled in crimson sattin, covered ouer with floures of purple sattin, embroidered upon with wrethes of gold, knit together with golden laces, and on euerie floure a hart of gold mouing. The ladies apparell was after the fashion of Inde, with kerchifes of pleasance, hat-ched with fine gold, and set with letters of Græke in gold of brillion; and the edges of their kerchifes were garnished with hanging perle. These gentlemen and ladies sat on the nepper part of the roche, and out of a cane in the said roche came ten knights, armed at all points, and fought together a faire tournee. And when they were seuered and departed, the disguisours descended from the roche, and danced a great space: and suddenly the roche moued and receiued the disguisours, and immediatlie closed againe.

Then entered a person called Report, apparelled in crimson sattin full of towngs, sitting on a sieng horse with towngs and set of gold called Pegasus. This person in French declared the meaning of the roche, the trees, and the tournee. After this pastime ended, the king and the ambassadours were serued at a banquet with two hundred and firtie dishes, and after that a bodice of spices with firtie spice plates of silver and gilt, as great as men with ease might beare. This night the cupbord in the hall was of twelue stages all of plate of gold, and no gilt plate. When that euerie man had bene plentifully serued, the tables were taken vp, and the king with the quene and all the strangers departed to their lodgings.

After diuerse iusts & feasts made for the said ambassadours by the king and lords: sir Thomas Cromwell maior of London made to them a coslie dinner at Goldsmiths hall, which dinner they highlie praised, it was so well ordered. And when the time came, they toke their leaue of the king, the quene, and the kings counsell, and deliuered into the kings possession their foure hostages (as you haue heard before). At which departing the king gaue to the admerall of France a garb of gilt vessel, a paire of covered basens gilt, twelue great gilt boles, foure paire of great gilt pots, a standing cup of gold, garnished with great pearles: and to some other also, he gaue plate, to some chains of gold, to some rich apparell, and to some great hosties with rich hards, so that euerie gentleman was well rewarded; which liberalitie the strangers much praised: and after that all their trusles were readie they departed towards the sea, and toke ship and landed at Bullogne.]

Shortlie after their departure, the earle of Worcester, lord chamberleine, the bishop of Elie, the lord of saint Johns, sir Nicholas Maur, sir John Pechie, sir Thomas Bullen, as ambassadours from the king of England, accompanied with thre score and ten knights, gentlemen and peomen, to the number of foure hundred and aboue, passed the sea to Calis, and so from thence went to Paris, where they were noblely receiued, & being brought to the French kings presence, the bishop of Elie made a solempne oration touching the mariage and peace concluded, & to intertaine the English ambassadours and gentlemen; the French king had made a banquetting house in the bastill of Paris betwene foure old walles. This house was covered with cords streined by craft, and euerie cord was wound about with bor, and so laid crosswise one ouer an other in fret, and at the meetings a great knop gilt with gold soile. Ou-er their cords was streined wollen cloaths of light blew: this rose was foure score fot high, and on euerie side thre stages high: all the pillars of the stages were covered with antike works, & the breasts of the stages curiouslie wrought with armes, vincts, and branches: the rose was set full of starres gilt & furnished with glasse betwene the frets. In this house was two hundred and twelue branches gilt hanged, & on euerie branch a great number of lights of white wax.

Diuerse sorts of masks were shewed also that night: and at euerie side of the palace a great cupbord of masse plate of much greatnesse was set, the French king welcomning the lords and ambassadours with good countenance.] Here is to be remembred, that immediatlie after the conclusion of the mariage, a rumoz was raised, that the Dolphin was dead before, and that this mariage was but a colourable pretext, deuised of the Frenchmen for a policie to come by their purpose: and therefore, after that the English ambassadours had bene feasted and intertained with banquetting and princelie pastime, the bishop of Elie, with sir Thomas Bullen, and sir Richard Weston, were appointed to go vnto Contacke to see the Dolphin, where they were honorablely receiued, and brought vnto the presence of the Dolphin, being a goodlie young child, whome they kissed and embraced in most louing wise.

The earle of Worcester, and with him sir Nicholas Maur, sir John Pechie, sir Edward Bellnap, and diuerse others at the same time, toke leaue of the French king, and rode to Corneile to see the citie deliuered to the Frenchmen. Whereupon, the eight of Februarie, the lord Chatillon came thither with one and twentie hundred men; and after some controuersie moued about the deliuerie of his commission, and sealing an indenture, which the earle had there readie ingrossed, containing the articles of agreement, in consideration whereof it was deliuered, the captaine sir Richard Feringham was discharged, and the Frenchmen suffered to enter with drummalls and minstrells, but not with standards nor banners, which the Englishmen caused them to roll vp greatlie against their wills. Before they came to the gates, they sealed the indenture, confessing how they receiued the citie as a gift, and not as a right, and deliuered their commission, whereby they were authorized to receiue it, which at the first they refused to do, affirming that it was sufficient for them to shew it.

Thus was Corneile deliuered in this tenth yeare of the kings reigne, on the eight daie of Februarie, & the Englishmen returned into England, soze displeased in their minds. For thereby manie a tall peoman lacked liuing, the which would not labour after their returne, but fell to robbing, pilfering, thieving, and other extraordinary meanes of maintenance, whereas before they were staied vpon a certaintie of hope, so long as they had allowance by the king. So that this resignation of Corneile, though it were answerable to the desire of the French king, and commendous for his people, yet that benefit of theirs byed

The light and mistlike demeanour of diuerse yong gentlemen of England & the French king.

During this time remained in the French court diuerse yong gentlemen of England, and they with the French king rode daillie disguised through Paris, throwing egges, stones, and other foolish trifles at the people, which light demeanour of a king was much discommended and leasted at. And when these yong gentlemen came againe into England, they were all French, in eating, drinking, and apparell, pea, and in French vices and brags, so that all the estates of England were by them laughed at: the ladies and gentlewomen were dispraised, so that nothing by them was praised, but if it were after the French turne, which after turned them to displeasure, as you shall heare.

After the kings ambassadours were returned, and Tornaie deliuered to the Frenchmen upon the conditions aforesaid, the hostages that were here left for the payment of the great summes and performance of the conditions compiled in the league (of the which one was, that if the marriage took none effect, then the citie of Tornaie should be redeliuered upon repayment of the same summes) the said hostages knew not in what case they stood, but when they knew it, they were verie braue and resolute: howbeit, they dissembled the matter in the best wise they could. The king used familiarly these foure hostages, and on the seventh daie of Maie prepared a disguising, and caused his great chamber at Græntwich to be staged, and great lights to be set on pilloes that were gilt, with basons gilt, and the rose was covered with blue taffat set full of pusses of fine gold and flowers: and vnder was written Lamies, the meaning whereof was, that the flower of youth could not be oppressed.

Into this chamber came the king, and the quene, with the hostages, and there was a goodlie comedie of Plautus played; and that done, there entered into the chamber eight ladies in blacke velvet bordered about with gold, with hoes from the waist downeward, and sleeves ruffed and plited at the elbow, and plaine in the middle, full of cuts, plucked out at euerie cut with fine camerike, & tired like the Egyptians verie richlie. And when these ladies had passed about the place, in came eight noble personages in long gownes of taffata set with flowers of gold bullion, and vnder that apparell cotes of blacke velvet embroidered with gold all to cut, and plucked out with cuts of white sarcenet, and euerie man had buskins of blacke velvet full of aggets of gold.

When the eight men danced with the eight ladies all being disguised, and suddenlie the men cast off their large gownes, and then their vnder apparell was seene. And when all was done, euerie lord and ladie put off their disguises, and then it was knowne that the king, the duke of Suffolke, and the French quene were there, which were present at the plaie time. On the eighth daie of March was a solemn iustices, the king himselfe, and eight yong gentlemen habed and habarded in blacke velvet embroidered with gold, against the duke of Suffolke, and eight of his band, all in white taffat with drops of gold. And that daie they all ran exceedingly well, which the strangers highlie commended.

About the end of March, the king sent for all the yeomen of the gard that were come from Tornaie, and after manie good words giuen to them, he granted to euerie of them foure pence the daie without attendance, except they were speciallie commanded. And here it seemeth requisite to adde the report of a forreine chronicler touching the league of amitie and conditions of the same, knit vp in breuitie and godtearmes as followeth. Now (saith he) the differences betwene the French and English were also reconciled. And for the more stabilitie of which agreement, it was confirmed with a contract of parentage and alliance, wherein the king of England promised to giue his onelie daughter, to whome hauing no sons, there was hope of the descending & succession of the kingdom to the Dolphin the eldest sonne of the croiue of France, adding for a portion foure hundred thousand duckets. Both the one and the other boze yet so tender age, that infinit accidents might happen, before perfection of yeres would make them able to establish matrimonie. There was made betwene them a league defensue, wherein were comprehended Cesar, and the king of Spaine, in case they would ratifie it in a certaine time.

The king of England bound himselfe to restore Tornaie, receiuing presentlie for detraiments expended upon that towne, two hundred and threescore thousand duckets, and threescore hundred thousand to be defalked of the portion, and to paie threescore thousand more in the space of twelue yeres. The French king also was bound, that if the peace and the parentage followed not, to render vp againe into the hands of the English, the towne of Tornaie. Manie ambassadours were sent from both the realmes to negotiate this league, and to receiue the ratifications and othes, by whome in the courts of both the kings the acts of the accord were dispatched with great solemnitie and ceremonie, with a resolution of an interuention of both the kings betwene Calis and Bullongne, immediatlie after the restitution of Tornaie.

About the same time, the daughter of the French king, appointed to be married to the king of Spaine, being dead, the former peace and capitulation was effronces reconfirmed betwene them, wherein was promised the marriage of the second daughter of France. Both the kings celebrated this coniunction with most great demonstrations of perfect amitie: for the king of Spaine, hauing paid in at Lyons an hundred thousand duckets, waite publickly the order of saint Michaell upon the day of the celebration of the same, and in recompense of that honour: the French king, upon the daie dedicated to saint Andrew, was honorable attired in the robes and colour of the golden fleece.

About this time, John Ja. Trimmice, whome neither old age reduced almost to the last time, nor his vertue so oftentimes expressed in the service of the truce of France could anie waie aid or comfort (being both ambitious and impatient, and therefore enuied) following the French court, fell sicke at Charters, where he gaue vp to the king, his innocente and complaints, and made to God the last reckoning of his aged daies. He was a man in the iudgement of manie, and confirmed by sundrie experiences, of singular valour in the discipline of warre, and ran a race alwaies opposed to the inconstancie of fortune, who (according to his mutabilitie) made him feele the operation of both his humors, sometimes reioicing in his fauour, and erst againe finding his sorrow and of a bitter task. By his commandement were written upon his tombe these words, not disagreeable to the variable condition and course of his naturall life:

I find the rest within my graue,
Which in my life I could not haue.]

The death of the emperor Spartimilian 1552.

A description
of the emperor
and qualities.

The position given to the king's daughter of Eng-
land.

In this yeare the twelue of Februarie, died the emperor Spartimilian, for whome the king caused a solemn obsequie to be kept in Poules church. & He died at Lutz, a towne vpon the marches of Austria, where he remained for his delight and pleasure in hunting the wild boze, and other chases of the field.
He liued alwaies vnder one condition of fortune, who manie times fauoured him, in offering him manie faire occasions, & as often wrought against him in not suffering him to take the fruit and effect of them. He was by nature inconstant and remoue-able, and had conceits and impressions verie ill disposed and different from the iudgement of other men, joined to an excessive prodigalitie and dissipation of monie.

Spatters which cut off from him the effects and successe of all occasions, being otherwise a prince most perfect and instructed in the ordering of warre, secret to laie and dispose a plot, diligent to follow it, of boote able and suffering, of mind affable and easie, and replenished with manie other excellent gifts and ornaments. Vnto some of these properties, the god seruice which he did the king of England at Terwin grueth proue, at that time both he and his people marched vnder the English ensigne, and receiued paye as spendarie souldiours; whose wages the king had a care to paie, as maie appeare by his coining of silver monie, whereof was scarcitie in his campe, in respect of gold, wherewith the souldiours were well loyed, as one doth verie well make report, saieing:

Pro mercede nihil nisi fuluum soluitur aurum, Auri militibus radiantis copia totis Tanta fuit castris, ut rex cudi se coactus Nummum ex argento fuerit.

Altho as the emperor was dead, the French king and the king of Spaine began manifestlie to aspire to the empire, the purchase whereof albeit was a matter of right great importance, and no lesse the emulation running betwene two so mightie princes, yet they ordered their ambition with great mo-destie, neither vsing words of inturie, nor threats of armes; but either one labouring by his authoritie, & by his meanes, to draw on his side the electors. The French king sundrie times reasoned touching the election with great comelinesse with the Spanish
agreeable and conuenient, that either of them seuerallie should seeke by honest meanes to increase the honour of his house by so great a dignitie: which for that in times before had bene transferred into the families of their predecessours, there was now the lesse occasion to breed betwene them two matter of inturie, nor diminution of their amitie and good will.

But rather he wished, that in the action of the empire, they might follow the example and order of two young louers, who albeit they follow the quest of one labie, and either one labourer by his industrie to carie hit; yet they forbere to come to contention. The king of Spaine alluded with good right, that the empire appertained to him, as hauing continued by a long succession of time in the house of Austria, and that it had not bene the custome of the electors to deprive the issue of the emperor, without manifest cause of their disability, neither was there anie in Germanie of that puissance and authoritie to make him equall to stand competitor with him in that election. And least of all did he hold it iust or like-lie, that the electors would transport to a forreine or strange prince, so great a dignitie continued by so manie ages in the nation of Germanie.

And albeit some particular amongst them, either through the insinuation of monie, or other proprie of corruption, might be allured to another intention, yet he hoped to stop him with force prepared in time conuenient, not doubting also but the other electors also would oppose against him, and the princes and free townes of Germanie would not in-dure so vsuerfall an infamie, spectallie to suffer it to be laid vpon the person of the French king, which would be no other thing than to make great the puissance of a king enemie vnto their nation, and from whome there was no suertie that the imperiall dignities would euer retorne into Germanie: he thought it would be an action easie to obtaine and reduce to perfection, that which had bin solicited by his grandfather, who had already compounded for recompenses and donations, and other diuidents for euerie of the electors.

On the other side, the desire of the French king was as great, and no lesse were his hopes, which toke their principall foundation vpon an opinion he had to corrupt the voices of the electors with his huge summes of monie: especiallie for that there were a mongest them both pensionaries to him, and otherwise assured by manie god offices, who encouraging him with the facilitie of the enterprise, pushed him on to embrace it. And for his part, as mostall men are apt to beleue the thing they desire, so he nourished that hope with reasons rather apparant than true:
he knew that commonlie it was a matter grievous to the princes of Germanie to haue the emperors mightie; being gealous that in so great a puissance, they would not either in part or in all, quarrell the su-risdictions and authorities imperiall occupied by manie of them. In which reason he perswaded himselfe, that they would in no sort consent to the election of the Spaniard, & so of themselves to subiect themselves to an emperor more mightie than had bene since a long descent and race of emperors. A matter which in his person seemed to be qualified, for that hauing neither estates nor ancient alliances in Ger-manie, they had no occasion of suspicion of his great-nesse.

The same reason also made him beleue well of the conformitie of the free townes, in whome much lesse that the regard of the glorie of the nation would carie it from him, seeing it would helpe to petye the ballance on his side, for that with most men the motions of proper and private interest maie doe more, than the respect of publike and generall profit. He knewe it was not a little grievous to manie noble houses of Germanie, pretending to be capable of such a dignitie, to see the empire continue so long time in one house; but much more did it discontent them to suffer that so great an estate, which of right ought sometimes to be giuen to one of them, and sometime to passe to another, should become a perpetuall descent and succession in one line: inso much as they might call inheritance and succession that election, which durst not leaue the line of the emperors. That in that sort the empire was translated from Albert de Austria to Frederike his brother, and from Frederike to Spartimilian his sonne; and now there was denise to passe it from Spartimilian to the person of Charles his grandchild.

By these humors and indignations of the princes of Germanie, he toke hope that the discords and gealonies among themselves might helpe on his cause, the rather for that it often happeneth in the contentions of men, that he that is excluded, or the par-tie to whome he fauoreth, runneth with a naturall rashnesse rather to call in, and to aduance a third, than to giue place to him that hath opposed against his intention. Moreover, the French king was not without his hopes in the fauour of the pope, both in regard of the amitie and alliance betwixt them; and also for that he was not ignorant how in-conuenient it would be to the see apostolike to haue

begin to quarrel for the empire.

Existing of the claim to the empire.

In this yeare the twelue of February, died the emperor spartimilian, for whome the king caused a solemne obsequie to be kept in Boules church. ¶ He died at 11. uiz, a tostone upon the marches of Austria,
hunting the wild boze, and other chases of the field.
He liued alwaies vnder one condition of fortune,
them. He was by nature inconstant and remone-able, and had conceits and impressions verie ill dis-
on of monie.

¶ Matters which cut off from him the effects and
most perfect and instructed in the ordering of warre,
secret to laie and dispose a plot, diligent to follow it,
of bodie able and suffering, of mind affable and easie,
and replenished with manie other excellent gifts and ornaments. Vnto some of these properties, the good seruice which he did the king of England at Terwin giueth pzoofe, at what time both he and his people marched vnder the English ensigne, and receiued pate as spendarie souldiours; whose wages the king had a care to paie, as maie appeare by his coining
of silver monie, whereof was scarcitie in his campe,
in respect of gold, wherewith the souldiours were well sized, as one doth verie well make report, saieing:

Pro mercede nihil nisi fulsum soluitur aurum, Auri militibus radiantis copia totis Tanta fuit castris, ut rex condidisse coactus Nummum ex argento fuerit.

aspire to the empire, the purchase wherof albeit was a matter of right great importance, and no lesse the
emulation running betwene two so mightie princes, yet they ordered their ambition with great mo-destie, neither vsing words of iniurie, nor threats of armes; but either one labouring by his authoritie,
agreable and conuenient, that either of them seu-rallie should sake by honest meanes to increase the honour of his house by so great a dignitie: which for that in times befoze had bene transferred into the families of their predecessours, there was now the lesse occasion to beare betwene them two matter of iniurie, nor diminution of their amitie and good will.

But rather he tolted, that in the action of the
two yong louers, who albeit they follow the quest of one labie, and either one labourer by his industrie to carie hir; yet they forbere to come to contention. The king of Spaine alladed with good right, that the empire appertained to him, as hauing continued by a long succession of time in the house of Austria, and
deprive the issue of the emperor, without manifest cause of their disability, neither was there anie
in Germanie of that puissance and authoritie to
lie, that the electors would transport to a fozeine or strange prince, so great a dignitie continued by so
manie ages in the nation of Germanie.

ther electors also would opose against him, and the princes and free towncs of Germanie would not in-dure so brisuerfall an infamie, speciallie to suffer it to be laid upon the person of the French king, which would be no other thing than to make great the puissance of a king entirie vnto their nation, and from
nitie would euer returne into Germanie: he thought
perfection, that which had bin solicited by his grand-
the electors.

On the other side, the desire of the French king
apt to beleue the thing they desire, so he nourished
that hope with reasons rather apparant than true:
to the princes of Germanie to haue the emperors
mightie; being gealous that in so great a puissance,
manie of them. In which reason he perswaded him-
of the Spaniard, & so of themselves to subiect themselues to an emperor more mightie than had bene
which in his person seemed to be qualified, for that ha-
uing neither estates nor ancient alliances in Ger-
manie, they had no occasion of suspicion of his great-
nesse.

the conformitie of the free towncs, in whome much lesse that the regard of the glorie of the nation would carie it from him, seeing it would helpe to peise the ballance on his side, for that with most men the motions of proper and priuate interest maie do more, than the respect of publike and generall profit. He knewe it was not a little grieuous to manie noble
sometimes to be given to one of them, and sometime
cent and succession in one line: inso much as they might call inheritance and succession that election,
in that sort the empire was translated from Albert
de Austria to Frederike his brother, and from Frederike to Spartimilian his sonne; and now there was deuile to passe it from Spartimilian to the person of Charles his grandchild.

By these humors and indignations of the princes of Germanie, he toke hope that the discords and gealousies among themselves might helpe on his cause, the rather for that it often hapeneth in the contentions of men, that he that is excluded, or the par-tie whome he fauoreth, runneth with a naturall rathnesse rather to call in, and to aduance a third,
than to giue place to him that hath opposed against

want to the duke of Buckingham: yet at length by on his humble craving of mercie, still kneeling on his knees before his grace, the king pardoned him his offense: and likewise he pardoned the lord Howard, and sir Pat the Wroth, their offenses: but because the lord Dgles matter concerned murder, he remitted him to the common law. And then he rose and went to his barge, and by the waie made James Parford maior of the citie of London knight, and so returned to Lambeth.

The French king desirous to continue the friendship lately begun betwixt him and the king of England, made meanes unto the cardinall, that they might in some convenient place come to an interview together, that he might have further knowlege of king Henrie, and likewise king Henrie of him.
But the same went that the cardinall desired great-lie, of himselfe, that the two kings might meet, who mesuring by his will what was convenient, thought it should make much with his glorie, if in France also at some high assemblee of noble men, he should be scene in his baine pompe and shew of dignitie: he therefore breaketh with the king of that matter, declaring how honourable, necessarie, and convenient it should be for him to gratifie his friend therein, and thus with his persuasions the k. began to conceive an earnest desire to see the French king, and thereupon appointed to go ouer to Calis, and so in the marshes of Guisnes to meet with him.

Then were there sent unto Guisnes, under the rule of sir Edward Welknep three thousand artifi-cers, which builded out of the earth on the plaine before the castell of Guisnes, a most pleasant palace of timber, right curiouslie garnished without and within. Herewith were letters writtten to all such lords, ladies, gentlemen, and gentlewomen, which should give their attendance on the king and queene, which incontinentlie put themselves in a readinesse after the most sumptuous sort. Also it was appointed that the king of England, & the French king, in a campe betwixt Ard and Guisnes, with eightene aides, should in June next insuing abide all commers being gentlemen, at the tilt, at tourneie, and at barr-ers, whereof proclamattion was made by Orleans king of armes of France here in the court of England, and by Clarenceur king of armes of England in the court of France, and in the court of Burgognie, and in diuerse other courts and places in Almanie and Italie.

During the time of these preparations, newes were brought to the king, that Charles his nephue elected emperor of Almanie, would shortly depart out of Spaine by sea, and come by England to go to Acon or Aip (a citie of fame and renowne in Ger-manie, for the ancient residence and sepulchre of Charlemaine) where he receiued the first crowne.
Wherefore the king hearing of this determination of the emperor, caused great provisions to be made at euerie haue, for the receiuing of his welbeloued nephue and friend: & daillie provisions were made on all sides for these noble meetings of so high princes: and especiallie the queene of England, and the ladie Dowager of France, made great cost on the apparell of their ladies and gentlewomen.

On the first daie of Februarie being Candle-masse euen, as the king and queene were come from euen-song at there manour of Greenwich, before the queenes chamber there blew a trumpet suddenlie, and then entered into the queens chamber foure gentlemen apparelled in long and large garments of blew damaske bordered with gold, and brought with them a trickie waggon, in the which sat a ladie rich-lie apparelled, with a canopie ouer hir head: and on the foure corners of the waggon were foure hedpieces called armites, euerie pece being of a sundrie deuise. The said ladie put by a bill to the king, the effect whereof was, that the foure gentlemen present would (for the loue of their ladies) answer all com-mers at the tilt at a daie by the king to be appointed: which daie was appointed at Shouetide next insu-ing. At which daie the foresaid gentlemen ballantlie accomplished their enterprisse, with great lauds of the king, the queene, and the ladies.

Whereouer, now that it was concluded, that the kings of England and France should meet (as yet haue heard) they both the kings committed the order and manner of these meetings, and how manie daies the same should last, & what preheminence each should giue to other, unto the cardinall of Yorke, which to set all things in a certaintie, made an instrument, containing an order and direction concerning the premisses by him deuised and appointed.

mitted to the high and right puissant princes, Henrie by the grace of God, king of England, and of France, lord of Ireland, my so-ueraigne lord: and Francis by the same grace, k. of France right chiftene, made and concluded at London the eight daie of October, the yere of our Lord one thousand five hundred and eightene, be among other things concluded and accorded, that the same meeting shall be in place indifferent, and not subiect to any of the said princes. Wherefore we, considering the honour, profit, and utilitie, that shall rebound by the interuiew of the said two princes, and not onelie to the said two princes, their realmes and subiects, but also to all christendome, after declaration hereupon had

Also considering that the said illustre king of England my soueraigne lord, in passing the sea with his retinue, shall susteine great costs and expences, and dispose himselfe to great labours and dangers, leauing his realme and puissance for certeine time, we haue thought & esteemed, that he should not be wholie satisfied to the honour and dignitie of the same, right illustre king of England my soueraigne lord, and should not haue in regard condigne of his labours and dangers, if the said interuiew or meeting after the first treatie shuld be in place indifferent. Wherefore it is that we desiring to weie equallie the honor and dignitie of the said two kings, by vertue and power of the commissions to vs giuen, of whom the tenours shall be hereafter declared: we haue made, declared, and orde-ned certeine articles accepted & approued by the same princes respectiuelie, which they will obserue, and by these presents we make, declare, and ordeine as followeth.

And first we declare and ordeine, that before the end of the moneth of Maie next comming, the said illustre king of England shall come personallie to the castle of Guis-come in person to his castle of Ard with the quene & his mother : and some day, houre, and time, within foure daies at the most, after the end of Maie, that shall be assigned by the commissioners of the one and the other partie ; the said king of England shall issue out of his castell of Guisnes half a mile long, without that that he shall issue out of the limits of his demain of Guisnes, and shall come towards the said castell of

And the said right christened king, par-day, place, time, and houre, that shall tarie him within the demaine of Guisnes, as is said. In the which shall not be set or dres-said two kings being on horsebacke, with their retinue shall see the one the other, and salute each other, and speake together familiarly, and common in that sort and maner, and so long as shall seme to them good.

And after the said salutation and communication finished for that time, the said il-kings were to

Item, for so much that we thinke to be right christened king at the first speaking, he shall come forward vnto, and within his territorie of Guisnes, we will keepe the ho-and ordeine, that on the morrow after the first interuiew, the same kings shall meet together in some fit place, indifferent be-twene Ard and Guisnes, that shall be assigned by the said commissioners.

And after the salutation made on the one and the other partie, the said right il-lustre king of England shall go to the castell of Ard, to see, salute, and visit the quene of France, and also the sister of the said christened king, with whome he shall dine priuily. And likewise the said right christened king shall go to the castell of Guisnes, to visit and salute the quene of England, and the Dowagere of France, with whome he shall dine. In the which places the said princes shall be receiued familiarly and amiably, vnto mutuall loue, and also to the honour of the said princes.

Item, as the said serene princes of England & France, be like in force corporall, beautie, & gift of nature, right expert & having knowledge in the art militant, right cheualcous in armes, & in the flower and vigour of youth, whereby seemed to vs a right assemble, that for to adorne and honore the same assemble, and to shew their forces in armes, they shall take counsell and dispose themselves to do some faire feat of armes, as well on foot as on horsebacke, against all commers : we declare and or-deine, that the place where shall be the said fight and feat of armes, shall be chosen be-twene Guisnes and Ard, and assigned by the commissioners of the one and the other partie.

And for a suertie of the persons of the said kings & their companie, the said place shall be apparellied, ditched, fortified, and kept of the one and the other partie, by equall number of men of armes, respectue-lie committed and deputed that to do. And during the time of the said iusts and feats of warre, the same kings and quenes with their retinue, shall see each other familiarly, and conuerse and speake together. And e-uerie daie towards the evening, after the iusts, triumphs, bankets, & familiar communications done, the said kings with their retinue shall returne into their castles, that is to say, the king of England into his castell of Guisnes, & the said right christened king into his castell of Ard, and thus they shall do daillie, during the said fight and feat of armes.

Item, we declare and ordeine, that when the same king of England and the quene his bedfellow, & the Dowagere of France his sister, with their retinue, shall go to the territorie and entrie of the foresaid right christened king, the superiortie and preheminence shall be given to the said king of England, to the quene his bedfellow, and to their retinue respectuelie, during the time that they shall tarie and be there : and semblable when the said right christened king, and the quene his bedfellow and his right illustre ladie and mother, with their retinue shall come to the territorie and en-trie of the said illustre king of England, the superiortie and preheminece shall be gi-uen to the said right christened king, to the quene his bedfellow, and to his mother, and to their retinue during the time that they shall continue and abide there.

Item, forsomuch as the castles and places where the said interuiew shall be, be so little and narrow, that if entrie and licence to come thither be given to all them that would go thither, diuers annoiances, troubles & impechments should follow : wherfore it is so, that we the cardinall aboue said, by these presents declare and ordeine, that none of the retinue of the said kings, quenes, or other lords and nobles, of what estate, qualitie, or condition that he or they be of, shall not come to the said assemble with more great number of persons or horse, than shall be written by letters subscribed by the said kings : the which shall containe the estates and conditions of the persons, as well men as women, and number of seruants and horse, except the comclermen, and household seruants, shall see and conuerle together familiarlie, to the end that it maie ingender betwene them an amitie more firme and stable, for that cause, and that more suertie and agreeable they may be together, as well by day as by night without any danger or feare, which we desire to prouide: we declare and ordeine that two gentlemen, with sufficient companie of equall like number, be committed and deputed, respectiuelie by the said kings for the keeping and suertie of the waies and watches, that shall be made continually during the assemble of the said kings. The which gentlemen, with their companies, shall ordeine and depute explozatoz and spies in the ballies, forrests, woods, towngs, burrowes, villages, castels, passages, and waies, and other places dangerous and suspect: from time to time, and houre to houre, as well towards Flanders, as Picardie, Artois, & England, to exploit and watch there.

And if anie be found suspect, them to repulle and take awaie, to the end that not onelie the said princes, their gentlemen, and household seruants, maie suertie and without feare visit the one the other, as said is: but also those that shall bring bitels necessarie to the said assemble, maie without danger, trouble, impechement, or noisance go and come: the which explozatoz shall be bounden euerie daie in the morning and euening, to make report to the said princes or to their said counsellors respectiuelie, of that which they found, and in what estate the waies be. Item, we cardinall aboue said, by expresse authoritie and power to vs giuen, by these presents, bind the said princes to do, fulfill, and accomplish, all and euerie things aboue said herein contained. Finally, we declare and ordeine, that ech of the said kings on his partie, shall ratifie, confirme, and approue all and euerie the chapters and articles aboue said, by their letters pattents sealed with their hands. And by the same letters of ratification they shall be bounden, to accomplish with good faith and word of a king, all and euerie the things aboue said: the which letters made, subscribed, and sealed, as is said, they shall giue the one the other, and shall change in the cite of London, within one moneth next after the date of these presents. Made the twelue of March, the yeare of our Lord a thousand five hundred and ninetene.

The parties of the realme receiuing letters to prepare themselves to attend the king in this iournie, and no apparant necessarie cause expresse, why nor wherefore; seemed to grudge, that such a costlie iournie should be taken in hand to their importunate charges and expences, without consent of the whole boord of the counsell. But namelie the duke of Buckingham, being a man of a lustie courage, but not most liberall, fore repined that he should be at so great charges for his furniture forth at this time, saing; that he knew not for what cause so much monie should be spent about the sight of a vaine talke to be had, and communication to be ministered of things of no importance. Wherefore he sticke not to saie, that it was an intollerable matter to be such a vile and importunate person.

The duke indeed could not abide the cardinall, and speciallie he had of late conceived an inward malice against him for sir William Bulmers cause, whose trouble was onelie procured by the cardinall; who first caused him to be cast in prison. How such greuous words as the duke thus vttered against him, came to the cardinals eare; whereupon he cast before hand all waies possible to haue him in a trip, that he might cause him to leape headlesse. But because he doubted his friends, kinnemen, and alies, and cheslie the earle of Surrie lord admerall, which had married the dukes daughter, he thought good first to send him some whither out of the waie, lest he might cast a trumpe in his waie. There was great enmitie betwixt the cardinall and the earle, for that on a time, when the cardinall toke vpon him to cheeke the earle, he had like to haue thrust his dagger into the cardinall.

At length there was occasion offered him to compass his purpose, by occasion of the earle of Kildare his coming out of Ireland. For the cardinall knowing he was well prouided of monie, sought occasion to steere him of part thereof. The earle of Kildare being unmarried, was desirous to haue an English woman to wife; and for that he was a suter to a widow contrarie to the cardinals mind, he accused him to the king, of that he had not bozned himselfe byrightlie in his office in Ireland, where he was the kings lieutenant. Such accusations were framed against him when no bribes would come, that he was committed to prison, and then by the cardinals good preferment the earle of Surrie was sent into Ireland as the kings depute, in lieu of the said earle of Kildare, there to remaine rather as an erle, than as lieutenant to the king, euen at the cardinals pleasure, as he himselfe well perceived.

In the beginning of Aprill, the said earle passed ouer into Ireland, and had with him diuerse gentlemen that had bene in the garrison of Cornate, and one hundred peomen of the kings gard, and others, to the number of a thousand men, where he by his manhood and policie brought the earle of Desmond and diuerse other rebels to good consojmitie and order. He continued there two yeares, in which space he had manie bickerings and skintishes with the wild Irish. There rested yet the earle of Northumberland, whose the cardinall doubted also, lest he might hinder his purpose, when he should go about to weake his malice against the duke of Buckingham: and therefore he picked a quarell to him, for that he had seized vpon certeine wards which the cardinall said appertained of right to the king. And because the earle would not giue over his title, he was also committed to prison, & after toke it for a great benefit at the cardinals hands, that he might be deliuered out of his danger.

How in this meane while, the cardinall ceased not to bring the duke out of the kings fauour, by such such forged tales, and contrived surmises, as he da-lie put into the kings head: insomuch that (through the infelicitie of his fate) diuerse accidents fell out to the auantage of the cardinall; which he not omitting, achieved the thing whereat he so studiouse (for the satisfiing of his cankered & malicious stomach) laid full ayme. Now it chanced that the duke com-ming to London with his traine of men, to attend the king into France, went before into Kent unto a manor place which he had there. And whilest he staid in that countrie till the king set forward, greuous complaints were exhibited to him by his farmers and tenants against Charles Inceut his surerour, for such bybing as he had vied there amongst them.

Whereupon the duke toke such displeasure against him, that he depriued him of his office, not knowing how that in so doing he procured his owne destruction, as after appeared.

Anno Reg. 12.

The king setteth forward towards France.

The kings maiestie perscuering in purpose to meet with Francis the French king, remoned with the quene, and all his court, the one & twentieth day of Maie being mondaie, from his manor of Greenwich towards the sea side: and so on the fridaie the siue and twentieth of Maie, he arriued at the citie of Canturburie, intending there to keepe his Whitsuntide. On the morrow after, the emperor being on the sea returning out of Spaine, arriued with all his nanie of ships roiall on the coast of Kent, direct to the port of Which the said daie by none, where hee was saluted by the viceadmerall of England, sir William Fitz William, with sir of the kings great ships well furnished, which late for the safegard of passage betwixt Calis and Douer. Towards euening the emperor departed from his ships, and entered into his bote, and comming towards land, was met and receined of the lord cardinall of Bozke with such reuerence as to so noble a prince appertained.

The meeting

and H. Henrie

castell.

The emperor
and H. Henrie
keepe Whitsuntide at Canturburie.

Thus landed the emperor Charles the sixt at Douer, vnder his cloth of estate of the blacke eagle, all spread on rich cloth of gold. He had with him manie noble men, and manie faire ladies of his blood.
When he was come on land, the lord cardinall conducted him to the castell of Douer, which was prepared for him in most roiall manner. In the morning, the king rode with all hast to the castell of Douer to welcome the emperor, and entering into the castell, alighted. Of whose comming the emperor hauing knowledge, came out of his chamber, and met him on the staires, where either of them embraced other in most louing maner, and then the king brought the emperor to his chamber. On Whitsuntide earlie in the morning, they toke their horses, and rode to the citie of Canturburie, the more to keepe solemne the feast of Pentecost: but speciallie to see the quene of England his aunt was the emperor his intent, of whome ye may be sure he was most iollie recei-ued and welcomed.

Thus the emperor and his retinue, both of lords and ladies, kept their Whitsuntide with the king and quene of England, in the citie of Canturburie with all ioy and iollie. The emperor yet him selfe seemed not so much to delight in pastime and pleasure, but that in respect of his youthfull yeares, there appeared in him a great shew of grauitie: for they could by no means bring him to dance amongst the residue of the princes, but onelie was contented to be a looker on. Peraduenture the sight of the ladie Marie troubled him, whome he had sometime loued, and yet through fortunes euill hap might not haue hir to wife. The chiefe cause that moued the emperor to come thus on land at this time, was to perswade that by word of mouth, which he had before done most ear-nestlie by letters; which was, that the king should not meet with the French king at anie interuiew: for Polydor.

he doubted least if the king of England & the French king should grow into some great friendship and faithfull bond of amitie, it might turne him to displeasure.

But now that he perceined how the king was forward on his iourne, he did what he could to procure, that no trust should be committed to the faire wordes of the Frenchmen: and that if it were possible, the great friendship that was now in breeding betwixt the two kings, might be dissolued. And for somuch as he knew the lord cardinall to be loue with rewards, as a fish with a bait: he bestowed on him great gifts, and promised him much more, so that he would be his friend, and helpe to bring his purpose to passe. The cardinall not able to susteine the least assault by force of such rewards as he presentlie recei-ued, and of such large promises as on the emperours behalf were made to him, promised to the emperour, that he would so vse the matter, as his purpose should be sped: onelie he required him not to disalowe the kings intent for interuiew to be had, which he desired in anie wise to go forward, that he might shew his high magnificence in France, according to his first intention.

The emperor remained in Canturburie till the thursdaie, being the last of Maie, and then taking leauie of the king, and of his aunt the quene, departed to Sandwich, where he toke his ships and sailed into Flanders. The same daie, the king made saile from the port of Douer, and landed at Calis about eleuen of the clocke, and with him the quene and ladies, & manie nobles of the realme. His grace was receined into the chequer, and there rested. The fourth of June, the king and quene with all their traine remoued from Calis, to his princelie lodging netwile created beside the towne of Guines, the most noble & roiall lodging that euer before was seene. For it was a palace, the which was quadrant, and euerie quadrant of the same palace was three hundred and twentie eight foot long of assise, which was in compasse thirtene hundred and twelue foot about. This palace was set on stages by great cunning & sumptuous worke.

At the entering into the palace before the gate, on the plaine greene, was builded a fountaine of im-bowed worke, gilt with fine gold, and dice, ingrailed with antike worke: the old god of wine called Bacchus bierling the wine, which by the conduits in the earth ran to all people plentiouslie with red, white, and claret wine, ouer whose head was written in letters of Romane in gold, Faicte bonne chere qui voudra. On the other hand of side of the gate was set a pillar, which was of ancient Romane worke, bozne with foure lions of gold, the pillars was set in a wreath of gold curiously wrought and intrailed, and on the summit of the said pillar stood an image of the blind god Cupid, with his bow and arrowes of loue, readie by his seeming to strike the yong people to loue.

The foregate of the same palace of place with great and mightie masonrie by sight was arched, with a tower on euerie side of the same port, rered by great craft, and imbatelled was the gate and tower, and in the fenestres and windowes were images resembling men of warre, readie to cast great stones.
Also the same gate or tower was set with compa-sed images of ancient princes, as Hercules, Alexander, and other by intrailed worke, richlie limned with gold and albine colours: and well and warlike was made ouer the gate loupes, and inforced with bat-telments, and in the same gate a lodge for the porter, which there appeared, and other sumptuouslie apparelled like unto kings officers. By the same gate all people passed into a large court faire and beutiful,

that, for in this court appeared much of the outward beautie of this place, for from the first water table, to the raising of reist paces, were baite windowes, on euerie side mixed with cleare stozies curioudic glasse, the posses of moines of euerie window was gilt.

Thus the outward part of the place lunnied the eyes of the beholders, by real in of the sumptuous worke. Also the towne of the gate (as seemed) was bulld by great masonrie, and by great engine of mans wit, for the sundrie countenances of euerie image that there appeared, some shooting, some ca sting, some readie to strike, and firing of gunnes, which shewed verie honozablie. Also all the said qua drants, baies, and collicies, were roiallie intrailed, as saie as unto the same court appertained. And direct against the gate was deuised a halpas, and at the entrie of the faile, were images of foze and terri ble countenances, all armed in curious worke of argenture. The baie of the same halpas pendant by craft of timber, & under it antike images of gold in armored with verdoz of olifs cast in compasse, moun taining their countenances toward the entring of the palace. The faile of the said halpas was cast of pas sage by the wents of hynde steps, so that from the first foot to lowell step, anie person might without paine go vnto the highest place of the same halpas.

On euerie hand was their chamber doores and enterings into the chambers of the same palace, which were long and large, and well proportioned, to receiue light and aire at pleasure: the rofes of them from place to place, and chamber to chamber were sleed, and covered with cloth of silke, of the most saie and quicke inuention that before time was seene. For the ground was white ingrailed, embowed, and batoned with rich clothes of silkes, knit and fret with cuts and braids, and sundrie new castis, that the same clothes of silke shewed like bultions of fine burned gold: and the rofes in losenges, that in the same rofe were in kindlie course, furnished so to mans sight, that no lining creature might but loy in the beholding thereof. For from the iaw pce of the said sleing (which pce was gilt with fine gold) were workes in pane paled, all the walles to the crest in countering the cleare stozies, the same crest which was of large deepnesse, the worke was antike knots with bosses cast and wrought with more cunning than I can write, all which workes and ouerages were gilt, and to set it the more to the glorie, the flou rishinge was comparable to the rich amell.

Also at the foot of the same palace was another crest all of fine set gold, whereon hanged rich & maruelous clothes of arras wrought of gold and silke, compas sed of manie ancient stozies, with which clothes of ar ras euerie wall and chamber were hanged, & all the windowes so richlie covered, that it passed all other sights before seene. In euerie chamber and euerie place convenient were clothes of estate, great and large of cloth of gold, of tissue, and rich emboderie, with chaires covered with like cloth, with pommels of fine gold, and great cushions of rich worke of the Turkie making, nothing lacked of honoutable fur nishment. Also to the same palace was reared a chappell with two clofets, the quire of the said chap pell sleed with cloth of gold, and thereon fret ingrai led bent clothes of silke, all was then silke and gold.
The altars of this chappell were hanged with rich re uerse of cloth of gold and tissue, & embowered with perles.ouer the hie altar was hanged a rich canopie of maruelous greatnesse, the altar was apparelled with fine paire of candlesticks of gold, and on the al tar an halpas, and thereon stood a crucifix all of fine gold, and in the same halpas stood twelue images of the bignes of foure peares of age, all gold.

All the copes and vestments were so rich as might be prepared or bought in the cite of Florens, for they were all but of one pce, so woven for the purpose, cloth of tissue and powdered with red rofes purpled with fine gold. The vestris set with pearles and pre cious stones. And all the walles and desces of this chappell were hanged with right cloth of gold, & three rich great croffes were there readie to be borne at festiual times, and basens and censers, gospellers, pares, crewets, holie water vessels, and other orna ments all of gold. Also in the first closet was a tra uerse for the kings person of cloth of gold, & in it his place & chaire, with cushions of cloth of gold: before the traverse was an altar of presence, which altar was adorned with cloth of broderie, and rich pearles and precious stones, set in goldsmiths worke of fine gold.
On the altar was a deske or halpas, whereon stood a patible of the crucifix of fine gold, with an image of the Trinitie, an image of the virgine Marie, and twelue other images, all fine gold & precious stones, two paire of candlesticks of fine gold, with the ba sens, crewets, pares, and other ornaments.

The said closet was hanged with tapets embro dered with rich worke fret with pearles and stones, the rofe of the same closet was sleed with worke of inmouled, gilt with fine gold, and senoper, and bise.
The second closet was for the queens person, in which was a traverse of rich cloth of gold, the altar so richlie appareiled, that there lacked neither pearles nor stones of riches. On the altar were twelue great images of gold, the closet hanged with cloth of gold, all other iewels misfall I suppose neuer such like were seene, and the rofe of the same closet was sleed with like worke that the kings closet was, as is be fore rehearsed. And from this palace or place into the mightie & strong fortresse & castell roiall of Gulesnes, was a gallerie for the secret passage of the kings person into a secret lodging within the same castell, the more for the king ease. Also to this palace was all houses of offices, that to such an honourable court should appertene, that is to wit, the lord chamberlein, lord steward, lord treasurer of the household, for the comptrolloz, the office of greene cloth, wardrobes, setwell house, and office of household seruice, as chibrie, pantrie, cellar, butterie, spicerie, picher house, larder and poultrie, and all other offices so large and saie, that the officers might & did maruell, as in the craft of biands, by ouens, harthes, terebores, chimnies, ranges, & such instrumens as there were ordeined.

In this palace (as ye haue heard) was the kings grace lodged, and all the nobles after their degrees.
And for that the towne of Gulesnes was little, and that all the noble men might not there be lodged, they set vp tents in the field, to the number of twen tie and eight hundred sundrie lodgings, which was a goodlie sight. Thus was the king in his palace roiall at Gulesnes. Francis the French king was with all his nobles of the realme of France come to the towne of Ard, which was prepared for his coming, manie tents, halles, and pavillions were set and pit ched in the field. On the French partie also there was at the same towne of Ard bullded the French kings lodging full well, but not finished. Such was the prouision in Picardie on euerie part thorough all. The French king commanded his lodging to be made a little out of the towne of Ard, in the territo rie of an old castell, which by the warre of old time had bene beaten. On the same place was edified a house of solace and sport, of large and mightie com passe, which was cheslie susteined by a great mightie mast, whereby the great ropes and tackle streined, the same mast was staied. All the rofe of the same house hving on the same mast, and with tackle was streined & borne by the supporters of the same mast or tree, the colours of the same was all blew, set with starres of gold foile, and the ojs of the heavens by the craft of colours in the rose, were curiously wrought in manner like the skie or firmament, and a cressant strained some deale towards the towne of Ard, this cressant was covered with frets and knois made of iute bushes, and boy branches, and other things that longest would be graine for pleasure.

Now like as diuerse of the French nobilitie had visited the king of England whilst he laie in Calis, so likewise the lord cardinall, as ambassadour to the king, rode with a noble repaire of lords, gentlemen, and prelates, to the towne of Ard, where he was of the French king highlie interteined, with great thanks, for that by his meanes hee had ioined in friendship with the king of England, to his high contentation and pleasure, as hauing obtained the thing which he had long desired. The noble port, sumptuous dew, and great traine of gentlemen, knights, lords, and number of seruants, in rich apparell & suites of li-ueries attendant on the cardinall, made the French men greatly to wonder at his triumphant doings.

The king of England had giuen vnto the said cardinall full authoritie, power, and libertie, to assirme and confirme, bind and vnbind, whatsoeuer should be in question betwene him and the French king: and the like authoritie, power, and libertie, did the French king by his sufficient letters patents, grant to the same cardinall, which was accepted to be a signe of great loue, that he should commit so great a trust vnto the king of Englands subiect. The date of the meeting was appointed to be on the thurs-daie the seauenth of June, vpon which daie the two kings met in the vale of Andren, accompanied with such a number of the nobilitie of both realmes, so richlie appointed in apparell, and costlie iewels, as chaines, collars of S.S., & other the like ornaments to set forth their degrees and estates, that a wonder it was to behold and view them in their order and rowes, which euerie man kept according to his appointment.

The two kings meeting in the field, either saluted other in most louing wise, first on horsebacke, and after alighting on foot embraced with courteous words, to the great reioicing of the beholders: and after they had thus saluted ech other, they went both together into a rich tent of cloath of gold, there set vp for the purpose, in the which they passed the time in pleasant talke, banquetting, and louing deuises, till it grew toward the euening, and then departed for that night, the one to Guisnes, the other to Ard. At this meeting of the two kings in open sight, I then well perceived (saith Hall) the habillements of all of the French king. His garment was a chemise, of cloath of siluer, culponed with cloath of gold, of da-maske, cantell wise, and garded on the borders with ouer that he had a cloake of broched sattin, with gold of purple colour, wrapped about his bodie trauerse, beded from the shoulder to the waist, fastned in the loope of the first fould: this said cloake was richlie set with pearles and precious stones. This French king had on his head a coiffe of damaske gold set with diamonds, and his courser that he rode on was co-uered with a trapper of tisse, brodered with deusse, cut in fashion mantell wise, the skirts were embowed and fret with frized woike, and knit with cor-belles & buttons tasseled of Turkie making, rainces and headfall answering of like woike: and verelie of his person the same Francis the French king, a godlie prince, statelie of countenance, merie of chere, browne coloured, great eyes, high nose, big lipped, faire breasted, broad shoulders, small legges, & long feet.

On saturday the ninth of June, in a place within the English pale were set vp in a field called the campe, two trees of much honour, the one called the Aubefine, that is to saie, the hawthorne in English, for Henrie: and the other the Framboiser, which in English signifieth the raspis berie, after the signification in French. These trees were curiously wrought, the leanes of graine damaske, the branches, boughs, and withered leanes of cloath of gold; and all the bodie and armes of the same cloath of gold laid on timber: they were in height from the foot to the top thirtie foure foot of assize, in compasse about an hundred twentie and nine foot, & from bough to bough fortie three foot: on these trees were flowers and fruits in kindlie wise, with siluer and Venice gold: their beautie shewed farre.

On the same daie the two kings came to those trees of honour, noble accompanied, in such roial sort as was requisite. The campe was in length nine hundred foot, and in breadth three hundred and twentie foot, ditched round about (sauiing at the entrie) with broad and deepe ditches. Diuerse scaffolds were reared about this campe for the ease of the nobles. On the right side of the field stood the queene of England, and the queene of France, with manie ladies. The campe was stronglie railed and barred on euerie end: in the entrie there were two lodgings prepared for the two kings, wherein they might arme themselues, and take their ease. Also in the same compasse there were two great cellars couched full of wine, which was liberallie bestowed on all men. The two kings, as brethren in armes, undertooke to deliuer all persons at iusts, tournie, and barriers.

With these two kings were associate by the order of armes, the duke of Wandoline, the duke of Sulfolke, the countie saint Paule, the marquisse Dorset, monsieur de Roche, sir William Kingston, monsieur Brian, sir Richard Feringham, monsieur Ca-uaen, sir Giles Capell, monsieur Buccall, master Nicholas Carew, monsieur Pontafilion, and master Anthonye Kneuet. On mondaie the eleuenth of June, the two queenes of England and of France came to the campe, where either saluted other right honourable, and went into a stage for them prepared. At the houre assigned, the two kings armed at all paces mounted on horsebacke, and with their companies entered the field; the French king on a courser barbed, couered with purple sattin, broched with gold, & embrodered with corbins fethers round and buckled, the fether was blacke and hatched with gold: on his head peece he bare a fleur-de-lis. All the parteners of the French kings challenge were in like ap-parell, euerie thing correspondent in cloath of silke embrodered, on his person were attendant on horsebacke noble persons, and on foot foure persons all apparelled in purple sattin.

The king of England was vpon a fresh courser, the trappers of cloth of gold, of tisse, the arlon man-tell wise, and on the hount of the trapper bard fashion, cut in waues of water woike, and euerie waue row wrought and frized with damaske gold: this woike was laid lose on russet veluet, and knit together with points of gold, which waues signified the lordship of the narrow seas. All the parteners of the kings challenge were in the same sute, their horses as well as their persons. Attendant on the king on horsebacke were sir Henrie Guilford master of the kings horse, sir John Dechie depute of Calis, sir Edward Guilford master of the kings armie, and monsieur Sporet of the French court. All these foure were appa-relled in the kings luerie, which was white on the right side, and the left side gold and russet both hose and garment: on him were attendant on foot sir honourable knights, twentie squiers, and officers to the

the number of an hundred and twelue persons, of the which number all the knights and gentlemen had coats, the one halfe siluer, and the other cloath of gold and russet beluet, and the other officers coats were of right sattin of the same colour, and all their hosen were of the same sute verie costlie.

Thus with honour and noble courage these two noble kings with their companies entered into the field, and then presented vnto the quenes. After reuerence done, they rode round about the tilt, and so toke their places appointed, abiding the answers: which was for the first the duke of Alanfon and ten men of armes on his band, on courfers barbed, the barbs couered with white and blacke beluet, fastenee the one within the other, garded with Burgon bands of tinell sattin, as well their garments as their barbs. Then entered on courfers barbed twelue gentlemen of the band of the lord aduerall of France, their garments and barbs were russet sattin, broched with gold and white and purple sattin, after the deuise of their pleasure with great plumes. When these bands were entred the field, they shewed themselves about the tilt, and did reuerence vnto the quenes. The band of the duke of Alanfon toke first place, they made them prest on both sides, the French king was the first that ran, he did valiantlie and bryke speares mightlie.

Then ran the king of England to monsieur Cranbeulle with great vigo; so that the speares bryke in the kings hand to the vantplate all to shivers. And at the second course he gaue the said monsieur Cranbeulle such a stroke, that the charnell of his headpiece, although the same was verie strong, was broken in such wise that he might run no more, wherby the king wanted thre courses. Then ran the duke de Glanshine, & met his counter part right noble, and bryke speares right valiantlie. The noble duke of Suffolke charged his course, and met right valiantlie his counter part, and furnished the five courses right noble together like good men of armes. And when all parties of the chalenge had right valiantlie furnished their courses, then ran againe the two noble kings, who did so valiantlie, that the beholders had great ioy, after which courses the heralds cried Desamee, and the trumpets sounded to lodging.

On tuesdaye the twelue of June at houre conuenient the two quenes toke their stages, and the band of chalenge in the field prest to answer and deliuer all commes, to whome came ten gentlemen armed on barbed horsse of the band of monsieur de Salons, their barbs and apparell cloath of beluet full of friers knots siluer. After they had presented them vnto the quenes, then they toke the end of the tilt, and so course after course they ran to the chalengers right agerlie, and the chalengers of the partie of the two kings deliuered to the end of their articles of iusts. Then entered eleuen men of armes of the band of monsieur de Tremoiell, on horsse barbed with yellow beluet, losenged with friers knots of blacke beluet: and after they had saluted the quenes, they likewise toke the end of the tilt, and course after course ran vntill they were deliuered of their chalenges of iusts. Valiantlie this daie was finished.

On wednesdaye the thirteenth of June, the two hardie kings armed at all peeces, entered into the field right noble apparelled. The French king and all his parteners of chalenge were arrayed in purple sattin, broched with gold and purple beluet, embrodered with little rolles of white sattin, wherein was written, Quando: their barbs & garments were set full of the same, and the residue where was no rolles were powdered & set with the letter elle, as thus. L. which in French is she, which was interpreted to be, Quando elle, when she: and insuing the deuise of the first daie, it signifieth together, Hart fastened in paine endles, when she. The king of England with all the band of parteners of his chalenge were likewise on horsse barbed, apparelled in trappers of losenges russet beluet and cloath of siluer of damaske, embrodered and set in euerie losenge a branch of eglantine of gold, the apparell of the persons were of the same correspondant to the trapper. This eglantine tre is sweet, pleasant and greene, if it be kindlie and frendlie handled; but if it be rudelie dealt with, it will picke and he that will pull vp the whole tre by the top, his hands will be hurt.

The two kings with their companies thus apparelled, presented themselves to the quenes, and so toke the end of the tilt. Then entered into the field monsieur Leskelw called lord Leskin, with him came eleuen men of armes, himselte the twelue on horsse barbed and richlie apparelled, and so rode about the tilt and saluted the quenes, and toke the end of the tilt. Monsieur de Leskelw and his eleuen companions had their bases and barbs all of blacke cloath of gold of damaske all cut on blacke sattin, their garments had mantell sleeves on the left arme, to the wast behind iust to the shoulder, which was praised for the strangeness. The French king ran to monsieur de Ambois, one of the band of monsieur Leskelw, and the king of England charged his course and ran to monsieur Leskelw, and so furnished their courses (as they saie) right noble and valiantlie in bryaking speares that were strong. Thus course after course ech with other, his counter partie did right valiantlie: but the two kings surmounted all the rest in prowess and valiantnesse.

This band thus furnished, entered the marquesse de Salons and his band, twelue persons all riding on courfers barbed and apparelled in white sattin and blacke, broched with gold and siluer, with cuts and culpins much after talunie and blacke sattin billots: & after reuerence done to the quenes, they toke the end of the tilt. To the marquesse de Salons ran the king of England, and the king of France to an other of the same band, still course after course ran all the noble men, till the marques de Salons and his band were deliuered, who bare them right valiantlie: then blew the trumpets the retreat, & the two kings then unarmed and after departed, the French king vnto Ard, and the king of England to his castell of Guisnes.

On thursdaie the thirteenth daie of June by the nonetide the two quenes met in the campe & toke their places, the people were come to behold the honour, and to see the two kings, who all readie armed entered the field, to receive and deliuer all men by answer of iusts. Then entered the earle of Denonshire, on his band the lord Montacute, lord Herbert, lord Leonard Greie, maister Arthur Poole, maister Francis Wyan, maister Henrie Morris, and four other all richlie apparelled, the one side blew beluet embrodered with a mans heart burning in a ladies hand holding a garden pot skilling with water on the heart: the other side was white sattin embrodered with letters of gold. This companie rode about the tilt, and did reuerence to the quenes, and so abode at the end of the same.

The earle of Denonshire charged his speare, and the French king likewise charged his course to meet the same earle, and ran so hard together, that both their speares bryke, and so mainteined their courses noble. Then ran the king of England to monsieur de Mozanais, and him encountered, & both bare together and gaue great strokes; the kings most noble grace neuer disloozed nor breathed vntill he ran the five courses & deliuered his counterpartie. marquesses, knights, esquires, and others ran as fast as euer they might, there was none that abode when the courtes came, untill the earle of Downshire and his band were deliuered of demands. Then entered the lord Howard sonne to the duke of Suffolke and eleven companions apparelled and barbed in crimsin sattin full of flames of gold, the borders ribbed with crimsin beluet, and with much honoz (after due reuerence done to the quenes) were brought with heralds of armes about the tilt; and so toke the place to them appointed: right rich was their apparell.

Then ran the French king and encountered the same lord Edmund, they brake both their staves valiantlie course after course, the encounter ceased not till they had furnished their five courtes; so was the lord Edmund deliuered by the French k. Then ran the king of England to a strong gentleman named Hase Brooke and brake his speare, and ran course after course, untill he had finished his courtes right noble and like a prince of most valiancie. The residue ceased not untill they had ech deliuered other of their challenge. On fridaie the fiftenth daie of June the king of England mounted on a courser rosall, his person armed at all peeces, his apparell and trappers was the one side rich cloath of gold of tisse, the other side cloath of tisse of siluer, and cloath of gold of tisse entered round the one with the other.

The ound is a worke wauiing vp & downe, and all the borders as well trappers as other was garded with letters of fine gold, and all the other side that was cund was set with signes called cifers of fine gold, the which were set with great and orientall pearles. The cifers signified letters knit together in a knot, which was to wit; God my friend, my realme and I maie. This was the deuise and reason thereof. All the kings band were apparelled in like apparell. The French k. likewise armed at all points mounted on a courser rosall, all his apparell as well bardes as garments were purple beluet entered the one with the other, embroidered full of little booke of white sattin, & in the booke were written Ame. About the borders of the bardes and the borders of the garments a chaine of blew like iron, resembling the chaine of a well or prison chaine, which was interpreted to be Liberty, a booke. Within this booke was written (as is said) Ame. But these two together and it maketh Liberty. The chaine betokeneth prison or bonds, and so maketh together in English, Deliver me of bonds. Then they toke the end of the tilt.

Readie was monsieur Flozengis and with him twelue men of armes with courfers barbed: the bardes and apparell was crimsin beluet, tabornie beluet, and plunket beluet embroidered bordertwise with shepheards hookes of cloath of siluer. When they with honoz had passed about the tilt (due reuerence to the quenes and ladies done) the two kings had their speares readie, and then began the rushing of speares. The king of England this daie ran so freshly and so manie courtes, that one of his best courfers was dead that night, this band was deliuered man after man of their pretense of iusts. Then entered bands of monsieur de Kambeurs and monsieur de Duis, ech hauing eleven persons in number, the one band all white sattin embroidered with blacke, and the other all blacke dopped with siluer drops; who after reuerence done to the quenes, at the end of the tilt toke their places. Then began a new encounter hard and sore, manie of them bare great strokes of the kings, to their honour: and with such violence they ran, as they set their hollies in a sweating heat, and themselves meeting with full force made the fragments or broken peeces of their staves mount aloft in the air like an arrow out of a bow; as the poet saith;

Hasta fridentis fracta petit aethera cuspis.

On saturday the sevententh daie of June, the French king with a small number came to the castle of Gules about the houre of eight in the morning. The king being in his pstate chamber had therof knowledge, who with glad hart went to receiue the same French king, and him met and welcomed in friendly and honozable maner; and after communcation betwene them had, the king of England departed, leauing the French king there in the sumptuous place before named. Then was busie the lord chamberleine, the lord steward, and all other officers, to make readie feast and cheare. It were too long to rehearse all, for such a feast and banquet was then made, that of long time before the like had not bene scene. The king of England thus departing, he toke his horse, and with a companie of noblemen rode to Ard, where the French quene and other noble men receiued him with much honoz.

After which receiuing, he was by the said quene and lords brought into a chamber hanged with blew beluet embroidered with flowers belice of cloth of gold, wherein was a great bed of like worke, from whence he was conueied to another chamber, in the which was a kings state. This chamber was hanged and felled with cloth of gold, embroidered with great cordels or friers knots of cloth of siluer. In the same chamber were two suppers, on either side one, furnished with great and goodlie plate gilt. Noble feasting and cheare was there made. After dinner the ladies dressed them to danse, and certeine yong honozable lords of England, apparelled after the maner of Rusland or farre Castland, whose hosen were of rich gold sattin called anreat sattin, ouerrolled to the knee with scarlet, and on their feet shoes with little plies of white nailes after the Castland guise, their dublets of rich crimsin beluet and cloth of gold, with wide sleeves lined with cloth of gold: over this they had clokes of crimsin beluet short, lined with cloth of gold, on euerie side of the clokes rings of siluer, with laces of Venice gold, and on their heads they had hats made in the towne of Danke, and purses of seales skinnies, and girdels of the same: all these yong lords had visards on their faces, and their hats were dyalline with like hatbands full of damaske gold.

Other ten lords were apparelled in long goines of blew sattin of the ancient fashion, embroidered with reasons of gold that said Adieu iunesse, faye well youth: they had tippets of blacke beluet, & hats hanging thereby, & on their heads hie violet standing caps, and girdels of silke, and purses of cloth of gold after the ancient maner, with visards on their faces of like anciencie. After all these triumphs and baneries, great store of spices, fruits, iellies, & banking viands were brought, which being done and ended, the king toke leaue of the French quene and ladies, to whome were brought thirtie horses trapped in damaske, white and yellow, and so passed he and his traine the towne of Ard into the field and campe. Right rosallie also was the French k. interlined, and all other after their degree and state. Now when all this solemnitie was ended, the French king toke leaue of the quene and ladies of the court. The lord cardinall in statelie attire, accompanied with the duke of Buckingham, and other great lords, conducted forward the French king, and in their way they encountered and met the king of England and his companie right in the ballie of Anderne, apparelled in their masking apparell, which gladdened the French king. After reuerence done, the said two kings departed for that night, the English to Gules, and the French to Ard.

an hideous storme of wind and weather, that manie coniectured it did prognosticate trouble and hatred shoulde after to follow betwene princes. On tuesdaie the nineteenth of June, the two kings came to the campe againe armed at all peeces, and there abode them that would come, so that then began the iustes atfoth. On wednesdaie the twentieth of June, the two kings began to hold tourneys with all the parteners of their challenge armed at all peeces. The quene of France and the quene of England were in the places for them prepared, and there was manie a goodlie battell performed: the kings doing as well as the best, so that the beholders spake of them honoz. On thursdaie the one and twentieth of June, the two kings likewise kept the tourneys, so that all those noble men that would pzeue their valiances, were deliuered according to the articles of the tourneys, which this daie toke end. On fridaie the 22 of June, the two kings with their retinue did battell on foot at the barriers, and there deliuered all such as put forth themselves to trie their forces. On saturday the thre and twentieth of June, the lord cardinal sang an high solemne masse by rote, aloft vpon a pompous stage before the two kings & quenes, the which being finished, indulgence was giuen to all the hearers. The two kings dined in one chamber that daie, and the two quenes in another. After dinner, the two kings with their band entered the field on foot before the barriers, & so began the fight, which continued battell after battell, till all the comers were answered. There were deliuered this day thus at the barriers by battell, an hundred and six persons: the two last battells did the kings trie. And so that saturday the whole challenge was performed, and all men deliuered of the articles of iustes, tourneys, and battells on foot at the barriers, by the said two kings and their aids.

After this, there followed roiall maskes, and on the sundae the four and twentieth of June, the king of Englande with foure companies, in euerie companie ten, trimlie appointed in masking apparell, rode to Ard: and likewise the French king accompanied with eight and thirtie persons as maskers repaired to Guisnes. They met on the waie, & each companie passed by other without any countenance making or dissembling. They were honozable received, as well at the one place as the other. And when they had ended their pastime, banketting, and dances, they returned and met againe on the way homeward, and then putting off their visards, they louinglie embraced: and after amiable communication together, they toke leave each of other, & for a remembrance gaue gifts either to other verie rich and princelie.

¶ During this triumph, much people of Flanders and west Flanders drew to Guisnes, to see the king of England & his honoz, to whom vittels of the court were giuen in plentie, the conduit of the gate did run wine alwaies. There were vagabonds, plowmen, labourers, and of the bragerie, wagoners and beggers, that for drunkenness late in routs and heapes. So great resort came thither, that knights and ladies, who were come to see the noblenesse, were faine to lie in haie and straw, and held them thereof highlie pleased. From the court of the emperor, noz of the ladie Margarets court, noz of Flanders, Babant, noz Burgognie came neuer a person to answer to the challenge. By that it seemed that there was small loue betwene the emperor & the French king. Moreover, monsieur Faiot capteine of Bullogne with monsieur Chastellon, did their deuoir to haue taken the towne of saint Omer, of which doing was thought no goodnesse to the emperor.

On mondaie the five and twentieth of June, the king with the quene removed from Guisnes to Calis, lis, where he remained till the tenth of Julie, on which daie he rode to Graueling, and was received on the waie by the emperor, and so by him conueied to Graueling, where not onlie the king, but also all his traine was cheered and feasted, with so louing manner, that the Englishmen highlie praised the emperours court. [When the French king and his lordes had knowledge of the meeting of the emperor and the king of England in the towne of Graueling, they were therewith greatlie grieved, as by manie things appeared. For as the Englishmen were in France bidained, and in their sutes there greatlie deferred, and had little right, and much lesse fauour: so from day to day still more and more began hartburning, and in conclusion open warre did arise betwene the two realmes.]

On Wednesday the eleuenth of Julie, the emperor and his aunt the ladie Margaret duchesse of Sauoy came with the king of England to the towne of Calis, and there continued in great ioy and solace, with feasting, banketting, dancing and masking untill the fourteenth of Julie. ¶ For the interteining of these estates (the English lords and gentlemen displaced of their lodgings to serue the other and their traine) there was builded a banketting house eight hundred fot compasse, like a theatre, after a goodlie deuise, builded in such maner as (I thinke) was neuer scene, with firtene principals made of great masse, betwixt euerie mast foure and fiftie fot, and all the outsidcs closed with boyd and canuas.

Ouer it, and within round about by the sides, were made thre scaffolds or lofts one above another for men and women to stand vpon. And in the midst of the same banketting house, was set by a great pillar of timber made of eight great masses, bound together with iron bands, for to hold them together: for it was an hundred and foure and thirtie fot of length, and cost six pounds thirtene shillings and foure pence to set it vpight. The banketting house was couered ouer with canuas, fastened with ropes and iron as fast as might be deuised. And within the said house was painted the heauens, with starres, sunne, moone, and clouds, with diuerse other things made about ouer mens heads: and there were great images of wickers couered, and made like great men of diuerse strange nations: and diuerse reasons were written by them of the countries that they likened to be of, with the armes of those countries hanging by them.

Also there was made as it were manie ships border saile, and windmills going, and about the high pillar of timber that stood vpight in the middell, was made stages of timber for organs and other instruments to stand vpon, and men to plaie on them, & for other musicians & pageants to be plaied, when the la. of England & the emperor should be at their banket. But in the morning of the same day, the wind began to rise, & at night blew off the canuas, and all the elements, with the starres, sunne, moone, and clouds, and the wind blew out about a thousand torches, and other lights of war, that were prepared to giue light to the banket, & all the kings seats that were made with great riches, besides all other things, were all dashed and lost.]

The same daie at night that the states were interteined, the king and fiftene persons were appailelled all in blacke velvet couered with cloth of gold, cut on the velvet, fastened with knots of gold, on the which knots hong spangles of gold like tufts, and bonnets of the same, & cloches of crimson sattin and cloth of gold wrapped trauerse, and their bullkins of the same cloth of gold. All these lustie maskers went to the emperours lodging, and were received, and in the chamber of presence dined and reuelled, the which at the emperours request, the king and other disuisarded themselves, whereby the king was knowne: then the king took his leaue, and departed for that night. On tuesdaye the twelue of Julie, because the banquetting house could not be finished, the emperour and the ladie Margaret supped with the king & the queene at the checker, where the same night after supper reuelled ninetie and six maskers: after the reuels was a banquet, after which banquet the king brought the emperour and the ladie Margaret to the staple, and after withdrew him.

This night were eight companies of maskers, and in euery companie twelue persons all in gold, silver and velvet, richly apparellled, but because the rowne was small, the shew was the lesse. In these reuels were put in maskers apparell diuerse gentlemen of the French court bntweting to the k. or anie other that bare rule. For diuerse yong gentlemen of the French court fauored more the French partie, than the emperours partie; through which meanes they saw and much more heard than they should haue done. On fridaie the thirtenth date of Julie, the emperour did intend to haue departed from Calis, but the counsell was such that he departed not that night.

On saturdaye the fourteenth of Julie, the emperour took his leaue of the queene of England his aunt, and departed toward Graueling, being conducted on his waie by the king of England, to a village towards Flanders called Wiaell, and there they imbraced and took their leaue either of other in most louing maner. They did not altogether spend the time thus while they were together, in vaine pleasures, and sporting reuels; for the charters before time concluded were read ouer, and all the articles of the league tripartite, agreed betwixt the emperour, the king of England, and the French king, were at full declared, to the which the French king had fullie considered. And for the more profe thereof, and reimplification of the same, he sent monsieur de Roch with letters of credence to signifie to the emperour, that in the word of a prince he would obserue, fulfill, performe and keepe all the same articles, for him, his realme and subiects. Shortlie after that the emperour and the king had taken leaue each of other, and were departed, the king shipped, and with the queene and all other the nobilitie returned safelie into England.

The king kept his Christmas at Greenwich this yeare, with much noblenesse and open court. And the tenth date of Februarye, in his owne person, iusted with all commers. On Twelue daie his grace and the earle of Denonshire, with foure aids, answered at the touraine all commers, which were sixtene persons: noble and rich was their apparell, but in feats of armes the king excelled the rest. About this time the king hauing regard to the common welth of his realme, considered how for the space of fiftie yeares past and more, the nobles and gentlemen of England, being given to grasur of cattell, and keeping of sheepe, had inuented a meane how to increase their pearle reuenues, to the great decaye and vndowing of husbandmen of the land. For the said nobles and gentlemen, after the maner of the Spaniards, more studieng how to increase their pastures, than to mainteine tillage, began to decaye husband tacks & tenements, and to conuert arable ground into pasture, furnishing the same with beasles and sheepe, and also dere, so inclosing the field with hedges, ditches, and pales, which they held in their owne hands, ingrossing woulles, and selling the same, and also sheepe and beasles at their owne prices, and as might stand most with their owne pinate commoditie.

Hereof a threefold euill chanced to the common wealth, as Polydor noteth. One, for that thereby the number of husbandmen was sore diminished, the which the prince vseth chiefe in his seruice for the warres: another, for that manie towncs and villages were left desolate, and became ruinous: the third, for that both wolle and cloth made thereof, and the flesh of all maner beasles used to be eaten, was sold at far higher prices than was accustomed. These enormities at the first beginning being not redressed, grew in short space to such force and vigour by euill custome, that afterwards they gathered to such an vnited force, that hardly they could be remedied. Such like a disease, which in the beginning with little paine to the patient, and lesse labour to the surgeon maie be cured; whereas the same by delaye and negligence being suffered to putrifie, becommeth a desperate force, and then are medicines nothing available, and not to be applied, according to his opinion that said:

Pocentes videas: venienti occurrere morbo.*

The king therefore causing such good statutes as had bene deuised and established for reformation in this behalfe, to be reuiued and called vpon, took order by directing forth his commissions vnto the iustices of peace, and other such magistrats, that presentment should be had and made of all such inclosures, and decaye of husbandrie, as had chanced within the space of fiftie yeares before that present time. The iustices and other magistrats, according to their commission executed the same. And so commandement was giuen, that the decayed houses should be built by againe, that the husbandmen should be placed effcones in the same, and that inclosed grounds should be laid open, and soe punishment appointed against them that disobeyed.

These so good and wholesome ordinances the cardinal after were defeated by meanes of bybys giuen vnto the cardinal: for when the nobles and gentlemen, which had for their pleasures imparied the common fields, were loth to haue the same againe disparted, they redeemed their vexation with good summes of monie; and so had licence to keepe their parks and grounds inclosed as before. Thus the great expectation which men had conceiued of a generall redresse, proued void: howbeit, some profit the husbandmen in some parts of the realme got by the mowing of this matter, where inclosures were already laid open, yer mistresse monie could procure them; and so they inioied their commons, which before had bene taken from them.

After that this matter for inclosures was thus dispatched, the cardinal boiling in hatred against the duke of Buckingham, & thirsting for his blood, deuised to make Charles Kneuet, that had bene the dukes surueior, and put from him (as ye haue heard) an instrument to bring the duke to destruction. This Kneuet being had in examination before the cardinal, disclosed all the dukes life. And first he offered, that the duke was accustomed by waie of talke, to saie, how he meant so to vse the matter, that he would attaine to the crowne, if king Henrie chanced to die without issue: & that he had talke and conference of that matter on a time with George Peuill, lord of Aburgauernie, vnto whom he had giuen his daughter in marriage; and also that he threatned to punish the cardinal for his manifold misdoings, being without cause his mortall enimie.

The cardinal hauing gotten that which he sought for, incouraged, comforted, and procured Kneuet, with manie comfortable words and great promises, that he should with a bold spirit and countenance obiect and laie these things to the dukes charge, with more if he knew it when time required. Then Kneuet other, that chiefie went about to crosse the cardinall in his lordlie demeanour, & headie proceedings. But to the purpose. Shortly after that the duke had bene in dared (as before ye haue heard) he was arreigned in Westminster hall, before the duke of Suffolke, be ing made by the kings letters patents high steward of England, to accomplish the high cause of appeale of the pères or pères of the realme, and to discern and iudge the cause of the pères.

There were also appointed to sit as pères and judges upon the said duke of Buckingham, the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dorsset, the earls of Wor cester, Devonshire, Essex, Hertfordshire, Kent, Dr glow, and Derby, the lord of saint Johns, the lord de la Mare, the lord Fitz Warren, the lord Willough by, the lord Wake, the lord Cobham, the lord Ver bert, and the lord Dorsset. There was made within the hall at Westminster a scaffold for these lords, and a preele for a iudge, railed and counterrailed about, and barred with degrees. When the lords had taken their place, the duke was brought to the barre, and upon his arreignment pleaded not guiltie, and put himselfe upon his pères. Then was his indict ment read, which the duke denied to be true, and (as he was an eloquent man) alledged reasons to falsi fie the indictment; pleading the matter for his owne iustification verie pithilie and earnestlie. The kings attourneie against the dukes reasons alledged the examinations, confessions, and proofes of witnesses.

The duke desired that the witnesses might be brought forth. And then came before him Charles Laueet, Derke, de la Court, & Hopkins the monke of the priorie of Charterhouse beside Bath, which like a false hypocrite had induced the duke to the trea son with his false forged prophesies. Diuerse pre sumptions and accusations were laid vnto him by Charles Laueet, which he would faine haue couered.
The depositions were read, & the deponents deliuered as prisoners to the officers of the Tower. Then spake the duke of Suffolke, and said: My lord, the king our soueraigne lord hath commanded that you shall haue his lawes ministred with fauour and right to you. Wherefore if you haue anie other thing to say for your selfe, you shall be heard. Then he was com manded to withdraue him, and so was led into Parla ment, a house so named. The lords went to counsell a great while, and after toke their places.

Then said the duke of Suffolke to the duke of Suffolke, What say you of sir Edward duke of Buc kingham touching the high treasons? The duke of Suffolke answered: He is guiltie: & so said the mar ques and all the other earls and lords. Thus was this prince duke of Buckingham found guiltie of high treason, by a duke, a marques, seuen earls, & twelue barons. The duke was brought to the barre fore cha sing, and sweet marnellouslie; & after he had made his reuerence, he paused a while. The duke of Suffolke as iudge said: Sir Edward, you haue heard how you be indicted of high treason, you pleaded thereto not guiltie, putting your selfe to the pères of the realme, which haue found you guiltie. Then the duke of Suff olke wept and said: You shall be led to the kings pri son, and there laid on a hardle, and so draue to the place of execution, and there be hanged, cut downe allue, your members cut off and cast into the fire, your bowels burnt before you, your head smitten off, and your bodie quartered and diuided at the kings will, and God haue mercie on your soule, Amen.

The duke of Buckingham said, My lord of Suff olke, you haue said as a traitor should be said vnto, but I was neuer anie: but my lords I nothing ma ligne for that you haue done to me, but the eternall God forgive you my death, and I do: I shall neuer sue to the king for life, howbeit he is a gracious prince, and more grace may come from him than I desire. I desire you my lords and all my fellows to pray for me. Then was the edge of the axe turned towards him, and he led into a barge. Sir Thomas Lowell desired him to sit on the cushions and carpet ordained for him. He said nay; for when I went to Westminster I was duke of Buckingham, now I am but Edward Bohune the most caitife of the world. Thus they landed at the Temple, where recei ued him sir Nicholas Tawse & sir William Sandes baronets, and led him through the citie, & desired euery the people to pray for him, of whom some wept and lamented, and said: This is the end of euill life, God forgive him, he was a proud prince, it is pittie that he behaued him so against his king and liege lord, whom God preferue. Thus about foure of the clocke he was brought as a cast man to the Tower.

On fridaie the fuententh daie of Maie, about eleuen of the clocke, this duke of Buckingham, earle of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton, with a great power was deliuered to John Keime & John Shenington shiriffes, who led him to the scaffold on Tower hill, where he said he had offended the kings grace through negligence and lacke of grace, and de sired all noble men to beware by him, and all men to pray for him, and that he trusted to die the kings true man. Thus meekelie with an are he toke his death.
Then the Augustine friers toke his bodie, and head, and buried them. Alas that euery the grace of truth was withdraue from so noble a man, that he was not to his king in allegiance as he ought to haue bene! Such is the end of ambition, the end of false prophesies, the end of euill life, and euill counsell; but spectallie the end of malice, which grew to so huge and monstruous a fire in the haucie hart of the proud car dinall, that nothing could asswage it, but the blood of this noble duke, against whom he had procured this procede in iudgement ended with the execution of death: the tormentes whereof were (as it seemeth by the sentence of the iudge) much diminished through the mercie of the king.

For though his offense was traitorous, and therefore deserued as law had prouided, and the iudge defined; yet in respect of the offenders person, the kings fauor dispensed with the rigor of iudgement, so that he was beheaded onelie, and his bodie not dismembred. This duke had begun a great and sumptuous building at his manor of Thornburie, but left the same unfinished. He made a faire parke hard by the same building, for the which he toke in much and fruitfull ground. Also another parke at Castwood, one mile off, he enlarged at two times to the compasse of six miles, for the which deed, and such like, he had manie a curle of the poore tenants. At the time of his death (no doubt) his conscience (gi uing in greater euidence than 10000 witnesses) told him whether he was iustlie condemned or no, for a mans dieng day is as a bill of information, putting him in mind of his life well or ill spent, as one saith:

peffora terribili cum mors ferit horrida telo, Quomodo vita tibi sit prius acta scies.

as sometime was the chiefe place of a temporall subiect in the realme the (high steward excepted) whose power did extend to restraine some actions of the kings. Wherefore being now no such office (for there was neuer anye advanced thereunto since the beheading of this duke) I thinke it not bnniet to make some memorie of those persons possessing to high a place, least both they and their office might hereafter grow in vtter obliuion: these therefore they were.

Alfgarus Stallere.

Alfgarus Stallere, constable to Edward the Confessor, of whome thus writeth the historie of Elie in the second booke written by Richard of Elie a monke of that house, in the time of Henrie the second, whose words although they be somewhat long, I shall not graue to set downe in this sort. De famosa villa Estre, alio nomine Plasie vocata, dicendum est quam miserè ab Elie est destrata. Alfgarus quidem Stallere, quod Latine dux dicitur, eam inuasi, & viciu esse. Abbas vero Wulficus & fratres, cum sedulo frustrarequirerent, Edwardum Confessorem adieunt, cui rex mandauit, ut restitueret: sed ille regis iussu nequaquam obtemperauit. Fratres autem, cum nec prece nec precio eius animum flectere potuissent, anathematizant eum, nec sententiam super eum vlla die pratermittunt.

Quod ille diutius paripendens, licet magnus & potens in regno esset (viti regis constabularius) ab ecclesia eliminatus, & fidelium consortio ad correptionem (vix iam cunctis desubilis effectus) compulsum peruenire, tandem plurimum oburgatus & correptus à rege) reuersus est in se, & prece tandem nititur obtinere quod iniqua manu cunctatus non est. Illi vero hoc cognoscentes, illi annunt, demiserunt ei (quamuis ad suum incommodum) ita ut iureiurando postipsum vitam ab omni suorum inquietudine libera ad ecclesiam possessione rediret. Quod quidem factum est, & scripto Anglici sermonis designatum. Testes rex Edwardus & regina, &c. Which man (after the death of king Edward the Confessor and Harold the blurper) was when the Normans entered England, as saith the said historie In ergastulo plurimis alijs ferro astrictus usque ad mortem.

Gloucester.

Walter constable of England in the time of William the Conquerour, and of William Rufus succeeded Alfgarus. Here (before I saie anye more) I thinke it not amisse to set downe somewhat touching William Fitz Osberne, or Osbert earle of Hereford, whome manie will haue to be constable in the time of the Conquerour: which truelie I can not as yet be led to beleue. For although that this William was the onelie man, who both persuaded, incouraged, and procured aid of others to assist William Conquerour for the obtaining of England; and that this man was (as we commonlie saie) the onelie right hand, cheefe compeller, and disposer of the kingdome, after that William the Conquerour had obtained the same, being also Tribunus militum of all the armie that William Conquerour led into England, and the man that persuaded the bishop of Sambozow to compound for the title of the king of Denmarke made vnto England: yet I suppose him not to be constable, but onelie marshall of England; or at the least if he were, it could not be verie long. For that this earle was extreme old, departed the realme, and disposed all the affaires of the Norman bastard beyond the seas, and died about the yeare of our redemption 1072, being about the eight yeare of the reigne of William Conquerour.

Spilo of Hereford.

Spilo the sonne of the said Walter, an enimic to king Stephan (who yet confirmed him in his fathers inheritance) was advanced first to great honors by Henrie the first: who meeting Maud the emperesse at Bissoto, and taking hir for lawfull queene, did continuallie follow hir faction: for which the, in the first yeare of king Stephan, to honour him for his good seruice (as appeareth by the charter thereof) gaue him the earldome of Hereford, constablership of England, the castell of Wironell, & the forest of Deane. He was lord also of Breckenocke. He translated the chanons of the monastere of Saint Iohnis of Lanthonie, in the yeare of our redemption 1103, being the fourth yeare of king Henrie the first, to a place nere Gloucester, then called Hide, and since Lanthonie; as Iohn Stow hath well noted out of other authors.

10 He married Sibilla the daughter of Bernard de Wymarch, a nobleman of Normandle, who obtained by conquest the lordship of Breckenocke: by whome he had issue five sonnes and three daughters. The sonnes were Roger; Walter, Henrie, William and Mabaell. His three daughters were, Margaret, married to Humfrey Bohune; Bertha the second was married to Philip Buse, created by king Stephan lord of Buse; Colver, Bauld, & Wymbles, and in his wifes right lord of Breckenocke; Lucia married to Herebert the sonne of Herebert, base sonne to Henrie the first, who was (in his right) lord of the forest of Deane: he died in the eight or (as others haue) the ninth yeare of king Stephan, being the yeare of our redemption 1143.

William (the sonne of Walter Beauchampe) thirthe of Worcester, was made high constable of England by king Stephan, in the fifth yeare of his reigne, being in the yeare of our redemption 1139, when the king was at Worcester: which honour he toke from Miles of Gloucester; as saith that painefull antiquarie Iohn Stow in his chronicle printed in the yeare of our Lord 1580, fol. 191.

30 Roger the sonne of Spilo succeeded his father in all his inheritance, as well of the earldome, as otherwise: whereby he was in time following also constable of England, and (as it is most probable) restored to that office by Henrie the second; for that he was a great enimic to king Stephan. He luent amongest others with Henrie Fitz Emperesse to Dauid king of Scots, who knighted the said Henrie in the foureteenth yeare of king Stephan: he married Cicilie the daughter of Iohn Fitz Paine, and died without issue.

40 Walter second sonne to Spilo, after the death of his brother Roger was earle of Hereford, constable of England, and lord ouer Swenthie or Wenthe: he builded in the time of Henrie the first the castles of Gloucester, Bissow, and Rochester, with the Tower of London: he held the land of Wenthe by long time, who hauing no heire of his bodie gaue the same land to Henrie of Hereford, and for taking the world toke monastical habit on him at Lanthonie, where he was buried, dieng without issue.

50 Henrie of Hereford the sonne of Spilo, after the enterance of Walter his brother into religion, was earle of Hereford, constable of England, and lord of Breckenocke and Deane; who was in Wenthe at a conflict slaine by his owne men, and buried at Lanthonie with Walter the constable: after whose death Henrie the second deputed Jago ap Seisell to the custodie of the land of Wenthe.

60 William the sonne of Spilo, and brother to Henrie of Hereford, was constable of England, after the death of his brother, and died without issue.

Mabaell the yongest sonne of Spilo, after the death of William, was constable of England, who died without issue: whome I feare not to place as constable, since all histories agree that all the sons of Spilo did successfullie intoie that office, after whome the inheritance comming to their sister, whereof the eldest called Margaret (or Margerie) was married to Humfrey Bohune, which line of the Bohones became afterwards constables of England by inheritance.

Henrie

An. Reg. 13.

Humfrie de Bohune, steward to Henrie the first, (the sonne of Humfrie de Bohune, steward in house to William Rufus, sonne to Humfrie de Bohune that came in with the Conquerour) was (in the right of his wife Margerie one of the daughters and heire of the foresaid spile) constable of England; he had issue Humfrie de Bohune.

Humfrie de Bohune, constable of England, married Margaret sister to William king of Scots and daughter to the earle of Huntingdon, mother to Canon earle of Britaine: he had issue Henrie. This Margaret died the third of king John, being the yeare of Christ 1201. And this Humfrie also died in the time of king John, as some haue: or rather (as others haue) in the time of king Richard the first.

Henrie de Bohune, the sonne of the said Humfrie and Margaret, was the first earle of Hereford of that name of the Bohunes, contrarie to that recelud error, which hitherto hath made the other Bohunes earle of Hereford: and contrarie to the printed pedigree of the deceased father of the earle of Essex now living. For this man, being the first erle of the Bohunes, was made earle of Hereford in the first yeare of king John, as the charter doth witness. He was also constable of England, and married spawd, the daughter and heire of Cestrie lord Luogarsall sometime earle of Essex, in whose right his husband was intituled to that honoz of the earldome of Essex, by whome he had issue Humfrie his heire. He died about the fourth yeare of Henrie the third, being the yeare of our redemption 1220, in his iourne as he went to Jerusalem with other noble men.

Humfrie de Bohune sonne of Henrie, being the second of that name that was erle of Hereford, was also earle of Essex and constable of England, being by all men termed La bone counte de Hereford. He married spawd the daughter of the earle of Erie in Poymandie, he had issue Humfrie de Bohune that was taken in the yeare of Christ 1265, being the fourth of king Henrie the third at the battell of Cuesham, and died in the life of his father, leaving behind him a sonne called Humfrie, heire to him and to his father, which Humfrie the father died in the yeare of our redemption 1275, being the third yeare of king Edward the first.

Humfrie de Bohune the third earle of Hereford of that name, the sonne of Humfrie Bohune slaine at the battell of Cuesham, was after the death of his grandfather erle of Hereford and Essex, and constable of England, he married spawd de Ferens, or Frenis, and had issue Humfrie, this earle died in the yeare of our redemption 1298, being the twentieth first of Edward the first, & was buried at Malden with his wife spawd.

Humfrie de Bohune the fourth erle of Hereford of that name, was earle of Hereford, Essex, and constable of England, he married Elizabeth the daughter to king Edward the first, and widow to John earle of Holland, he had issue John erle of Hereford, Humfrie earle of Hereford, and William earle of Northampton. This Humfrie taking part with Thomas earle of Lancaster was slaine at Worobridge by a Welshman standing under a bridge that thrust him thorough with a speare, in the fourteenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1321.

John de Bohune the eldest sonne of this Humfrie, being the first earle of Hereford, was after the death of his father earle of Hereford, Essex, and constable of England, he married the daughter of Edmund Fitz Alen earle of Arundell, and died without issue in the yeare of Christ 1335, being the ninth yeare of king Edward the third. He was buried in the abbeie of Stratford besides London.

Humfrie de Bohune first earle of Hereford, being brother to John de Bohune, whome he succeeded, was after the death of his brother earle of Hereford and Essex, and constable of England, he died without issue in the yeare of our Lord 1361, being the thirtieth first of king Edward the third, and was buried at the Augustine friers in London.

William de Bohune seventh erle of Hereford of that surname, being the sonne of the other Humfrie and brother to the last Humfrie, was at a parlement holden in the tenth yeare of the reigne of king Edward the third, being in the yeare of our Lord 1336, created earle of Northampton, and after the death of his brother Humfrie, he was earle of Hereford and Essex, and constable of England. He was in the eighteenth yeare of Edward the third, being the pere of Christ 1344, sent into Britaine as generall ouer the English armie, to restore John de Montford to the dukedome of Britaine: which he did, putting Charles de Blois to flight. He married Elizabeth some late Cleanor, one of the daughters and heires of Bartholomew Bladefinere baron of Bedes in Kent, by whome he had issue Humfrie.

Humfrie de Bohune, the eighth & last erle of Hereford of that surname of Bohune, was after the death of William his father earle of Hereford, Essex and Northampton, and constable of England. He augmented the castell of Brecknoche, first built by Bernard Selwarch. He in the eight and twentieth yeare of Edward the third (as John Stow noteth) being the yeare of Christ 1354, reedified the frier Augustines church in London, in which he was buried. He married Jone the daughter of Richard Fitz Alen erle of Arundell, by whome he had issue two daughters and heires, Cleanor the eldest, married to Thomas of Woodstocke: and Marie the second, married to Henrie of Bolingbroke, after king of England, by the name of king Henrie the fourth.

Thomas of Woodstocke the first sonne to king Edward the third, was created earle of Buckingham, in the first yeare of Richard the second at his coronation, being the yeare of our Lord 1377, and after duke of Gloucester, in the eight yeare of Richard the second 1385. He married Cleanor eldest daughter of Humfrie Bohune (as before) in whose right he was earle of Essex, Northampton, and constable of England, besides which he was also lord of Brecknoche. He had issue one son & foure daughters: his sonne was Humfrie erle of Buckingham, whom R. Richard (after the murdering of his father at Calis) sent into Ireland, where he remained as prisoner untill the time of king Henrie the fourth; which called him home: who returning into England, died of the plague without issue at Chester: after whome his mother lived not long. Of whose death thus writeth that worthy poet sir John Gower knight, living at that time, in his booke of the historie of Richard the second, and Henrie the fourth, commonlie taken as part of his worke intituled & named, Vox clamantis.

Interea transiit moriens nec in orbe remansit, Humfredus dictus reddidit illo Deo benedictum, Defuncto nato cito post de fine beato, Mater transiit dum nati funera saeuit, Primo decessit Cignus, dolor unde repressit Matrem cum pullo sibi mors nec paruit in ullo.

The foure daughters, heires to Thomas of Woodstocke & their brother Humfrie, were Anne the eldest, married to Edmund Stafford erle of Stafford, who had issue Humfrie erle of Stafford, Hereford, & Northampton, lord of Brecknoche, &c: which Anne after the death of erle Stafford, married the second time marie William viscount Southhampton, created erle of Ewe in France: the second daughter was Philip, lip, which died without issue: the third Zou, was married to Gilbert lord Talbot: the fourth Zabel, was a religious person at the Monachies in London. The duke of Gloucester was murdered at Calis about the yeare of Christ 1398, being the 22 yeare of Richard the second, touching whose life and death, with the manner thereof, thus writeth the said sir John Gower, in the same booke intituled Vox clamantis:

O quoniam fortuna stabilis non permanet una, Exemplum cuius fiat in ordine carminis huius, Rex agit, & Cygnus patitur de corde benignus, Ille prostratus non est de rege levatus, Ad plebsque captus tunc est velut hostia raptus, Rex iubet arma geri, nec eo voluit misereri, Cum sponsa nati lugent quasi morte gravati, Plura lupo scuit rex dummodofamina fleuit, Nil pietas munit quem tunc manus inuida punit, Rex sterit obliquus nec erat tunc vnus amicus, O regale genus, princeps quasi pauper egenus, Turpiter attractus iacet & sine iure subactus, Sunt ibi fautores regis de sorte priores, Qui Cygnum pendunt, ubi captum ducere tendunt, Sic ducendo ducem, perdit sine lumine lucem, Anglia quae tota tenebrefcit luce remota, Trans mare natauit, regnum qui semper amauit, Fleunt centum mille, quia Cygnus praeterit ille, Calisy portus petit unde dolus laetis ortus, Error quem regis genuit putredine legis, Carcere conclusus subit fuit ille reclusus, Nescit quo sine sit vita sine ruina, Tunc rex elatum sumpsit quasi fulco volatum, Vnde suas gentes perdit custode carentes.

A little after which followeth these verses, touching the deniall of buriall to be granted vnto him among the rest of his honourable and roiall ancessors:

Sic nece deuictum, sic corpus ab hoste relictum, Clam de conclauis, susceperat Anglia nati, Per mare regredietur, corpus nec adhuc sepelitur, Namq; sepulturam, defendit rex sibi puram, Desuper a latere, patris loca iusta repare, Dummodo quiescit, vix bassa sepulchra subiuit.

Of the manner also of whose death the said sir John Gower hath set downe these three following verses:

Hec quam vultorum quidam de sorte malorum, Sic ducis electi plumarium pondere lecti, Corpus quassatum ingulanta ne am ingulatum.

His wife Elenor died the third of October, in the yeare of our redemption 1399, being the first yeare of king Henrie the fourth, and was buried at Westminister on the south side of king Edward the third with this epitaph:

Edward
Plantagenet.

Edward Plantagenet sonne to Edmund of Langley, was by Richard the second created earle of Arundell, and duke of Albemarle, who being constable of England arrived in the three and twentieth yeare of Richard the second, and in the yeare of our Lord 1399 in Ireland, to bring aid to the king being there in warre. Of this man is more liberall discourse in my following treatise of the dukes of England.

Henrie Persie

Henrie Persie lord Persie, the first lord, and the first earle of Northumberland of that name, was advanced to that honourable title of earle at the coronation of king Richard the second, in the yeare of our redemption 1377. He was made high constable of England by Henrie the fourth, then elected but not crowned king of England, because the said earle did giue that ring to the king whereby he was incorporated to the kingdome of England, to whom also the king gaue the gle of man to beare the sword with which he entered the realme. He in the fourth yeare of king Henrie the fourth, being the yeare of Christ 1403, rebelled against the king: but after coming to the king vpon sending for, he was pardoned his life, but committed to safe custodie. After which, in the sixth yeare of that king, he was at a parlement holden at London restored to his estate and dignitie, who the yeare following, being the first of Henrie the fourth, and the yeare of Christ 1405, againe rebelled, and after fled into Scotland, to Dauid lord Fleming who receiued him, and in the seventh yeare of Henrie the fourth, being the yeare of our redemption 1506, as saith John Stow.

This Dauid persuaded the erle to die into Wales, for which cause the Scots slue the said Dauid. After this, in the ninth yeare of Henrie the fourth, he came into England, raised the people, and was slaine at Bowneham nere to Haselwood, in a conflict had with him by Thomas Kockleie shiriffe of Northshire. He married two wiues, the first was Margaret daughter to Rafe lord Penill, by whom he had issue Henrie Persie, surnamed Hotspurre (slaine at the battell of Shrewesburie in the fourth yeare of Henrie the fourth in his fathers life) Thomas and Rafe. His second wife was Mauid, daughter to Thomas lord Lucie, and sister and heire to Anthoine lord Lucie baron of Cockermonth, being before the widow of Gilbert Humfreuill called the earle of Angus. His ladie Mauid gaue to hir husband the lordship and castell of Cockermonth, whereby the earles of Northumberland are bound still to beare the armes of Lucie.

John duke of Bedford the sonne and brother of John the first king, so he calleth himselfe in the precept to summon Reginald lord Greie, & sir Edward Hastings knight, to determine the controuersie for bearing of the armes of Hastings earle of Penbroke in the marshals court) was earle of Richmond and Bedford, and constable of England, being advanced to that office about the eight yeare of Henrie the fourth his father, being the yeare of our redemption 1406, of whom there is more mention in the following discourse of the protectors of England.

Humfrie earle of Stafford, Hereford, and Northampton, lord of Breconke, Holdernesse, and of Cambridge, and constable of England, and of Dover castell, in the eight yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ 1430, went into France with Henrie the first to attend his coronation at Paris. He was created duke of Buckingham in the two and twentieth yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ 1444. He was slaine at the battell of Northampton in the eight and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1460. He married Anne daughter to Rafe Penill erle of Warmerland: he had amongst manie other of his children Humfrie his eldest sonne earle of Stafford, but (as hath John Stow) with an arrow in the right hand at the battell of saint Albons in the three and thirtieth yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1455, of which battell of saint Albons thus writeth John Whethamsted a learned abbat of Batheley:

*Dum Maximus madidus flos saepuit inbrilys anfractis in olibus & Zephyrus resouerat statibus arboris Flora uelut regnans herbas ditauerat hortus

John Tiptoth or Tiptost knight, the son of John lord Tiptost, and of Joice his wife, second daughter to Edmund Charlston lord Polwes, was treasurer of the realme in Michaelmasse tearme in the tenth yere of Henrie the fourth, after which he was againe admitted to that office in the one and thirtieth and two and thirtieth yere of Henrie the first, from which place being once more remitted, he was the third time aduanced to the honoz of lord treasurer of England in the second of Edward the fourth, and continued the same in the third of the said king. He was created earle of Worcester in the time of king Henrie the first. This man in the yere 1470, being the tenth of king Edward the fourth, toke his part against the duke of Clarence, and Richard Beuill earle of Marwike, at what time the said duke and earle being discomfited, fled to the sea side, and thence sailed to Southhampton, where they thought to haue had the Trinitie a great ship of the earle of Marwikes; but the lord Seales the quenes brother fought with them, and forced them to sie into France.

Whereupon king Edward the fourth came to Southhampton and caused Tiptost earle of Worcester to sit in iudgement upon certeine gentlemen, as Clapham and others, taken at the same skirmish of Southhampton, where the earle caused the bodiees of certeine condemned men, after that they were hanged to be thrust thorough the fundament by to the head with stakes, for the which crueltie he and others fell into indignation of the common people. Before which in the eight yere of king Edward, he was with John Dupleie made constable of the Tower, during their liues, and the longer liue of them two.

After this in the said yere 1470, being the tenth of Edward the fourth, in which Henrie the first readepted the crowne of England, which yere of Henrie the first is called in the law booke, the fourtie ninth yere of the reigne of R. Henrie the first. This earle of Worcester was taken in the top of an high tree in the forest of Weibridge in Huntingtoshire, brought to London, and at a parlement arrested and condemned to death, by sir John Here earle of Worsford. Whereupon he was beheaded at Tower hill, and buried in the blacke friers of London. He had thre wiues, whereof the first was called Cicilie the daughter of Richard earle of Salisburie: the second Elizabeth the daughter of Robert Greindoure: the third was Elizabeth, after married to sir William Stanleiz, which John had by his third wife Edward lord Tiptost who died without issue, so the inheritance went to the sisters of the said earle John Tiptost.

Lord Beaumont.

And here I thinke it not amisse to say somewhat of the lord Beaumont, who bring in our chronicles named constable of England (as may appeare in the five and twentieth yere of Henrie the first, in which yere he arrested Humfric duke of Gloucester) that for any thing that I can yet see or learne, this Beaumont was not constable by patent during his life, but for the present time to execute the princes pleasure, and therefore not meet in this discourse to haue any speciall place amongst such as were constables of England, either by descent or patent.

Sir Richard Woodvile knight, earle Riuer, was Richard high constable of England in the fourth yere of king Edward the fourth, of whom is more large mention in the following discourse of the treasurers of England in the historie of the reigne of quene Elizabeth.

George Plantagenet.

George Plantagenet, second sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was created amongst other estates duke of Clarence, in the yere of our redemption 1461, being the first yere of king Edward the fourth immediately upon his coronation, and was made constable of England in the time of Edward the fourth. He in the eight of Edward the fourth, about the yere of Christ 1468, married Isabell the eldest daughter of Richard Beuill earle of Marwike and Salisburie, by whom he had issue Edward earle of Marwike and Salisburie, borne upon the sea in the haven of Calis, who was in the time of Richard the third a continuall prisoner, and so having bene a prisoner, and thereto borne by a certeine fatall destiny, was in the yere of our redemption 1485, being the first of king Henrie the seventh committed to custodie in the Tower, where he continued all the rest of his life, and was beheaded at Tower hill in the fiftieth yere of king Henrie the seventh, being the yere of Christ 1499, and was buried at Wilsam nere to his ancestors. Besides this Edward, this George duke of Clarence had issue a daughter called Margaret, created by king Henrie the eighth countesse of Salisburie, who married sir Richard Pole knight of the garter, descended of the ancient familie of the Poles in Wales.

Richard Plantagenet, the third sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was aduanced to the title and honoz of the dukedome of Gloucester, in the yere of our redemption 1461, being the first yere of king Edward the fourth, some after his coronation. He was high constable of England: he married Anne second daughter to Richard Beuill earle of Marwike and Salisburie. Which Richard after the death of his brother king Edward the fourth, did by the murder of his nephues ascend to the highest gouernement of England, and was crowned king by the name of Richard the third.

Richard Plantagenet.

Henrie Stafford, whome our chronicles doe in manye places corruptlie terme Edward, was sonne to Humfric earle Stafford, and was high constable of England, and duke of Buckingham. This man raising warre against Richard the third usurping the crowne, was in the first yere of the reigne of the said Richard, being the yere of Christ 1483, betrayed by his man Humfric Banasser (to whome being in distresse he fled for succour) and brought to Richard the third then lieng at Salisburie, where the safo duke confessing all the conspiracie, was behaded without arremnement or iudgement, vpon the second of Nouember, in the said yere of our redemption 1483, he married Katharine the daughter of Richard Moulle, sister to quene Elizabeth wife to Edward the fourth; & had issue, Edward duke of Buckingham, and Henrie earle of Wiltshire, with two daughters, whiche were, Anne married to George lord Hastings of whom is descended the erle of Huntington now liuing, and Elizabeth married to Richard Katliffe lord Fitz Waters, of whome is issued sir Henrie Katliffe knight, now earle of Suffolk.

Stafford.

Edward Stafford sonne to Henrie duke of Buckingham, being also duke of Buckingham after the death of his father was constable of England, earle of Hereford, Stafford, and Northampton, being in the first yere of Henrie the seventh, in the yere of our redemption 1485, restored to his fathers digni-ties and possessions. He is teamed in the booke of the law in the said thirteenth yere of Henrie the eight (where his arremnement is liberallie set downe) to be the founte & mirror of all courtelie. This man (as before is touched) was by Henrie the seventh restored to his fathers inheritance, in recompense of the losse of his fathers life, taken awaie (as before is said) by the vsurping king Richard the third. He married Elianor the daughter of Henrie earle of Northumberland, and had issue Henrie lord Stafford (father to Henrie lord Stafford now liuing) and three daughters, Elizabeth married to Thomas Howard earle of Surrie, Katharine married to Rafe Penill earle of Westmerland, and Marie married to George Penill lord of Aburgauennie. And thus much by Francis Thin touching the succession of the constables of England.]

In this meane while, were the emperor and the French king fallen at variance, so that the warre was renewed betwixt them; for the pacifying wherof the cardinall of Porke was sent ouer to Calis, where the ambassadours of both those princes were appointed to come to him. He arrived there the second of August. There went ouer with him the erle of Gloucester, then lord chamberleine, the lord of St. Johns, the lord Ferrers, the lord Herbert, the bishop of Duresme, the bishop of Elie, the pimat of Armacane, sir Thomas Bullen, sir John Beshie, sir John Bul-sie, sir Richard Wingham, sir Henrie Gifford, and manie other knights, esquires, gentlemen, doctors, and learned men. Thus honourable accompanied he rode thorough London the twentieth date of Iulie, and at Thomas Becketts house the maior and aldermen took leaue of him, praiering God to send him good speed. Thus passed he to Canturburie, where the archbishop of Canturburie and others receiued him in his stateliness, and brought him vnto his lodging vnder a canopie to the bishops palace. On the eighth date of Iulie he came to Douer. On the twentieth he & the other lords with their retinues took passage, and arrived at Calis in safetie, where the lord deputie and the counsell receiued them with much honour and lodged the cardinall in the Staple hall.

Cardinall

ouer to Calis.

Edw. Hall in
H. 8. fol. lxxxvj.

The emperor
& the French king their ambassadours met at Calis, to treat of a peace.

Shortlie after his arriual at Calis, thither came the chancelor of France, and the countie de Palice, with foure hundred horses, as ambassadours from the French king; and likewise from the emperor came great ambassadours, either partie being furnished with sufficient commissions to treat and conclude of peace as should appeare. But yet when it came to the point, as the one partie seemed conformable to reasonable offers, so the other would not incline that waie; insomuch that they were neuer at one time agreable to anie indifferent motion that could be made. There were also the popes ambassadours, wherupon the cardinall would haue set the red a league betwixt the emperor, the king of England, the king of France, and the pope: but the popes ambassadours wanted commission thereto, and therefore were letters sent to Rome in all hast, and the Frenchmen taried still in Calis, till answer came from thence.

The cardinall rode into Flanders to speake with the emperor, whiche as then late in Bruges. A mile without Bruges the emperor receiued him, and did to him as much honour as could be deuised. The chere was great which was made to the Englishmen, and of euerie thing there was such plenty, that there was no want of things necessarie, insomuch that of the fare, both for plentifulnesse, delicatnesse, and stateliness of seruice, a man might haue said:

Bequeſta magnorum dixisset deorum.

The cardinall after he had solozned in Bruges the space of thirtene daies, and concluded diuerse matters with the emperor, and accomplished his commission, he took leaue of his maiestie, and by conuenient tormeis returned to Calis, where the ambassadors of France taried his coming: and immediatlie after his returne to Calis, he treated with them of peace, but not so earnestlie as he did before. In fine, nothing was concluded, but onelie that sith-men of both the princes might stidie sith on the seas without disturbance, till the second of Februarie next. When no conclusion of agreement could be accorded, the cardinall sent to the emperor the lord of St. Johns, and sir Thomas Bullen knight, to aduer-tise his maiestie what had bene done; and likewise to the French king, as then lieng in campe with a mightie armie in the marches about Cambreie. The earle of Worcester and the bishop of Elie were sent to informe him of all things that had bene motioned, exhorting him to incline to peace, but he gaue little care thereto: and then after they had bene a ninetene or twentie daies in his host they returned.
During the continuance of the cardinall in Calis, all writs and patents were there by him sealed, and no shrikes chosen for lacke of his presence, hauing there with him the great seale, & full power in things, as if the king had bene there in person. Ambassa-dours coming from the king of Hungarie towards the king of England, were receiued honourable of the Cardinall during his abode in Calis.

After the returne of the English ambassadours, whiche the cardinall had sent to the emperor, and to the French king, he returned into England, hauing (as before is said) concluded a new league with the emperor, and signified by waie of intendment to the French king in the treatie with his ambassadours, that the king of England meant him not so much friendship as of late he had done, for diuerse causes.
But speciallie this was uttered, that where it was concluded that the king of Scots should be included within the league (as before yee haue heard) contra-rie to that agreement, the said king refused to enter as a confederate into the same league: and this no doubt proceeded through counsell of the French king, by whom he was wholly guided. This quarrell was laid as an occasion, whie to moue the king of England (perceiuing himselfe to be dissembled with) to withdraw his good will from the French king.

Who when he vnderstood the drifts of the cardinall, and conclusion of the new league confirmed betwixt the king of England and the emperor, he condemned the cardinall of vntruth, accused him of dissimulation, abhorred his practices, as by the which he lost the fruition of the king of England his friendship, and might no longer inioy it. And here with he determined with himselfe neuer to put confidence in anie Englishman after, nor to bestow anie gifts or pensions vpon them. For he bled pœrelie to send to divers of the kings counsell after the manner of his predecessors sundrie gifts and summes of monie: & because he had imployed more on the cardinal than on the residue, he was the more offended toward him as the head of all this invidious doing. Yet he found not himselfe so much grieved, as to bitter anie bitter words towards the king: but contrarie with in a while after, directed his letters unto him, signifieng that he meant to continue the league as his friend: but it maie be he did this after a dissembling sort, because he would not be at warres with two so mightie princes at one time.

In this meane while, the warre was pursued betwixt the emperor & the French king, as well on the confines towards Flanders, as beyond the mountains in the parties of Lombardie. Lornate was besieged by the lord Hugh de Boncada, a Spaniard, the which comming upon the sudden, toke maie abroad in the fields, yet they knew of his approach, and after this, comming before the citie, he intrenched it with a hedge, to keepe the citizens from stirring forth, and sent part of his armie with the light horsemen to beset the streets and passages, that no succour should come to them within. The French king assembled an armie, in hope to aid them of Lornate with men, munitions, and vittels, the which armie assailed twice or thrise with all cindores, to have approached the citie: but in vaine, for with no small losse the French were repelled by the imperials, which neuertheless felt their part of slaughter, losing sundrie of their capitaines, as basard Cnerie, and the captaine of Saint. Finally, the French armie brake up, & was dispersed into forestes. Whereupon they of Lornate perceiving the succours which they hoped for, to faile them thus at need, rendered the citie to the emperor the last of November, in this 13 yeare of king Henries reigne.

Pope Leo died this yeare suddenicly, on the first of December, as he laie at the village of Agalliana, whither he went oftentimes for his recreation. He had heard the first reayport of the taking of Agillan, which stirred in him such an extream passion of ioy, that the same night he entered into a small feauer: and for his better remedie he caused himselfe the next day to be remoured to Rome: where he died within a verie few daies after, notwithstanding the physicians in the beginning made no great reckoning of his disease. There was great suspicion that he was poisoned by Barnabie Spalestina his chamberleine, whose office was alwaies to give him drinke. And yet though he was made prisoner through the suspicion of the fact, & the vehement reasons of the same; yet the matter was dashed and the examination thereof: for that the cardinal de Medecis as soon as he came to Rome, set him at libertie, fearing to fall further in disgrace of the French king, by whose practise it was supposed that Barnabie gaue him the fatall drinke. This was but whispered secretlie, the author being no lesse doubtfull than the coniectures uncerteine.

He died (if we consider the common opinion of men) in verie great glozie and felicitie, not so much for that by the surpsing of Agillan he saw himselfe delivered of dangers & expences intollerable, which having drained him of all store of monie and treasure, he was constrained to advance all meanes and manners for his supplie and relieving: but also that a verie few daies afore his death he received advertisement of the taking of Plaisanca, and the verie day he died, newes came to him of the winning of Parma: a matter so greatlie desired by him, that at such time as he debated to move warre against the Frenchmen, it is verie well remembred that he said unto the cardinal de Medecis labouring to dissuade him, that as he was in nothing more caried to the desire of that warre, than to recover to the church those two cities; so when so euer God should blesse him with the effect of that desire, it would not grieve him to die. He was a prince in whom were manie things worthy to be commended & blamed, and in the estate & discourse of his life he deceived greatlie the expectation that was had of him, when he was created pope, for that in his gouernment was great discretion, but farre lesse bountie than was looked for.]

After the death of the pope, doctor Richard Pace was sent to Rome, to make friends in the behalfe of the cardinal of Porke, who was brought into a baine hope thorough the kings fauour and furtherance, to be elected pope. But Adrian the first of that name was chosen before doctor Pace could come to Rome; and so that lute was dashed. This Adrian bishop of Derchuso (after great contention in the college of cardinals touching the election of a new pope) was preferred to the custome of lotting of votes in the conclaue, without anie affection or parcialitie of voice: he was of nation a Fleming, & in his youth having bene scholemaster to Cesar, and by his meane made cardinal under pope Leo, did at that time gouerne Spaine in the absence of Cesar. And as there began some voices to publish for him, so cardinal Visto one of that election, began under an oration speciall, to recount and amplifie his vertues and knowledge, by whose example certeine other cardinals yielded, and the residue from hand to hand followed, though more by constraint than counsell.

Thus was he chosen with the voices of all the cardinals, and had his creation perfected the same morning. Wherein this was to be wondered at, that certain those that had elected him could giue no reason, why amid so manie troubles & dangers in the estate ecclesiastike, they had raised to the soueraigne see a stranger, a forreiner, and of long absence out of the countrie, & wherein were helping no respects of fauour, no consideration of former merits, nor anie commendation had with anie of the other cardinals: yet they scarce knew his name, he had neuer bene in Italie, and had no hope nor cogitation to see it: of which strauagant manner of dealing, being not able to excuse themselves, they attributed all to the working of the holie-ghost, who is twont (for so they alleged) to inspire the hearts of the cardinals in the electing of popes: he receiued newes of his election in the towne of Vitoria in Biskaye, and would not haue imposed upon him anie other name than his owne, which he caused to be published under Adrian the first.

Now he made his entrie into Rome the nine and twentieth of August, with a great concourse of the commons and the whole court: of whome albeit his comming was desired with an vniuersall gladnesse (for that without the presence forsooth of the popes, Rome beareth more a resemblance of a saunge desert than of a citie) yet that spectacle wrought sundrie impressions and diuersities of thoughts in the minds of all men, when they considered that they had a pope for nation and language a stranger, and for the affaires of Italie and the court altogether experienced: and also for that he was not of those regions and countries, who by long conuersation were already made familiar with the customes of Italie. The enuie that stirred by in men this consideration was redoubled by the accident of the plague, which beginning in Rome at his arrivall, afflicted the citie during the whole season of Autumne, to the great calamitie and losse of the people: a matter which in the fantasies of men was construed to an evil prognostication of his pontificacie.]

Notwithstanding this election of Adrian (as you heare) accomplished; yet doctor Pace kept his course according to his commission. This Pace was a right worthy man, and one that gaue in counsell wisely.

Polydor. Cardinal wolke maie both meane to be elected pope.

faithfull aduise. He learned he was also, and indued with many excellent good gifts of nature, courteous, pleasant, and delighting in musike, highlie in the kings fauour, and well heard in matters of weight. But the more the prince fauoured him, the more was he mistlike of the cardinall, who sought onelie to breake all the rule himselfe, and to haue no partener; so that he procured that this doctor Pace vnder coloz of ambassage, should be sent forth of the realme, that his presence about the king should not twin him too much authoritie and fauour at the kings hands.

Edw. Hall.
Doctoz Tunstall made bishop of London.

1523

This yeare was a great death in London and other places of the realme. Many men of honour and great worship died, and amongst other, the bishop of London, doctor Fitz James, in whose place was doctor Tunstall elected. The earle of Surrie returned out of Ireland, and came to the court the five and twentieth of Januarie. Many complaints were made by the merchants to the king and his counsell of the Frenchmen, which spoiled them by sea of their goods. For by reason that the wars were open betwixt the emperor, and the French king, many ships of warre were abroad on both parts, and now and then the Englishmen fell into their hands, and were used as enemies; namely by the Frenchmen, which naturally hated the Englishmen. The French kings ambassadours promised restitution of euery thing, but little was restored. In this month of Januarie therefore, the king commanded all his ships to be rigged, and made readie, which was done with all diligence.

The king of England and the king of France at variance.

Christopher Columbus.

On the second daie of Februarie, the king as then being at Orkenewich, received a bull from the pope, whereby he was declared Defendor of the Christian faith, & likewise his successors for ever. The cardinall of Porke sang the high masse that daie with all the pompous solemnitie that might be, and gaue cleane remission of sinnes to all that heard it. This title was ascribed vnto the king, because he had written a booke against Luther in Germanie; wherevnto the said Luther answered verie sharpelie, nothing sparing his authoritie nor maiestie. Of which booke published by the king, I will not (for reuerence of his royaltie) though I durst, report what I haue read: because we are to iudge honourable of our rulers, and to speake nothing but good of the princes of the people. Onelie this breife clause or fragment I will adde (least I might seeme to tell a tale of the man in the moon) that king Henrie in his said booke is reported to rage against the diuell and antichrist, to cast out his name against Luther, to rase out the name of the pope, and yet to allow his law, &c. I suppose the rest for shame, and returne to our historie.]

In this meane time, grudges and displeasures still grew and increased betwixt the king of England and the French king, so that their graces rankled daily more and more, till at length the duke of Albanie returned into Scotland, contrarie to that which was covenanted by the league. The French king in deed alleaged, that he was not partie to his going thither; and wrote to the king, that the said duke was entered Scotland without his assent: but it was otherwise iudged & knowne, that he had commission of the French king to go thither. Whereupon, the king was sore offended, and prepared for wars. Buffers were made of able men, and a note taken of what substance men were. The king also sent his ships to the sea, well trimmed, manned, and vittelled. The admerall was one Christopher Columbus, a expert sea man. His commission was, to save gard the merchants, and other the kings subiects, that were greivously spoiled and robbed on the sea, by Frenchmen, Scots, and other rousers.

The eight of Februarie, the lord Dacres, warden of the marches foreaneinst Scotland, entered into Scotland with five hundred men, by the kings commandement, & there proclaimed, that the Scots should come in to the kings peace, by the first of March following, or else to stand at their perils; the duke of Albanie being then within five miles with a mightie power of Scots. The eleuenth of Februarie, the lord of Aburgauennie was brought from the Tower to Westminster, and there in the kings bench confessed his indictment of mispission. The lord Pontefract was about the same time restored vnto the kings fauour. On the second of March, certaine noble men of the empire, arrived in England, to passe into Spaine, who were honourable received; and in honour of them, great iusts and triumphs were made, which being finished and done, they took their leave and departed on their iourne.

Duncan Campbell, a Scottish rouser, after long fight, was taken on the sea by John Arundell an chequier of Cornewall, who presented him to the king. He was committed to the Tower, & there remained prisoner a long season. All the kings ships were put in a readinesse, so that by the beginning of April, they were rigged and trimmed readie to make saile. This yeare died the lord Brooke, sir Edward Polnings, knight of the garter, sir John Perchie, and sir Edward Belknap, valiant captains, which were suspected to be poisoned at a banquet made at Ard, when the two kings met last. Wheat was sold this yeare in the citie of London, for twentie shillings a quarter, & in other places for twentie six shillings eight pence.

In this yeare Caluan Dowglas, bishop of Dun-kell fled out of Scotland into England, because the duke of Albanie being come thither, had taken vpon him the whole gouernement of the king and realme there, the sequels of whose doings the bishop sore mistrusted. The king assigned vnto this bishop an honest pension to liue on. And shortly after, was Clarenceur the herald sent into Scotland, vnto the duke of Albanie, to command him to auoid that realme for diuerse confederations; & if he would not, then to desie him, with contrarie to the articles of the league concluded betwixt France & England, he was entered Scotland without his licence. The duke refused to accomplish the kings commandement, and was therefore desied by the said Clarenceur. The first of March, the French king commanded all Englishmens goods being in Burdeaur, to be attached, and put vnder arrest, and retained not onelie the monie due to be paid for the restitution of Lorraine, but also withheld the French quenes dowry.

The cardinall vnderstanding that he was euill spoken of, for dising his power legantine to such aduantage as he did, in selling graces & dispensations, he thought to bestow some part thereof amongst the people freelie, without taking arie thing for the same. Whereupon, when Lent drew nere, he appointed the preachers at Pauls crosse, to declare, that it should be lawfull to all persons for that Lent, to eat milke, butter, cheese, & eggs. And to the end that none should haue arie scrupulousnesse of conscience in so doing, he by his authoritie granted remission of sins to all those that did eat white meats: knowing as it were afore hand, that the people giuen to the obseruance of their religious fast, would not easilie be brought to breake the same, contrarie to the ancient custome used in their countrie. Neither was he deceived therein, for so farre were the people from receiuing or counting this as a benefite, that they took it rather for a wicked & cursed deed in those that received it, & few or almost none could be induce to breake their old order and scrupulous trade in that behalfe.

The king, vnderstanding how his subiects were handled at Burdeaur by the French kings commandement, Jertingham, Anthoine Bneuet, sir John Tremeille, and sir William Skevington the maister of the kings ordinance, & John Fabian sergeant at armes, by whome this enterpryse was chieflie moued, with diuerse others, which in the end of June departed from Hampton, noising that they should onelie scowle the seas for safegard of the emperor and his nauie.

The emperor
departeth out of England
Spainc.

On the first of Iulie, the emperours nauie came before Hampton, containing an hundred and foure score goodlie ships. Then the emperor took leaue of the king, of whome he had manie great gifts, and notable summes of monie by waie of lone; & so the first of Iulie he took his ship, and made saile to Spainc, where he arrived in safetie the tenth daie after. The king bozrowed of the citie of London twentie thousand pounds, and deliuered prynces seales for warrant of the repayment. None were charged but men of good wealth. The like lone was practised through all the realme, not without grudge of manie persons that were called vpon for the same. The earle of Surrie hauing waisted the emperor ouer to the coast of Wiscate, vpon his returne finding the wind fauourable, according to his instructions, made to the coast of Britaine, and landing with his people in number seven thousand, about fise miles from Pozeis, marched thither, and assaulling the towne, wan it.

the winning of Pozeis in Britaine by the earle of Surrie.

For the maister gunner Christopher Pozreis hauing there certeine falcons, with the shot of one of them, stroke the locke of the wicket in the gate, so that it flew open: and then the same Christopher and other gentlemen, with their souldiers, in the smoke of the gunnes pressed to the gates, and finding the wicket open, entered, and so finally was the towne of Pozeis towne, and put to sacke. The souldiers gained much by the pillage, for the towne was exceeding rich, and speciallie of linnen cloth. When they had rifled the towne thoroughlie, and taken their pleasure of all things therein, the earle caused them by sound of trumpet to resort to their standards, and after they had set fire in the towne, and burned a great part thereof, the earle retreated with his armie towards his ships, burning the villages by the waie, and all that night lay on land. On the morrow after they took their ships, and when they were bestowed on board, the earle commanded sixtene or seuentene ships small and great, lieng there in the hauen, to be burnt.

Diuerse gentlemen knighted by the earle of Surrie vpon the winning of Pozeis.

When the lord admerall had thus towne the towne of Pozeis, he called to him certeine esquires, and made them knights, as sir Francis Brian, sir Anthoine Botwne, sir Richard Cornewall, sir Thomas Dore, sir Giles Hulseie, sir John Kiffell, sir John Keinsford, sir George Cobham, sir John Cornewallis, sir Edward Kigleie, and diuerse other. After this they continued a while on the coast of Britaine, and disquieted the Britains by entering their haucens, and sometimes landing and doing diuerse displeasures to the inhabitants about the coast. After that the earle had lien a while thus on the coast of Britaine, he was countermanded by the kings letters, who thereupon brought backe his whole fleet vnto a place called the Colw, vnder the Ile of Wight, and then went on land himselfe, discharging the more part of his people, and leauing the residue with certeine ships vnder the gouernance of the viceadmerall sir William Fitz Williams, to keepe the seas against the French.

Polydor.

In this meane while, diuerse exploits were achieved betwixt them of the garrisons in the marches of Calis, & the Frenchmen of Bullongne and Bullongnois: but still the losse ran for the most part on the French side. For the English frontiers were well and stronglie furnished with good numbers of men of warre, and gouerned by right sage and balliant capitaine, which daily made inuasions vpon the French confines, and namelie sir William Sandes treasurer of the towne of Calis, and sir Edward Wilford marshall, were two that did the Frenchmen most displeasure. On the third of Iulie, three hundred French hoisemen comming nere to the castell of Gufines, kept themselves in covert, appointing eight or ten of their companie to shew themselves in sight to the Englishmen within. Whereupon there went forth eight archers, and fell in skirmish with those hoisemen, till there came three other to the rescue of the Frenchmen, and skirmished with the archers on foot.

Herewith issued out of Gufines twelue demilances all Englishmen, in rescue of the footmen, and then all the troope of the French hoisemen brake forth and set on the Englishmen. The footmen, so long as they had any arrowes to bestow, shot lustilie, and in the end were driuen to defend themselves with their swords. The Englishmen keeping together, entered into the band of the Frenchmen, brake their speares, and after fought and laid about them with their swords, so that they made a waie, and escaped from those three hundred French hoisemen. Of the French side were slaine three men and six hoisemen, the English archers on foot selling their liues dearelie, were all slaine, for the Frenchmen would not take any of their prisoners, they were so angrie for losse of their fellows.

On the five and twentieth of Iulie, the treasurer and marshall of Calis, with fourtene hundred footmen, entered the French pale: and finding not monsieur de Fostat for whome they sought, they went to Whitland baie, set the towne on fire, and assaulling the church, into which the people were withdraue, wan it, and afterwards set fire on the steeple, because that diuerse, hauing shot by themselves therein, through counsell of a priest that was with them, refused to yield, till the fire caused them to leape downe and so manie of them perished, and the rest were taken prisoners, and led to Calis. About two daies before this, to wit, the three and twentieth daie of Iulie, one Thwaites a capteine of an English ship, with sir scoze men, archers and others, took land beside Bullongne, and passing vp into the countrie three miles to a towne called Newcastell, forraied all the parts as he went, and in his returne set fire on that towne, and burnt a great part thereof, and came againe to his ship in safetie, notwithstanding fourscore baggubters, and three hundred other men of warre of the countrie came forth, and pursued the Englishmen verie fiercelie: but the Englishmen putting them backe, got to their ship, and lost not a man.

Pozreouer, whilst the warres were thus followed in France, the lord Koffe, and the lord Dacres of the north, which were appointed to keepe the borders against Scotland, burnt the towne of Kelsie, and fourscore villages, & ouerthrew eightene towers of stone, with all their barnedikes. Also the king appointed the earle of Shrewsburie to be his lieutenant generall of the north parts, against the inuasion which was intended by the duke of Albanie, which earle directed his letters to all the shires lieng from Trent northward, that all men should be in a readinesse. Order was taken by the cardinall, that the true value of all mens substance might be knowen, and he would haue had euerie man sworne to haue uttered the true valuation of that they were worth, and required a tenth part thereof to be granted towards the kings charges now in his warres, in like case as the spiritualtie had granted a fourth part, and were content to liue on the other three parts.

This demand was thought gréuous to them of the citie of London, where the cardinall first moued it; so that manie reasons were alleaged by them why they iudged themselves sore dealt with. In the end they brought in their billes, which were received vpon their honesties. The king in this meane time, being now entered into wars with France, thought not to suffer his enimies to rest in quiet: and therefore leaued an armie which he sent ouer to Calis, appointing the earle of Surrie to be generall of the same. When the earle was come to Calis, and had taken order in his businesse for that tournie, he set forward with his armie, being diuided into three battles or wards, of the which, the first was led by sir Robert Katcliffe, lord Fitz Water, the middle ward or battell the earle himselfe guided, and with him his brother the lord Edmund Howard. The reward was gouerned by sir William Sands, and sir Richard Wilingfield, both being knights of the garter. Capteine of the horsemen was sir Edward Guilford.

of September, being tuesdaye, and toke their iour-nie toward Hedding. By the way there came to them a great powter of Burgognians from the ladie Margaret, as then regent of Flanders, according to the articles of the league. All the towncs, billages, and castels in the countrie thorough the which they marched, were burned, wasted, and destroyed on euerie side of their waie : as the towne and castell of Sel-kois, the towne of Wume bylde, Senekerke, Wottingham, & Panstier, the towne and castell of Per-bins, the towne of Dauerne, the castels of Colum-berge, and Kew, the towne and church fortified of Boards, saint Marie de Bois, the towne of Waus, the towne and castell of Fringes. On the sixteenth daie of September, the earle of Surrie with his armie of Englishmen and Burgognians, came before the castell of Hedding, and planted his siege before it.
 The towne was entered, and part thereof burned by the Burgognians.

Within the castell was capteine monsieur de Biez, hauing provided for defense of the place all things necessarie; so that the earle of Surrie, and other the capitaine of the hoast, perceiving they could not within anie short time win it, after they had bin before it eleuen daies, they raised their siege, the chief because they had no great battering peeces to overthrow the walles. For the weaether was such, and the waies wared so deepe towards the latter end of that summer, that they could not conueie with them anie great ordinaunce. From Hedding they passed forward, and coming to Dolens, burned the towne, and raised the castell. From thence they came vnto the towne of Warrier, which they burnt also and spoiled.
Thus they burned and spoiled all the waie as they passed. But the weaether still wared worse and worse, so that manie fell sicke through intemperance thereof, and the Burgoginians and Spaniards which were in the armie returned into Flanders.

Then the earle of Surrie, perceiuing that he could no longer keepe the field in that season of the yeare, turned backe towards Calis in good order of battell, and came thither the sixteenth of October. He would gladiie in deed (before the departure of the Burgonians and Spaniards) haue passed the wa- ter of Somme: but other capitaines considering the time of the yeare to be past, and that the whole armie consisted not above eightene thousand men, iudged it more wisdome to returne, and so in the end their opinions were followed. After that the English armie was returned to Calis, the earle of Surrie sent forth sir William Sands, sir Maurice Berkeleie, sir William Fitz Williams, and with them three thou-and men, which burned Marguison, the towne of saint Jehans rode, and also Temple towne, with manie villages.

They also bought a marvellous great bottie of goods out of the countrie, which they got at this robe, as fouretene thousand sheepe, a thousand four hundred oxen and kine, and other great cattell, a thousand three hundred hogs, and eight hundred mares and horses, besides prisoners. When the earle of Surrie had set things in order, and appointed forth such as he would haue remaine in the garrisons, on that side the sea; he returned, and all the residue of the armie (sauing those that were commanded to tarie) came ouer also with the nauie, and arrived in the Thames; and so euerie man into his countrie at his pleasure. There remained also behind a companie of men of warre called aduenterers, which serued without wages, liuing onlie on that which they could catch & win of the enimies. There were foure hundred of them that went with the armie now this last time into France, and did much hurt vnto the Frenchmen: for they were by practise become expert and skilfull in the points of warre, and daile exploited one enterprise or other, to their owne aduantage, and hinderance of the enimie.

The duke of Albanie being in this mean while established gouernour of Scotland, raised an armie of fourescore thousand men and aboue, with the which he approached to the English borders: but made no invasion. The mistrust that he had in the Scots caused him to staie, and therefore he sent to the French king for six thousand Almans, the which he daily looking for: (that in vaine) dyoue off time till the end of summer was now at hand, and then requiring a truce for certeine moneths, obtained it at the kings hand. The earle of Shewesburie had in a readinesse eight and twentie thousand men to haue resisted him, if he had entered vpon the English confines. After that an abstinence of warre was taken betwixt England and Scotland, then in October following there came into England three personages of small behauiour (as seemed) ambassadoers out of Scotland: they were smallie regarded, and shortly departed.

Their commission was onelie to vnderstand, whether the king had assented to the truce or not. Whereupon it was thought that they were sent rather for countenance onelie of fulfilling the promise made by the duke of Albanie at that present, when the truce was granted, than for any true meaning to accomplish that which was promised; that is to saie, to agree unto some briefnet and perfect conclusion of peace. The king hereupon doubting their old pranks, ordeined the earle of Northumberland and Henrie Percy the first of that name, warden of the whole marches who thankfullie received the hono: thereof, and so he departed. But whatsoeuer matter it was that mued him, hostlie after he began to make sute to the king, and ceased not, till he was of that office discharged: and then the earle of Surrie lord admirall of England was made generall warden, and the lord Sparquesse Dorset was made warden of the east and middle marches, and the lord Wacres of the west marches.

The earle of Dorchester was for this refused fall of exercising the office of lord warden, greatly blamed of his owne tenants, and accounted of all men to be bold of the loue and desire that noblemen ought to haue to honor and chivalrie. The lord Harquelle Dorset accompanied with sir William Bulmer, and sir Arthur Darcie, with manie other of the nobilitie, the second of Aprill then being thursdaibefore Easter, entered into Tindale, and so passing for ward ten miles into Galloswaie, burnt on euery side the towne and villages. All the night he carried

The parlement holden at the Blackefriers in London. Edw. Hall. in H. 8. fol. Cvj.

On the fifteenth daie of Aprill began the parlement, which was holden as then at the Blackefriers, and that daie the masse of the Holie-ghost was song, all the lords being present in their parlement robes. ¶ Now when masse was finished, the k. came to the parlement chamber, and there sat downe in the seat roiall of thron, and at his feet on the right side sat the cardinall of Yorke and the archbishop of Canturburie, and at the raille behind stood doctor Tunstall bishop of London, which made to the whole parlement an eloquent oration, declaring to the people the office of a king. First he must be a man of iudgement, according to the saying of the prophet Dauid, Domus iudicium tuum regi dā. Also he must be a man of great learning, according to the saying of the prophet, Erudimini qui indicatis terram. According to which sayings he said, that God had sent vs a prince of great iudgement, of great learning, and great experience: which according to his princelie dutie, forgot not to studie to set forward all things which might be profitable to his people and realme, least might be laid to his charge the saying of Seneca; Es rex & non habes tempus esse rex? Art thou a king and hast no time to be a king? Which is as much to saie, as; Art thou a king, and doest nothing profitable to thy people? Art thou a king, and seest the people haue an insufficient law? Art thou a king, and wilt not provide remedie for the mischance of thy people?

The oration of doctor Tunstall bishop of London.

These things haue moued the kings most excellent maiestie to call this his high court of parlement, both for the remedie of mischances which be in the common law, as recoueries, foren vouchers & corrupt trials, and for making and ordering of new statutes, which mate be to the high advancement of the common-wealth. Wherefore he willeth his commons to repaire to the common house, and there to elect them a speaker, or their common mouth, and to certifie the lord chancelor of the same, who should thereof make report to the kings most noble grace, and should declare his pleasure when he would haue him presented to his person. This was the cause of the parlement, as he said. But suerlie of these things no word was spoken in the whole parlement, and in effect no good act made, except the grant of a great subsidie were one. But according to this instruction the commons departed to the common house, & chose for their speaker sir Thomas More knight, & presented him on the Saturday after in the parlement chamber, where he (according to the old vsage) disabled himselfe both in wit, learning, & discretion, to speake before the king, and brought in for his purpose how one Rhomio desired Haniball to come to his reading, which thereto assented, and when Haniball was come he began to read De militari, that is, of chenaltrie. When Haniball perceived him, he called him arrogant sole: because he would presume to teach him which was maister of chenaltrie, in the seats of warre. So the speaker said, if he should speake before the king, of learning and ordering of a common-wealth and such other like, the king so well learned and of such prudence and experience might saie to him as Haniball said to Rhomio. Wherefore he desired his grace that the commons might choose an other speaker.

The oration of sir Thomas More speaker for commons.

The cardinall answered, that the king knew his wit, learning, and discretion by long experience in his seruice: wherefore he thought that the commons had chosen him as the most meetest of all; and so he did admit him. Then sir Thomas More gaue to the king his most humble thanks, and desired of him two petitions: the one, if he should be sent from the commons to the king on message and misake their intent, that he might with the kings pleasure resort againe vnto the commons for the knowledge of their true meaning. The other was, if in communication and reasoning, any man in the common house should speake more largelie than of dutie he ought to doe, that all such offenses should be pardoned, and that to be entered of record. Which two petitions were granted; and so thus began the parlement and continued as you shall heare.]

This yeare was the citie and the whole Ile of the Rhodes conquered by the Turke, and all the christians displaced: whereof Guicciardin hath discoursed as followeth. ¶ The end of this yeare (saith he) was made no lesse wretched and unhappie, than dangerous to all christian princes for the losse of the Ile of Rhodes: which Soliman Ottoman toke by violence, notwithstanding it was defended by the knights of Rhodes, called in other times more ancient the knights of saint John of Jerusalem. And abiding in that place since they were chased out of Jerusalem, notwithstanding they laie betwixt two so mightie princes as the Turke & the Soldan; yet their valour had preserved it of long time, and to the right worthie glorie of the christian religion in those seas: & yet they were not without their impatations: & notes of infamie, for that hauing a continuall custome for the better defending of those shoares, to spoile the vessels of the infidels, they were thought sometimes to make pillage of christian ships.

The Turke sent into the Island a wonderfull great armie, which remaining there manie moneths with no lesse horzour to good men for their cruelties, than terror to all men for their huge numbers, at last he came thither in person. And desiring to his desire of conquest and glorie, the respect of profit and riches which the victorie would yield, he lost not one minute of time to vex them. Wherein his industrie was nothing inferior to his valour, for sometimes he cast monstrous mines and trenches, sometimes he raised platfozmes of earth and wood, whose height ouertopped the wals of the towne, and sometimes he afflicted them with most furious and bloudie assaults: insomuch that as these works and engines were not performed without a wonderfull butcherie & slaughter of his souldiours; so also the defense of them was so dangerous to the liues of them within, that manie numbers were diminished, manie bodies maimed and made vnersurable, & the residue soze terrified by the calamitie of their companions and friends, to whom they could giue no other propertie of compassion, than to mourne with them in their common miserie.

Their aduersitie was so much the more intolerable, by how much their travels were without fruit, their words without comfort, and their valour disfaunored of fortune, & lastlie their store of gunpowder was consumed, which is not the least necessitie for the defense of a place. They saw before their eyes huge breaches made into their walles with the artilleries of their enemies, they discerned severall mines wrought into manie parts of the towne, and they found by lamentable experience, that the lesse god they did, the more painfullie they laboured, for that their fortune had reduced them to these termes of extrenmitie, that in abandoning one place to relieue another, they put both in danger, not hauing numbers sufficient to furnish the seruice, and lesse expectation expectation of rescue amid perils so raging and desperate: so that, what for that their necessities were greater than their hopes, & their defence less able by the continuall diminution of their numbers, & lastly holding it no breach of honour to preserve by wisdom and composition, that they could no longer defend by their valour and prowess, they gave place to their destinie, and capitulated with the Turke as followeth. That the great master of their order should leave the towne to him: that as well he as all his knights should depart in safetie, with libertie to carie with them as much of their goods as they could. And for assurance of this capitulation, the Turke should withdraw out of those seas, his fleet or naue, and retire his armie by land five miles from Rhodes. By vertue of which capitulation Rhodes remained to the Turkes, and the christians passed into Sicilie, and so into Italie, keeping their faith and profession unviolated. They found in Sicilie an armie by sea compounded of a certeine number of vessels, with great reliefe of vittells and munitions, and readie to hoise saile at the next wind to reuintle Rhodes. The noblesse of this rescue was laid to the popes fault.

After they were departed, Soliman for a more contempt of christian religion, made his entrie into the citie upon the daie of the birth of the sonne of God: which daie being celebrated in the churches of christians with noise of musike & holie innocations, he converted all the churches of Rhodes dedicated to the service of Iesus Christ, into Mosques (so they call their temples) which after all the christian rites and ceremonies were abolished, they made dedicate to Mahomet. God cause had the christians hereupon with heauie hearts to make their complaint to God by the president of the psalmist, lamenting the libertie of the enemies exercising the vehemencie of his rage against Gods people: & full well with swolne ries testifying the sorrow of their soules might (sauld he sounding the dumps of their threnomina) saie:

perde funditus Hostes proteruos, qui tuum sacrum Mant nefanda pollunt, Clangunt sonora buccina, non que tuas Ludes canat, ludibrio Sed fides acerbo qua profanet: in tuis Pecillia sequuntur turribus, &c.

To vnderstand more of this historie touching the taking of Rhodes, what moued the Turke to couet the same, his letter comminatorie to Philip de Willers who took part against him, with other accidents and circumstances belonging to this martiall action; read the report of Edward Hall, which is verie copious and plentifull in this behalfe. And now will we returne to our owne affaires here in England. About this time the bishop of Durham departed this life, & the king gaue that bishopricke to the cardinal, who resigned the bishopricke of Bath to doctor John Clerke master of the rolles, and sir Henrie Parre that was vicechamberleine, was made lord priuie seale, and shortly after was created lord Parre. In the end of this yeare, doctor Blith bishop of Chester was attached for treason, but he acquitted himselfe. About this time the cardinal exercised his authoritie (which he pretended by his power legatine) verie largelie, not onelie in prouiding of testaments in his court, calling the executors and administrators before him, of what diocesse soener they were, but also by prouisions he gaue all benefices belonging to spirituall persons, and ran thereby with in danger of the premonition, as after ward was laid to his charge.

But after that he perceiued his owne follie and rash doing herein, contrarie to the lawes, which would not permit that anie such things as were moued within the prouince of Cantuarburie, might be concluded without the authoritie of the archbishop, he sent them againe to Poules, and safe himselfe at Westminster with his cleargie of the prouince of Poike. And euen as there was much adoe amongst them of the common house about their agreement to the subsidie, so was there as hard hold for a while amongst them of the clergie in the conuocation house. Painelie Richard bishop of Winchester, & John bishop of Rochester held soze against it, but most of all sir Roland Philips vicar of Croidon, and one of the canons of Poules, being reputed a notable preacher in those daies, spake most against that payment.

But the cardinal taking him aside, so handled the matter with him, that he came no more into the house, willinglie absenting himselfe to his great infamie, and losse of that estimation which men had of his innocencie. Thus the belwedder giuing ouer his hold, the other yielded, and so was granted the halfe of all their spirituall reuenues for one yeare, to be paid in five yerres following, that the burthen might the more easilie be borne. The parlement being begun (as ye haue heard) the cardinal on the nine and twentieth day of Aprill came into the common house, and there shewing the great charges that the king necessarilie was at, and daile must be at in maintenance of his warres against the frenche and Scots, demanded the summes of eight hundred thousand pounds to bee raised of the first part of euerie mans goods and lands, that is to wit, foure shillings of euerie pound.

This demand was enforced on the morrow after, by sir Thomas More then speaker of the parlement: but he spake not so much in perswading the house to grant it, but other spake as earnestlie against it, so that the matter was argued to and fro, and handled to the bittermost. There were that proued how it was not possible to haue it leuied in morie, for men of lands and great substance had not the first part of the same in coine. And sith the king by the loan had received two shillings of the pound, which by this rate amounted to 400000 pounds: and now to haue foure shillings of the pound, it would amount in the whole vnto twelue hundred thousand pounds, which is first and last six shillings of the pound, being almost a third part of euerie mans goods, which in coine might not be had within this realme.

For the proofe whereof was alledged, that if there were in England but twentie thousand parishes, and euerie parish should giue an hundred markes, that were but fiftene hundred thousand markes, which is but an hundred thousand pounds; and there be not verie manie parishes in England one with another, as ble to spare an hundred markes, out of cities and townes. And where it is written, that in England there be fortie thousand parish churches, it was proued that there were not thirtene thousand at this daie. Hard hold there was about this demand, and certeine wise and discret persons were sent to the cardinal, to moue him to be a meane to the king, that a lesse summe might be accepted: but he answered that he would rather haue his tong plucked out of his head with a paire of pinners, than to moue the king to take anie lesse summe: and so with that answer they departed, reporting to the house the cardinals words. Then euerie daie was reasoning, but nothing concluded.

Whereupon the cardinal came againe into the lower house, and desired that he might reason with them that were against the demand: but he was answered that the order of that house was to heare, and not to reason, except amongst themselves. Where he began to shew arguments of the great wealth of the realme, so that it might be thought, that he repined and disdaind that anie man should be wealthie but himselfe. After he was gone, the commons debated the matter according to their former maner, and so in the end concluded of two shillings in the pound, from twentie pounds upward, and from forty shillings to twentie pounds, of euerie twentie shillings twelue pence, and vnder forty shillings of euerie head of sixtene pences and vnder four pence to be paid in two yeares. When this was notified to the cardinall, he was much therewith offended, so that to please him, at length, the gentlemen of fiftie pounds land and vnder, by the liberrall motion of sir John Huseie, a knight of Lincolnshire, were burdened with twelue pence more of the pound of the same lands, to be paid in three yeares.

Sir John Huseie.

The cardinall to moue them thereto, bare them in hand that the lords had agreed to foure shillings of the pound, which was untrue: for they had granted nothing, but staid till they might vnderstand what the commons would do. The king therefore hauing knowledge of this, and such other notable lies uttered by the cardinall, repproved him therefore verie sharpelie, and said that per it were long he would loke to things himselfe without anie substitute. A marvellous matter to consider how much the cardinall was coled herewith, and how lowlie for a while he bare himselfe, so that thereby it well appeared how the matters sharpenesse now and then, doth much to restrain the euill nature of the seruant. But the cardinall within a few daies after, pacifying the kings displeasure toward him, became nothing the better.

Polydor.

After that the foresaid grant was passed and accorded, the parlement was prorogued till the tenth of June. During which prorogation, the common people said to the burgeses; Sirs, we heare say you will grant foure shillings of the pound, we aduise you to do so that you may go home: with manie euill words and threatenings. In this season the cardinall by his power legantine dissolued the conuocation at Doules called by the archbishop of Cantuarburie, calling him and all the cleergie to his conuocation at Westminster, which was neuer scene before in England (saith Hall) whereof maister Skelton a merrie poet wrote:

Edw. Hall in H.8. fol. Cx.

The cardinall dissolued the archbishop of Cantuarburie conuocation.

Gentle Paule lay downe thy sword,

For Peter of Westminster hath shauen thy beard.

When the parlement was begun againe, the gentlemen that saw themselves charged with twelue pence more of the pound for their lands, did so much, that it was granted, that men of fiftie pounds and vnder in goods, should also pay twelue pence of euerie pound in the fourth yeare: which could not be brought about but with great adu, and much grudging of the burgeses and commons. The one and thirtieth of Iulie, the parlement was adourned: Westminster, & there continuing till the thirteenth of August, was that day at nine of the clock at night dissolued. During the time of this parlement, the seven and twentieth of Aprill, was sir Arthur Platenagenet, bassard sonne to king Edward the fourth, at Wyndesore created vicount Lisle, in right of his wife, which was wife to Edmund Dupleie beheaded.

Arthur Platenagenet created vicount Lisle.

In this yeare the fiftenth of June, Christerne king of Denmarke, with his wife, and a small traine with them, landed at Douer, where he was noblely receiued by the earle of Devonshire, the bishops of Exeter and Rochester, and diuerse knights and esquieres which brought them to Greenwiche, where the king and queene receiued them with all honor. Now after he had remained at the court certaine daies, he was brought to London, & lodged at Bath place.

Essex, and Kent, and diuerse other lords and ladies. The citie made to him and to his wife a collicke banquet that night, and after he had passed the time a while in London, he resorted againe to the king, and had of him great gifts, and so likewise had his wife of the queene his aunt, & then taking their leave they departed, and were conueied to Douer. And thus after this king had bene in England two and twentie daies, he took shipping, and sailed againe into Flanders, where he remained as a banished man out of his owne countrie.

About the same time, the earle of Hildare being restored to the cardinals fauour, and taking to wife the ladie Elizabeth Graie, was sent ouer againe into Ireland to occupie his former office, where by the assistance of his faithfull friend Hugh Hynde archbishop of Dublin, and chancellour of that land, he brought the countrie into reasonable good order, so far as the rebellious doings of the wild Irish would permit. In this meane while, the warre was earnestly pursued betwene England & France, & England and Scotland, in somuch that each part did what in them lay to hurt other. On the borders toward Scotland lay the earle of Surrie high admerall of England, and the marques Dorset, with his brethren, sir William Compton, & sir William Kingston, with diuerse other knights and esquieres sent to them by the king, which daile invaded the realme of Scotland, and there vnto the castell of Wetherborne, the castell of West Melgate, the castell of Blackater, the tower of Spackwallles, the tower of east Melgate, & manie other, and burnt to the number of thirtie and seven villages, and haried the countrie from the east marches to the west, and neuer had skirmish.

For the Scots, albeit they shewed themselves in plumps, waiting some aduantage, they durst not yet approach to the maine battell of the Englishmen, so that in all this iournie there were but few Englishmen lost. When the lords perceived that the Scots ment not to make ante invasion into England this yeare, they took order for the fortifying of the frontiers, and so returned. It was thought that the cardinall perceiving in what fauour sir William Compton was with the king, and doubting least the same might diminish his authoritie, deuised to send him thus into the warres against the Scots. For the said sir William could not well brooke the cardinals presumption, in taking vpon him so highlie, to the derogation of the kings supreme gouernement, and therefore the cardinall in his absence thought to worke him out of fauour: but it would not be. For shortly after was sir William Compton called home to the court againe.

The Frenchmen burned a ship fraught with stone in the haven of Calis, vpon hope to haue destroyed the haven; but they missed the channell in bringing in the ship, and so after that the ship was consumed with fire, the stones were recovered out of the water, and brought into Calis, which serued the Englishmen to good vse. Diuerse enterprises were atchieued betwixt them of the garrisons French and English in those marches. In Iulie the lord Sands treasurer of Calis, with other capteins & souldiours, to the number of twelue hundred, entered into the confines of their enemies, and came before Bellingne, where they had a great skirmish, & put their enemies to the worse: and after marching into the countrie, took diuerse churches and other places which the Frenchmen had fortified, as the church of Wderfall, the steeple of Wdingham, and the castell of Hardingham, and so after they had bene within the enemies countrie almost two nights and two daies, they came backe to Calis, hauing not lost past a dozen of their men.

duke of Albanie would returne hostile into Scotland by sea, and bring with him a power of French men, prepared a fleet of tall and strong ships meet to encounter with the same duke and his power, and appointed for admirall, sir William Fitz Williams, & with him sir Francis Brian, sir Anthony Poyntes, sargeant Kot, John Hopton, William Gantson, Anthony Bneuet, Thomas West, and other, which used great diligence to have met with the said duke of Albanie. And as they laie on the French coast, the foure and twentieth of August being fundaie, at season of the clocke in the morning, they landed in the haven of Trepoist, and assaulted the Frenchmen that were in certeine bulwarks on the shore, and did what they could to impeach the Englishmens landing.

But the Englishmen encouraged by their captains, did so valiantlie (although they were but an handfull of men in comparison of their enemies, as seven hundred to six thousand) that in the end they repelled the Frenchmen, and wan their bulwarks of them, and in the same found diuerse peeces of ordinance, which they seized. And perceiuing that the Frenchmen fled to the towne of Trepoist, they followed, and shot at them right egerlie, so that manie of the Frenchmen were slaine and wounded, yet they could get to the towne. The Englishmen assaulted the gates but could not breake them open: yet they set fire on the suburbs, & also burnt seven ships which laie in the haven. The English captains perceiuing how the people of the countrie came downe in great numbers to the rescue of the towne, caused their men to get together such spoiles as they might bring awaie in that sudden: and then after they had bene on land five houres, with like speed as they came, they retired backe againe to their ships, not without some losse and damage of men both hurt & slaine; as it often hapneth, when those be not found vnprouided which a man vndoubtedly assaulteth.

In this season the king hauing put an armie of men in a readinesse, caused the same to be transported ouer to Calis, & appointed the duke of Suffolke to haue the leading thereof, and to make a forraie into France. The duke (according to his commission) came to Calis the foure and twentieth of August, and there abiding the armie, caused all things to be prepared necessarie for the same, as vittells, munition, and such like. There were appointed to attend him in this iourneie, the lord Pontacut, and his brother sir Arthur Pole, the lord Herbert sonne to the earle of Worcester, the lord Ferrers, the lord Sparne, the lord Sandes, the lord Barkleie, the lord Polwes, and the baron Curson: of knights sir Richard Wingfield chancellour of the duchie of Lancaster, sir John Uxer, sir Edward Penill, sir William Kingston, sir Richard Weston, sir Andrew Winton, sir Robert Wingfield, sir Anthony Wingfield, sir Edward Gullford, sir Edward Greuile, sir Edward Chamberleine, sir Thomas Lucie, sir Guerard Digbie, sir Adrian Folseto, sir Richard Cornwell, sir William Courtneie, sir William Sidneie, sir Henrie Owen, and manie others.

The whole armie (as appeared by the musters taken thereof) consisted in six hundred demilances, two hundred archers on horsebacke, three thousand archers on foot, and five thousand bill men. To these also were adioined seuentene hundred, which were taken out of the garisons and crewes of Hammes, Guines, & Calis, so that in all they were ten thousand and five hundred, well armed and appointed for the warre. Beside them, there were also two thousand sir hundred labourers and pioners. When this armie was come ouer to Calis, and all things readie for the iourneie, they issued out of Calis and toke the fields. The vant-gard was led by the lord Sandes. Capteine of the right wing was sir William Kingston, & on the left sir Guerard Digbie. The marshall of Calis sir Edward Gullford was capteine of all the horsemen. The duke himselfe governed the battell, and sir Richard Wingfield was capteine of the reere-ward.

While the armie laie without Calis, they daile came into the towne. And so it happened that a simple fellow cut a purse, as he made to buie apples, which incontinent was taken, and brought to the maiors house to ward. Which thing diuerse Welshmen perceiuing, and not knowing what appertained to iustice, ran in great companies to the maiors house, & would haue broken the house. The officers of the towne intreated, but the Welshmen more & more approached. The number of the Welshmen was so great, that the watch of Calis strake alarm. Then the lord deputie and the lord Sandes did all that in them laie, to bring them to conformitie. But they were so rude, that they nothing them regarded: the priests brought forth the sacrament, which also was not regarded. Wherefore the lord Ferrers was straightlie commanded to appease their rage, for with him they came thither, which with great paine and intreatie them appeased. And then all the Welshmen were commanded to the field, and to depart the towne, and so were all other captains: and after wards diuerse of the head rioters were apprehended and sore punished for example.

The first enterprize that the duke attempted, was the winning of a castell called Bell castell, to which the lord Sandes, and the lord Ferrers being sent, did so much by the power of battrie, that after the walls were beaten, those that were appointed to giue the assault, prepared them therto. Which when the Frenchmen within perceiued, they yielded the place into the Englishmens hands, and themselves to the mercie of the duke, which receiued them as prisoners, and deliuered the castell to sir William Skeuington, the which he caused to be raised downe to the ground the seauen and twentieth of September. In this season was the duke of Warbon high constable of France revolted from service of the French king to the service of the emperor and the king of England. For after it was knowne that this duke had his mind alienated from the French king, sir John Russell (that was afterward created erle of Bedford) was sent into France vnto the said duke.

This gentleman being verie faire spoken, & well languaged, in disguised apparell, ordered himselfe so wiselie and fortunatlie in his forneie, that in covert manner he came to the duke, and so perswaded him, that he continued in his former determination, and adioined the realme of France, as in the French historye ye maie more at large perceiue. The more to encourage the English souldiers, there was a proclamation made in the host the eight and twentieth of September, how the said duke of Warbon was become enemie to the French king, and friend to the king of England; so that hauing in his wages ten thousand Almans, he was readie to invade France in another part, the more to let & disturb the French kings purposes. For the accomplishing therof there was sent to him monie in no small summes. After this proclamation the nine and twentieth of September, the duke of Suffolke remoued to Arto, and so forwarde into Picardie. At Corde betweene Tervine and saint Omers, there came to him the lord of Alstein, and with him of Spaniards, Almans, Cleueners, and others, three thousand footmen, and five hundred horsemen.

The duke being thus furnished with new aid, marched forwarde in wet weather, and made bridges, called Breckers, which had as good will to be still as broad, as the Welshmen had desire to returne home. For these Breckers by spoiling of townes, taking of prisoners, & other such practises of warlike exploits, made their haunts, and daillie brought to the campe, hollies, marcs, vittels, cloth, come, and other necessaries, which might not have bene missed.

After great raines and winds which had chanced in that season, there followed a soze frost, which was so extreame, that manie died for cold, and some lost fingers, some lost toes, and manie lost nailes be- fore their fingers, so extreame was the rigour of that frost. The thirtenth daie of November the duke re- moved to a place within two miles of Bogan ca- stell, and still it froze. The Welshmen in the morning set out a shout, and cried; Home, home. The Breckers hearing that, cried; Hang, hang. Hereof businesse was like to have ensued, but by policie it was ceas- ed. Sir Edward Guilford capitaine of the horsemen viewing the castell of Bogan, perceived that the marishes (wherewith it was inclosed) were so hard frozen, that great ordinance might passe over the same. Which he signified to the duke, & therewith the duke was contented that he should trie what successe would come of giving the attempt to win it. So was the ordinance brought over the marshy ground, where of they within being advertised, immediatlie after three shots of canon discharged against them, they yielded the castell, and all the artillerie within it, of the which there was good store, as three score & fiftene peeces great and small. The keeping of this castell was delivred to the seneſcall of Henegot.

In this meane while the lord Sands was come to the court, and informed the king of the state of the armie. The king had before his coming heard that his people in the said armie were in great miserie, both by reason of the intemperat weather, & unfor- tunable time of the yeare, the lacke of vittels, & such other discommodities: wherefore he caitled a new power of six thousand men to be prepared and sent unto the duke of Suffolke for a reliefe, under the lea- ding of the lord Pontifoe. But per this power could be put in order to passe the sea, and before the duke could have knowledge againe from the king of his further pleasure, he was constrained to breake up his armie, and returned by Valencennes, and so through flanders unto Calis. He left at Valencennes all the great artillerie. The king was somewhat displea- sed with the breaking up of the armie thus contrarie to his mind, but hearing the reasonable excuses which the duke & the capitaine had to alleage, he was shortly after pacified. And so after they had remained in Ca- lis a certeine time, untill their friends had asswaged the kings displeasure, they returned, and all things were well taken, and they received into as much fa- vour as before.

But now to returne to the doings in other parts, as betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, which chanced in this meane while that the duke of Suffolke was thus in France. We shall understand, that the Scots hearing that the warre was thus turned into France, thought that nothing should be attempted against them, and therefore waxed more bold, and began to rob and spoile on the marches of England. Wherefore the king sent againe thither the earle of Surrie treasurer, and high admerall of England, the which with all speed comming to the west borders, sent for an armie of six thousand men, with the which entering Scotland by the drie marishes, he over- threw certeine castels, piles, and small holds, till he came through the dales to Jedworth, wherein laie a great garrison of Scots, which skirmished with the English in right sharpe at their first comming, but yet at length the towne, abbeie, and castell were wone, spoiled, and burned.

After this the earle incamped within the Scottish ground from the two and twentieth of September till the five and twentieth of the same moneth, & then returned backe againe into England. During which time the lord Dacres was the castell of Fernberst. The French king perceiving that the Scots did not worke anie notable trouble to the Englishmen to staie them from the invading of France (& the cause was (as he took it) for that they lacked the duke of Albanye, whome they named their gouvernour) he therefore provided a navie of ships to have transpor- ted him over into Scotland; so that all things were redie for his journe. But the Englishmen were re- die on the sea under the conduct of sir William Fitz Williams to stop his passage if he had let forward; wherefore he caused his ships to be brought into West haven, and byted it abroad, that he would not go into Scotland that yeare.

The king of England being certified that the duke meant not to depart out of France of all that yeare, about the middes of September, commanded that his ships should be laid up in haven till the next spring. The duke of Albanye being thereof adverti- sed, boldie then took his ships, and sailed into Scot- land with all convenient speed, as in the Scottish hi- storie ye maie read more at large. Shortly after his arrivall there, he wrought so with the Scots, that an armie was leaved, with the which he approached to the borders of England, & lodged at Calvestre, readie to enter into England. The king of Eng- land having advertisement given to him from time to time of the proceedings of his adversaries, with all diligence caused to be assembled the people of the north parts beyond Trent, in such numbers that there were three thousand gentlemen bearing coats of armes with their powers and strength, which were all commanded to repaire to the erle of Surrie with speed. The noble marquesse Dorset was appointed with six thousand men to keepe Berwik, lest the Scots should late siege thereto.

The duke of Albanye hearing of the preparation which the earle of Surrie made against him, sent to him an herald, promising him of his honour to give him battell; and if he took him prisoner, he would put him to courteous ransom, & his bodie to be safe. To whome the earle answered, that much he thanked the duke of his offer, promising him to abide battell if he durst give it; & that if the said duke chanced to be taken by him or his, he would strike off his head, and send it for a present to his majestie the king of Eng- land, and bade him that he should trust to none other. At this answer the duke and the Scots took great despite. The earle of Surrie being at Alnewicke, there came to him the earles of Northumberland and Westmerland, the lords Clifford, Dacres, Lum- leie, Dgle, & Darcie, with manie knights, esquires, gentlemen, and other souldiers and men of warre, to the number of fortie thousand. And from the court there came the maister of the horse, sir Nicholas Ca- rew, sir Francis Brian, sir Edward Bainton, and others.

The last of October being saturday, in the night before the same daie, the duke of Albanye sent two or three thousand men over the water to besiege the castell of Marke, which comming thither with their great ordinance, beat the castell verie soze, and won the uttermost ward called the Barnekins. On sun- daie and mondaie being the first and second of No- vember, they continued their batterie, and then thin- king that the place was assailable, courageously set on the castell, and by strength entered the second ward. Sir William Lisle that was capitaine of this castell, perceiving the entimes to have wone the false bazels, and that nothing remained but onlie the inner ward or dungeon, incouraged his men to the best of his power, with words of great comfort and manhood, and therewith issued forth with those few that he had left about him (for he had lost manie at other assaults) and what with couragious shewing, and manfull fighting, the enemies were driven out of the place, and of them were slaine, and named lie of those Frenchmen which the duke had brought forth of France, to the number of three hundred; which laie there dead in fight when the earle of Surrie came thither, besides such as died of wounds, and were drowned.

When the Scots and Frenchmen removed their ordinance over the water in all hast, and by that time that they were got over, the earle of Surrie was come with five thousand horsemen, and all his great armie followed. He was forie that his enemies were gone, and much praised sir William Lisle for his valiance. The earle would gladlie have followed his enemies into their owne borders, but his commission was onlie to defend the realme, and not to invade Scotland; and therefore he said, not onlie unto the great displeasure of himselfe, but also of manie a lustie gentleman, that would gladlie have sene further proofe of the Scottish mens manhood. Shortly after, the queene of Scots, mother to the king, sent to hir brother the king of England, for an abstinence of warre, untill further communication might be had about the conclusion of some good agreement betwixt the two realmes of England and Scotland, which request to hir was granted; and so the English armie brake up, and the earle of Surrie returned to the court.

Edw. Hall in H. 8. fol. Cxvj. A present sent by the emperor to the king.

In this season the emperor Charles sent to the king of England two mules trapped in crimsin velvet curiouslie embroidered, all the buckles, stirrups and all such other garnishings were silver and gilt of marvellous cunning worke. He sent also eleven girdles full goodlie to behold trapped with rusted velvet richlie wrought, and foure speares, and two iavelins of strange timber & worke richlie garnished, and five brace of greihounds: and to the queene he sent two mules with rich trappers, and high chaires after the Spanish fashion. All these presents were thankfullie received both of the king and queene.]

In anticipation.

Whilest the earle of Surrie was in the marches of Scotland, and the duke of Suffolke in France (as before ye have heard) the cardinall sent out commissions in the moneth of October, that everie man being worth fortie pounds, should paie the whole subsidie before granted, out of hand, not tarrieng till the daies of payment limited. This was called an anticipation, that is to meane, a thing taken before the time appointed, and was a new term not knowne before those daies: but they paid sweetelie for their learning. In December were taken certeine traitors in Couentrie, one called Francis Philip, scholemaster to the kings henchmen, and one Christopher Pickering cleerke of the larder, and one Anthonie Painville gentleman, which by the perswasion of the said Francis Philip, intended to have taken the kings treasure of his subsidie, as the collectors of the same came towards London, and then to have raised men and taken the castell of Killingworth, and to have arrayed warre against the king. The said Francis, Christopher, and Anthonie, were hanged, drawne, and quartered at Tibothe the eleventh of Februarie, and the other were sent to Couentrie, and there executed.

The archduke of Austria made knight of the garter.

In this peare the king sent the lord Dorelle, sir William Huseie knight, & doctor Lee his almoner to don Ferdinando the archduke of Austria, with the order of the garter, which in the toke of Au-remberge received the same, where all the princes of Germanie were then assembled at a diet or council. In this meane while, diuerse enterprises and feats of warre were practised and atchured by them of the garrisons in the marches of Calis, and the Frenchmen of Bullogne, and the borders thereabouts: but the Frenchmen commonlie were put to the worse. Amongest other exploits, it chanced that one Wexeton a gentleman, and capteine of a number of the aduenturers, as he went about to spoile the towne of Wall, was taken by the French horsemen, and sold unto the pezants of the countrie, the which unmercifullie slue him and fiftene more that were taken with him; after that the men of warre had deliuered them, and were departed. But this murder was reuenged shortly by other of the aduenturers, which comming unto the same towne of Wall, took thirtie eight prisoners of the inhabitants, & slue of them thirtie & six, & burned the towne.

In this peare thorough books of cphemerides, and prognostications, foreshewing much hurt to come by waters & floods, many persons bittelled themselves and went to high grounds for feare of drowning. Speciallie one Bolton prior of saint Bartholomewes in Smithfield, builded him an house upon Harrow on the hill, onlie for feare of this flood, and thither he went and made provision of all things necessarie for the space of two moneths. This great raine and waters should haue fallen in Februarie, but no such thing hapened, whereby the follie of men was shewed. The astronomers for their errie did saie, that in their computation they had miscounted in their number an hundred yeares. A legat was sent from the pope to the king to moue him to peace: but the king declared to him the whole circumstance of his title, for the which he made wars against the Frenchmen, and thereof deliuered notes to the said legat, the which departed with the same backe to Rome in post. He had bene first with the French king, and with the emperor, but could not bring them to any god consocietie, as his desire was to haue done; so that his trauell was without frute in manner, as it appeared.

Manie enterprises, skirmishes, foires, and other feats of warre were attempted and put in vze betwixt the Englishmen of Calis, Guisnes, and other fortresses there in those marches, and the Frenchmen of Bullogne, and other of the garrisons in the frontiers of Picardie, and still sir William Fitz Williams as then capteine of Guisnes, sir Robert Jerningham capteine of Pelwam bridge, sir John Mallop, and sir John Cage were those that did to the Frenchmen most damage. Also monsieur de Bees being capteine of Bullogne, did for his part what he could to defend the frontiers there, and to annoy his enemies. Yet one daie in Maie, sir William Fitz Williams, and sir Robert Jerningham, with seven hundred men (accounting in that number the Breckers) went to Bullogne, and there skirmished with the Frenchmen, whilest Christopher Co a capteine of foure English ships took land, and fought with them of bafe Bullogne on the one side, as the Breckers assailed them on an other.

There was a sharpe bickering, and in the end the Frenchmen were driven backe, and diuerse of them slaine & taken, speciallie by the Breckers, that won the barriers of them, & so when the tide was turned, Christopher Co with his men withdrew to his ships, & the Breckers returned to sir William Fitz Williams, who staid for them, and then gathering his men together by sound of a trumpet, sent forth such as might fetch the drifts of beasts and cattell in the countrie neere adjoining, & with the same returned backe in safetie. accompanied with diuerse French lordes and men of war, to the number of eight hundred footmen, and as manie horsemen, came verie earlie in a morning to a village called Bommings, within the English pale, and leauing there three hundred horsemen in ambush, rood to Ballewell, and there appointed to tarrie with other three hundred men, and the residue of the horsemen and footmen with banner displayed went forth and forraied all the countrie.

Sir Robert Feringham also with foure score horsemen issued forth of Calis, to vnderstand the demeanour of the Frenchmen : but being not able to resist the great number of the Frenchmen, he was chased, and saued himselfe by flight. But this displeasure was shortly after reuenged by the said Robert, the which comming to Sparguison the twelue of August with three hundred footmen, and three score horsemen, he skirmished with the Frenchmen that stood at defence, chased them into the church, and fired them out of the same, so that the Frenchmen leapt out of the church to their destruction, for of three hundred there were saued but three score alive. On the one and twentieth of Maie being Trinitie sondaie, five hundred Scottishmen in the morning verie earlie, entred by severall wayes into England, and laie covertlie by the high wales, in purpose to haue surprised such market men as came to the faire that day kept at Berwtike. They toke diuerse, but finally being espied, the alarme rose, and they were fought with right sharple, who defended themselves with such manhood in drabwing backe to their aduantage, that if the young lord of Fulberie had not come to the succours of the Englishmen, the Scots had gone a waile with their bootie. Notwithstanding in the end they were glad to seeke refuge by flight, losing 200 of their number, which were taken in the chase.

On the first of Iulie next ensuing, sir John a Fentwike, Leonard Pusgrau, and bassard Heron, with diuerse other English captains, hauing with them nine hundred men of war, entred the Pers, mind- ing to fetch out of the same some bootie, and encount- ring with the Scots being in number two thousand, after soe and long fight, caused them to leaue their ground and to flie, so that in the chase were taken two hundred Scots, and manie slaine, & amongst them were diuerse gentlemen. But sir Rafe a Fentwike, Leonard Pusgrau, and the bassard Heron, with thirtie other Englishmen well horsed, followed so farre in the chase, that they were past rescue of their companie, whereof the Scots being aduised, sudden- ly returned, and set on the Englishmen, which oppres- sed with the multitude of their enemies, were some overcome, and there was taken sir Rafe a Fentwike, Leonard Pusgrau, and sir other : and bassard He- ron, with seauen other were slaine. The residue by chance escaped. The other Englishmen with their 200 prisoners returned safelie into England.

On the seuenth of Iulie, the Englishmen fought with like fortune against the Scots that were ente- red England at the west marches. For in the begin- ning they put the Scots to the worke, and toke three hundred of them prisoners: but afterwards, because the Englishmen that had taken those prisoners, withdrew out of the field with the same prisoners, the Scots perceiuing the number of the English- men to be diminished, gaue a new onset on the Eng- lishmen, and them distressed. After this, the Scots sued for a truce, and had it granted to indure till the feast of saint Andrew. This yeare the first of Sep- tember was doctor Thomas Haniball maister of the rolles receiued into London with earles, and bi- shops, and diuerse other nobles and gentlemen, as ambassadors from pope Clement, which brought with him a robe of gold for a token to the king. And on the daie of the natiuitie of our ladie, after a so- lemne masse song by the cardinal of Poike, the said present was deliuered to the king : which was a tree forged of fine gold, & wrought with branches, leaues, and floures resembling roses. This tree was set in a pot of gold which had three feet of antike fashion. The pot was of measure halfe a pint, in the vpper most rose was a faire saphire loupes perked, the bignesse of an acorne, the tree was of heighth halfe an English yard, and a foot in breadth.

This yeare in Iulie the lord Archembald Dou- glas earle of Angus, which had married the queene of Scots sister to the king of England, escaped out of France (where he had remained for a season, in man- ner as a banished man) and came into England to the king, as then being at Grenewich, and was of him courteously receiued. Sir Anthonie Fitz Ber- bert one of the Iustices of the common ples, sir Rafe Egerton knight, and doctor Denton deane of Litchfield, being sent in the beginning of this yeare in- to Ireland as commissioners, behaued themselves so sagelie, that they reformed diuers wrongs, brought sundrie of the wild Irish by faire means vnto obedi- ence, and made (by the kings authoritie) the earle of Kildare deputie of the land; before whome the great Ordele bare the sword. And the lord Piers Butler earle of Ormond, which before was deputie, was now made high treasurer of Ireland. In Septem- ber the said commissioners returned.

During all this season, there were daile attempts made and practised by the Englishmen in the lowe countries, namelie the English horsemen; & the ad- uenturers rested not, but daile made inuasions vpon the French confines. But the aduenturers about the beginning of winter made an enterprize to fetch some bootie from a village lieng towards Spurrell. They were not fullie two hundred men, and of those there were five and twentie horsemen. The French- men by chance the same time were abroad vnder the conduct of the earle of Dammartine, which was going to S. Omers with fiftene hundred horse- men, and eight hundred footmen, and perceiuing where the aduenturers were comming, made to- wards them, and after long & cruell fight overcame them, and slue most part of them, for that in defend- ing themselves most stoutlie, they had slaine and wounded a great number of the Frenchmen per- they could be overcome, keeping themselves close to- gether, and might not be broken so long as they had anie arrowes to shot. This was the end of the ad- uenturers otherwile called Irakers, being as har- die men as euer serued prince.

In December there came to London diuerse ambassadoers out of Scotland, about a peace to be had, and a marriage concluded betwene the king of Scots, and the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England, as in the Scottish historie yee shall find more at large expressed. Before the feast of Christ- masse, the lord Leonard Grate, and the lord John Grate, brethren to the marquesse Dorset, sir George Cobham, sonne to the lord Cobham, William Ca- rie, sir John Dableie, Thomas Wiat, Francis Pointz, Francis Sidneie, sir Anthonie Browne, sir Edward Seimor, Oliuer Spanners, Perciuall Hart, Sebastian Pudigate, and Thomas Calen, esquires of the kings household, enterprised a cha- llenge of feats of armes against the feast of Christ- mas, which was proclaimed by Winsloe the herald, and performed at the time appointed after the best maner, both at tilt, tourneie, barriers, and assault of a cassell erected for that purpose in the tiltyard at Grenewich, where the king held a rotall Christmasse that yeare, with great mirth and princelie pastime.

servants, but they in no wise would thereto condes-cend, wherefore nineteen of the same religion were accursed at Pauls crosse, by one of their owne religion, called frer Fozrest. John Fokin Steward of household to the French kings mother, this yere whilest the French king was in Italie, came into England, & was received in secret maner into the house of one doctor Larke, a prebendarie of S. Stephens, and oftentimes talked with the cardinal about the affaires betwixt the kings of England and France, motioning waies for a peace to be concluded. When this was knowne abroad, as at the length it was, monseigneur de Bzate the emperours ambassado; mis-liked such covert doings, and soze grudged thereat.
The foure and twentieth of Januarie, the president of Rome called monseigneur Bzinton, came to London as ambassado; from the French king, and was lodged with the said John Fokin.

Ambassadors
from the em-perour and their request.

On sundae the first of March were received into London monseigneur de Bzate lord of Campher, ad-mirall of Flanders, and maister John de la Cose, as ambassadors from the ladie Margaret in the name of the emperour. These ambassadors required three things in their suit. First they demanded the ladie Marie the kings onelie daughter to be deliuered out of hand, and she to be named emperesse, and to take possession of all the lowe countries, and to be gover-nour of the same. Also that all such sums of monie as the king should giue with hir in mariage for a dower to be made to hir, should be paid instantlie.
Thirdlie, that the king of England himselfe should passe the sea, and make warre in France the next summer. The two first demands were not agreed to for certeine causes, and as to this last, the king said he would take aduilement.

News of the siege of Pavia & the taking of the French
king prisoner.

On thursdae the ninth of March, at seauen of the clocke in the morning, there came a gentleman in posse from the ladie Margaret gouernesse of Flanders, which brought letters containing how that the seure and twentieth of Februarie, the siege of Pavia (where the French king had lien long) was raised by force of battell, and the French king himselfe taken prisoner. The same day the president of Rome, & John Fokin were going to the court (for they had not yet spoken with the king) and in Wolborne in their waie heard these things, whereupon they returned to their lodging right sorrowfull, and within short space after returned to the regent of France. It was thought the king would have agreed with the French king, if his chance had not hapned, for all the people of England grudged against Flanders, for the euill demean-our of the Flemings in time of the warre. Also the king was displeased with them for inhancing his come there, which caused much monie to be conueied out of this realme baillie ouer into that countrie.
Vnconfort and great triumph was made in London for the taking of the French king, on saturday the eleuenth of March; and on the morow after being sunday the twelfth of March, the king came to Pauls, and there heard a solemne masse, and after the same was ended, the quere sang Te Deum, and the minstrels plaid on euerie side.

& sic deinceps.
The battell of Pavia, wherein the French king is taken prisoner.

Here it is conuenient to adde the battell of Pa-uia, wherein the French king was taken prisoner, most notably discoursed by Guicciardine, in the fifteenth booke of his historie: the principall matter whereof, to make the report of Pavia and the French king moze perspicuous, it were good to inferre. On the night (saith mine author) before the five and twentith of Februarie, a daie dedicated by the christians to the apostle saint Mattheu, and also the daie of the natiuitie of the emperour, the imperialles determined to march to Spirabell, where late incamped cer-teine companies of horsemen and footmen. In this march they stood upon this intention, that if the French men moued, then they had set at libertie the siege of Pavia: and if they moued not, then to aduenture the fortune of the battell. Therefore the better to aduance this determination, all the beginning of the night they gaue manie alarmes, the more to keepe trauelled and wearie the French men, making semblance as though they would charge them on that side towards Pado, Vselin, and saint Lazarus.

About midnight enerie souldior, by the commandement of the capteins, put on a white cassakin ouer his armor, to be knowne from the Frenchmen. They were cast into two squadrons of horsemen, a foure of footmen. In the first were six thousand footmen equallie compounded of lanceknights, Spaniards, and Italians: this squadron was led by the mar-quesse of Guast: the second stood onelie upon cer-teine bands of Spanisch footmen under the charge of the marquesse of Palsquairo: the third and fourth squadron were of lanceknights, commanded by the viceroy and the duke of Bourbon. They arrived at the parke walles certeine houres before daie, and by the working of their masons, and readie willes of their souldiers, they cast downe to the earth three score fadome of wall: by which breach, being entred within the parke, the first squadron drew towards Spirabell, and the residue of the armie toke the waie to the campe.

As soone as the king understood that they were entred into the parke, thinking they would draw to Spirabell, he issued out of his lodging to fight in plaine and open field, desiring to draw the battell rather to that place than to any other, for the aduantages which it gaue to the horsemen: he commanded to turne the artilleries toward the enemies, which beating them in flanke, brought great damage to the reregard. But in the meane while, the battell of the imperialles gave a furious charge vpon the kings squadron, which ordinarily was the battell: but as the Spaniards went, it was the reregard. The king fought valiantlie, & abode with great courage the violence of his enemies, who with the furie of their harquebuziers forced his men to giue ground, till the rescue of the Switzers came, when the Spaniards were repelled, as well by them as by the horsemen that charged them in flanke.
But the viceroy being called in by the marquesse of Palsquairo, who brought to the fight his lanceknights, they were easilie broken, not without great slaughter of the Switzers, who that daie did nothing against the opinion of balo; which sometimes they had waied to honorablie to expresse in battelles.

The king kept alwaies the middle of the battell, being insurrounded with a great gard of men at armes.
And albeit he did what he could to containe and con-firme his people: yet after he had fought long with his owne hands, his horse being slaine under him, him selfe lightlie hurt in the face and in the hand, he was stricken downe to the earth, and taken prisoner by five souldiers that knew not what he was. In which misfortune the viceroy pressing into the throng his maiestie disclosed him selfe to him, who with great reuerence kissed his hand, and received him prisoner in the emperours name. At the same time the marquesse of Guast with the first squadron had defeated the horsemen that were at Spirabell.
And Antonie de Leua, who (as was said) had to that end cast downe to the earth so great a quantitie and space of wall, as an hundred and fiftie horsemen might fallie forth in front, issued out of Pavia, & he charged the French behind, that he put them to flight.
And in that feare they were almost all stricken

It is holden for certeine, that in this battell were ſaine more than eight thouſand men of the French campe, part by ſword, and part of bodies drowned in the river of Aheſſin, ſeeking their ſafetie by ſwimming.

Of this generall number were about twen-tie of the moſt noble and apparant lords of France, as the admerall, the lord James Chebanes, the lord Palilla, and Trimonille, the maſter of the hoſtie, monsieur de Aubignie, monsieur de Boiſſie, and monsieur de la Coud, who being taken graeuouſlie wounded by his enimies, gaue to them his life in ſted of a ranſome. The priſoners that were taken were the king of Navarre, the baſtard of Sauoie, the lord Pontmerancie, Saint Paule, Biſon, A-mall, monsieur de Chandon, monsieur de Amber-court, Galeas Viſconte, Frederike Boſſolo, Barnabie Viſconte, Cuidanes, with manie gentlemen, and almoſt all the capteins that eſcaped the ſlaugh-ter of the ſword. There was alſo taken priſoner Jerome Leandzo biſhop of Brundisio the popes nun-tio, but by commandement of the viceroy, he was eſſones ſet at libertie: as alſo monsieur Saint Paule and Frederike Boſſolo committed to the caſtell of Paula, brake priſon a little after, by the corruption of the Spaniards that had them in charge.

Of the imperialles ſide the vniuerſall ſlaughter exceeded not ſeauen hundred bodies; and not one capteine of name except Ferrand Caſtriot marqueſſe of Anco, the marqueſſe of Diſquatio was wounded in two places, & Anthonie de Leua light-lie hurt in the leg. The preie and ſpoile of this battell was ſo great, as there had not bene ſene in Italie more rich ſouldiours.

Of ſo great an armie there was preſerned but the reregard of foure hundred lances, commanded by monsieur de Alanſon, they neuer came to the fight, neuer ſuffered charge, nor neuer were followed, but leauing behind them their baggage, they retired whole to Piemont, their feare making them more haſtie to ſlie, than carefull of their honor. And as one calamitie followeth another, ſo the loſſe of the battell was no ſoner reappozed at Millaine, than Theodor Triunſce, who laie there in gariſon with foure hundred lances, departed and toke his waie to Bulſoquo, all the ſouldiours following him by troops: inſomuch as the ſame daie that the king loſt the battell, all the dutchie of Millaine was made free from the iuriſdiction of the French. The daie after the victorie, the king was led priſoner to the rocke of Biquetion, for that the duke of Millaine, in regard of his proper ſuretie, conſented hardlie that the per-ſon of the king ſhould be kept within the caſtell of Millaine: he was garded with great gelouſie and watch; but in all other things (except his libertie) he was uſed and honozed as appertained to the ſtate and maiestie of a king.

Now ſaith mine author, ſpeaking to the readers of his hiſtorie) you haue ſene ſet downe the ouer-throw of the French armie in the battell of Paula: a wretched ſuccelle, where was ſo great expectation of victorie. You haue ſene a mightie king deliue-red by priſoner into the hands of him, with whom he contended for glorie and emperie: a ſpectacle moſt tragical amongſt all the calamities that fortune bringeth vpon mans mortalitie. You haue ſene the moſt part of the nobilitie, and honozable capteins of France, ſaine in the ſernice and preſence of their king: a matter that made more lamentable his owne condition and aduerſitie. You haue ſene the reſidue of that armie, ſo vniuerſallie perplered with ſcare and confuſion, that the ſame thing that ſhould haue retained them in ſo great affliction, made them the leſſe aſſured, and further off from confidence.

When word came to the emperour of all the ſoy-mer accidents, the eies of euerie man were ſet to behold with what propriete of affection he would receiue his gladſome newes, and to what ends his thoughts were diſpoſed: who ſo farre as exterior demonſtrations made ſhew, expreſſed great tokens of a mind much moderated, and verie apt to reſiſt eaſilie the proſperitie of fortune: yea the ſignes and inclinations appearing ſo much the more incredible, by how much he was a prince mightie & yong, and as yet had neuer taſted but of felicitie. For after he was informed truelie of ſo great a victorie, whereof he had the reappozt the tenth of March, together with letters of the French kings owne hand, witten rather in the ſpirit and condition of a priſoner, than with the courage of a king, he went forthwith to the church to make his holie oblations to God with manie ſolemnities. And the morning folowing he recei-ued with ſignes of right great deuotion the ſacrament of the eucharist, and ſo went in proceſſion to our ladies church out of Paduill, where was his court at that time.

His temperance and moderation was aboute the expectation of his eſtate, and farre contrarie to the courſe of the time in matters of that nature: for he would not ſuffer anie bels to be rung, nor boun-daires to be made, nor anie other manner of publicke demonſtrations, ſuch as are uſed for glorie or gladneſſe, alledging with a mind more vertuous than inſolent, that ſuch propriete of feaſting and reioicing was due to victories obtained againſt infidels, but ought to haue no ſhew where one chriſtian ouercame another. Neither were the actions and geſtures of his perſon and ſpeeches differing from ſo great a temperance and continencie of mind, which he well expreſſed in the anſwers he made to the congratulations of the ambalaſſadours and great men that were about him: to whome he ſaid he was not glad of the accident according to the glorious operation of fleſh and blond, but his reioicing was in that God had ſo manfeſtie aided him: which he interpreted to be an aſſured ſigne that he ſtood in his grace and ſanour, though not through his owne merit, yet by his celeſtial election. The French king being in the cuſtodie of the viceroy of Naples (who much comforted him, and praieſed his valiantneſſe, and praieſed him to be content, for he ſhould haue a gentle end) deſired to write to his mother, which was to him granted. His verie words were theſe.

The manifold passions of perplexities of the people in general.

In this estate of aduersitie the people set before their eyes all that feare and despaire could imagine: they doubted least so great a calamitie were not the beginning of a further ruine & subuersion: they saw their king prisoner, and with him either taken or slaine in the battell the chieftains of the kingdome, which in the imagination of their sorowes they held a losse irreparable: they beheld their captiues discomfited, and their souldiers discouraged: a calamitie which stopped in them all hope to be readressed or reassured: they saw the realme made naked of mo-nie and treasure, and inuironed with most mightie enimies: an affliction which most of all caried their thoughts into the last cogitation of desperat ruine: for the king of England, notwithstanding that he had holden manie pactes and treaties, and shewed in manie things a variation of mind, yet not manie daies before the battell, he had cut off all the negociations which he had interteined with the king, and had published that he would descend into France, if the things of Italie took anie good successe.

So that the Frenchmen feared least in so great an oportunitie, the emperor and he would not leaue warre against France, either for that there was no other head or gouernour than a woman, and the little children of the king, of whom the eldest had not yet run eight yeares accomplished: or else because the enimies had with them the duke of Burbon, for his otone particular a puissant prince, and for his authoritie in the realme of France verie popular and strong in opinion, a mightie instrument to stirre vp most dangerous emotions. Besides, the ladie regent, as well for the loue she bare to the king, as for the dangers of the realme was not without hir passions both proper and particular: for being full of ambition, and most greedy of the gouernment, she feared that if the kings deliuerie drew any long tract of time, or if anie new difficultie hapned in France, she should be constrained to yield by the administration of the crowne to such as should be delegate and assigned by the voices of the kingdome. Fewer the-lesse amid so manie astonishments and confusions, she drew hir spirits to hir, and by hir example were recomforted the nobles that were of counsell with hir, who took speedie order to man the frontiers of the realme, and with diligence to leaue a good provision of monie.

The ladie regent, in whose name all expeditions and dispatches went out, wrote to the emperor letters full of humilitie and compassion, wherein she for-gat not by degrees vehement and inducing to solicit a negotiation of accord: by vertue whereof, hauing a little after deliuered don Hugo de Poncodo, she sent him to the emperor, to offer him that hir sonne should renounce and disclaime from all rights of the kingdome of Naples, and the estate of Millan, with contentment to refer to the censure and arbitration of the law, the titles and rights of Burgundie, which if it appertained to the emperor, he should acknowledge it for the dowrie of his sister: that he should render to monsieur Burbon his estate together with his mouables which were of great valour, and also the suits and revenues which had bene le-nued by the commissioners sent out of the regall chamber: that he should giue to his sister in ma-riage, and deliuer vp to him Pouence, if iudgement of the interest and right were made of his side.

And for the more facilitie and speedie passage of this negotiation, rather than for anie desire he had to nourish hir inclination to the warre, she dispatched immediatlie ambassadours into Italie, to recommend to the pope and the Venetians the safetie of hir sonne. To whom she offered, that if for their proper securitie, they would contract with hir, and raile armes against the emperor, she would for the particular aduance five hundred lances, together with a great contribution of monie. But amid these trauels and astonishments, the principall desire as well of hir, as of the whole realme of France, was, to appease and assure the mind of the king of England, inducing trulie that if they could reduce him to amitie and reconcilement, the crowne of France should re-maine without quarrell or molestation. Where, if he on the one side, and the emperor on the other, should rise in one ioint force, hauing concurrent with them the person of the duke of Burbon, and manie other oportunities and occasions, it could not be but all things would be full of difficulties and dangers.

At this the ladie regent began to discern manie tokens and apparances of god hope: for notwithstanding the king of England immediatlie after the first reappoirts of the victorie, had not onelie expresse great tokens of gladnesse and reioysing, but also published that he would in person passe into France: and withall had sent ambassadours to the emperor to solicit and treat of the mowing of warre iointlie together: yet proceeding in deed with more mildnesse than was expected of so furious thewes and tokens, he dispatched a messenger to the ladie regent, to send to him an expresse ambassadour: which accordingly was accomplished, and that with fulnesse of authori-tie and commission, such as brought with it also all sorts of submitions & implozations which she thought apt to reduce to appeasement the mind of that king so highlie displeased. He reposed himselfe altogether upon the will and counsell of the cardinall of Poix, who seemed to restraine the king and his thoughts to this principall end, that bearing such a hand upon the controuersies and quarrels that ran betwene other princes, all the world might acknowledge to depend upon him and his authoritie the resolution and expectation of all affaires.

And for this cause he offered to the emperor at the same time to descend into France with a puissant armie, both to giue perfection vnto the aliance concluded betwene them before; and also to remove all scruple and gelousie, he offered presentlie to consigne vnto him his daughter, who was not as yet in an age and disposition able for marriage. But in these matters were very great difficulties, partlie depending upon himselfe, and partlie deriving from the emperor, who now shewed nothing of that readi-nesse to contract with him which he had used before: for the king of England demanded almost all the rewards of the victorie, as Normandie, Guien, and Gascoigne, with the title of king of France. And that the emperor, notwithstanding the inequality of the conditions should passe likewise into France, and communicate equalitie in the expences and dangers. The inequality of these demands troubled not a little the emperor, to whom they were by so much the more grievous, by how much he remembered that in the yeares next before, he had alwaies deferred to make warre euen in the greatest dangers of the French king. So that he persuaded himselfe that he should not be able to make anie foundation upon that confederation.

And standing in a state no lesse impouerished for monie and treasure, than made wearie with labours and perils, he hoped to draw more commodities from the French king by the meane of peace, than by the violence of armes and warres, speciallie tolnering with the king of England. Besides, he made not that accompt which he was wont to doe of the marriage of his daughter, both for hir minoretie in age, and also for the dowrie for the which he should stand accountable for: so much as the emperor had received by waite of loane of the king of England: he seemed by many tokens in nature to nourish a wonderfull desire to have children, and by the necessity of his condition he was carried with great contentment of monie: upon which two reasons he took a great desire to marie the sister of the house of Portugall, which was both in an age able for marriage, and with whom he hoped to receive a plentiful portion in gold and treasure, besides the liberalities of his owne people offered by waite of beneuolence in case the marriage went forward: such was their desire to haue a queene of the same nation and language, and of hope to procure children.

For these causes the negociation became euery daie more hard and desperat betwene both those princes, wherein was also concurrent the ordinarie inclination of the cardinall of Portie towards the French king, together with the open complaints he made of the emperor, as well for the interests and respects of his king, as for the small reputation the emperor began to hold of him. He considered that afoze the battell of Pavia, the emperor neuer sent letters unto him which were not written with his owne hand, and subscribed, your sonne and cosine Charles: but after the battell, he used the seruice of secretaries in all the letters he wrote to him, insiring nothing of his owne hand but the subscription, not with titles of so great reuerence and submission, but onelie with this bare word Charles. In this alteration of affection in the emperor, the king of England took occasion to receiue with gracious words and demonstrations, the ambassadour sent by the ladie regent, to whome he gaue comfort to hope well in things to come. And a little afterward, estranging his mind wholie from the affaires which were in negociation betwene him and the emperor, he made a confederation with the ladie regent, contracting in the name of hir sonne, wherein he would haue inserted this expresse condition, that for the kings ransom and deliuerie, should not be deliuered to the emperor any thing that at that time should be vnder the power or possession of the crowne of France.

Shortlie after, the viceroy & the other capitaine imperiall were induced vpon urgent reasons to transport the person of the French king into a surer hold, than where presentlie he was kept, iudging that for the ill disposition of others, they could not without perill kepe him garded in the duchie of Milan: in which feare ioined to their continuall desire so to do, they resolved to conueie him to Genes, and from thence by sea to Naples, where his lodging was prepared within the new castell. This determination brought no little græfe to the king, who from the beginning of his captinitie, had vehementlie desired to be carried into Spaine: perhaps he had opinion (measuring happie an other man by his owne nature, or else running with the common error of mortall men being easlie beguiled in things they desire) that if once he were brought to the presence of the emperor, he doubted not of some easie passage for his libertie, either through the emperours benignitie, or by the conditions he meant to offer. The viceroy was of the same desire for the augmentation of his owne glorie.

But being retained for feare of the French armie by sea, they dispatched by common consent monsieur Montmerancie to the ladie regent: who granted to him six light gallies of those that late in the port of Barcelles vpon promise to haue them restored as soon as the king was arrived in Spaine. With these gallies, he returned to Portofino, where the kings person was alreadie arrived, and ioining them to six tene gallies of the emperor, which was the nauie appointed at first to conduct him to Naples, he reduced them all into one fleet, and armed them all with soldiers of the Spanishe. The captaine imperiall and the duke of Bourbon were perswaded, that the kings person should be led to Naples: but of the contrarie, setting by saile the seuenth of June, they took such course, that the eight daie they arrived with a happie voyage at Rosas a haven of Catalogna: there coming brought no small ioy to the emperor, who till that daie had vnderstood nothing at all of that resolution.

Now as soon as he was made assured of the kings being there, he dispatched commandments unto all places where he should passe, to receiue him with great honours: onelie till it should be otherwise determined, he gave order to kepe him in the castell of Sciatina nere to Valence, a castell ancientlie used by the kings of Aragon for the garding of great prisoners, and wherein had bene kept prisoner for many yeares the duke of Calabria. But the deliberation to kepe him in that place, seeming farre too rigorous to the viceroy, and nothing agreable to the promises he had made to the king in Italie, he wone so much of the emperor, that till he had taken another counsell, the kings person might remaine nere Valence in a place apt for hunting and other delights of the field. Where he left him lodged with sufficient gard, vnder the charge of capitaine Alarcon, in whose custodie he had alwaies remained since his vnfortunate daie.

From thence the viceroy, together with Montmerancie, went to the emperor to make reappoynt of the state of Italie, and the discourse of things which till that daie had bene debated with the king, with whome he perswaded the emperor with many reasons to draw to accord, for that he could not haue a faithfull amitie and coniunction with the Italians. The emperor after he had heard the viceroy and Montmerancie, determined to conueie the king into Castille to the castell of Madrid, a place farre removed from the sea and the confines of France, where being honozed with ceremonies & reuerences agreable to so great a prince, he should neuertheless be kept vnder carefull and strait gard, with libertie to take the aire abroad certeine times of the daie, mounted onelie vpon a mule. The emperor could neuer be brought to admit the king to his presence, if first the accord were not either established, or at least in an assured hope of resolution.

And to the end there might be interposed in the negociation a personage honorable, & almost equall with the king, Montmerancie was sent in great diligence into France, to bring the duchesse of Alanson the kings sister and a widow, with fullnesse of authority to debate and contract. And to the end this negociation of accord were not hindered by new difficulties, there was made a little afterwards a truce vntill the end of December, betwene the emperor and such as administrated the gouernment of France. Afterward the emperor gaue order that one part of those gallies which were come with the viceroy, should returne into Italie to bring the duke of Bourbon into Spaine, without whose presence and priuatie he gaue out that he would make no conuention: and yet the gallies that for want of monie, and other impediments, were prepared but with slow diligence.

Whiles the case of the French king was in demand, but not yet determined, by means of sundrie ouerthwarts that ouerthrew the foundation of euerie purpose tending to his deliuerance: it fortuned that the French king falling sicke in the castell of Madrid, and having in vaine desired the presence of the emperor, was caried by his discontentment and melancholie into such extremitie and danger of his life, that the physicians appointed for his cure, told the emperor that they stood desperat of his recovery, if himselfe in person came not to comfort him with some hope of his deliuerie. The emperor obteyning more compassion than the reason of things, was not curious to condescend to perforce so good an office, and as he prepared to visit him accordingly, his high chancelor seeking to turne him from the issue, told him with manie strong reasons, that he could not go to him in honour, but with intention to deliuer him presentlie and without anie covenant: otherwise as it would be a humanitie not roiall but mercenarie, so it would disclose a desire to recouer him, not moued of charitie, but pushed on by his proper interest, as not to lose by his death the occasion of the profit hoped for by the victorie.

The emperor
visith the
in durance.

This counsell assuredlie was graue and honourable touching the man that gaue it, and no lesse worthy to be followed by so great a prince as the emperor: and yet being more caried by the reasons of others, he took post to go to him. But for the danger of the king being almost at the extremitie, the visitation was short, and yet for the time accompanied with gracious words full of hope that he would deliuer him immediatlie vpon his returning to health: in so much that whether it was by the comfort that he breathed into him (in the sicknesse of captiuitie the promise of libertie excuseth all medicines) or by the benefit of his youth, which with the fauour of nature was stronger than the maladie, he began after this visitation to resume so good disposition, that within few daies he was out of danger, notwithstanding he could not recouer his former health but with verie slowe time.

And now neither the difficulties that were shewed on the emperours side, nor the hopes which were given by the Italians, nor anie other nature of impediments whatsoever, could staie the volage of the ladie Alanson into Spaine. For that as nothing was more hard or heauie to the Frenchmen than to leane off the practises and negotiations of accord being with those that had power to restore their king: so nothing was more easie to the emperor, than feeding the French with hopes, to draw their minds from taking armes; and by that meane so to keepe the Italians in suspence, as not to dare to enter into new deliberations. And in that cunning maner, sometimes using delaties, and sometimes pressing forward the affaires, he thought to keepe the minds of all men confused and intangled. The ladie Alanson was receiued by the emperor with verie gracious demonstrations and hopes: but the effects fell out both hard and heauie. For when she ministred speech to him for the marriage of his sister the widowe with the king: he made answer; that it was a matter which could not be done without the consent of the duke of Bourbon.

The ladie Alanson treateth with the emperor for the kings deliuerie.

The other particularities were debated by deputies of both parts, wherein, as the emperor insisted obstinatlie to haue the dutchie of Burgognie restored as appertaining to him: so the French refused to consent, unless he would accept it for dowrie; or else to referre it to the sentence of the law and iustice to decide the true title. And albeit they could easilie haue condescended to the residue, yet for that they were so farre off for the demand of Burgognie, the ladie Alanson returned at last into France, without winning anie other grace, than a fauour to see the king his brother; who growing more and more into distrust of his deliuerie, desired him at his departing to admonish his mother, and all the counsell from him, to looke carefulie to the profit of the crowne of

The French king is careful of the France, without having anie consideration of him, as if he liued not. But notwithstanding the departure of the ladie Alanson, the solicitations for the kings deliuerie did not cease, for that there remained behind the president of Paris, and the bishops of Ambrun and Carbe, who had till then followed the negotiation but with verie little hope, with the emperor would not harken to anie condition, if first Burgognie were not restored, which the king would not be brought to restore; but in a last necessitie.

After this unfortunate accident of the French king ensued manie troublesome and intricate matters, among which the case of the French king was descanted vpon, and a solicitation of peace resolved, which contained these covenants following. That betwene the emperor and the French king should be a peace perpetuall, in which should be comprehended all such as should be named by their common consent. That the French king by the first daie of the next moneth of March, should be set at libertie vpon the marches in the coast of Fontarabie. That within six weeks after he should consigne to the emperor the dutchie of Burgognie, the countie of Charrolois, the iurisdiction of Polers, the castell Chainro, dependancies of the said dutchie, the countie of Fflouona, the reloyt of St. Laurence de la Roche, a dependant of Franch countie, together with all the appurtenances as well of the said dutchie as vicountie, all which for hereafter should be separate and exempted from the soueraintie of the realme of France. That at the same and verie instant that the king should be deliuered, there should be put into the emperours hands the Dolphin of France, and with him either the duke of Breance the kings second sonne, or else twelue principall lords of France, whom the emperor did name.

It was left to the election of the ladie regent, either to deliuer the kings second sonne, or the twelue barons, and they to remaine as hostages until restitution were made of the lands and places aforesaid, and the peace swoyne and ratified, together with all the articles by the estates generall of France, and inregistered in all the courts of parlement of the kingdome with forme and solemnities necessarie. For the accomplishing wherof, there was set downe a terme of foure moneths: at which time returning the hostages, there should be put into the emperours hands the duke de Angouleme the kings third son, to the end to traine him by with the emperor, the better to intertaine and assure the peace. That the French king should renounce and giue by to the emperor all his rights to the realme of Naples, together with all such titles and preeminences as were to come to him by the intersture of the church. That he should do the like touching his interest in the state of Millaine, of Venes, of Als, and likewise of Arras, Tourneie, of the Isle, and of Motuete. That he should render by the towne and castell of Hedin as a member of the countie of Artois, with all the munitions, artilleries, and moueables that were in it when it was last taken. That he should disclaime and yeld by all soueraintie in Flanders and Artois, and all other places or peeces which the emperor possessed.

That on the other side, the emperor should resigne and giue by to him all the right, title, and quarrell which he pretended to anie place possessed by the Frenchmen, and especiallie the townes and castells of Perone, Montdidier, Roie, the counties of Bullongne, Guines, & Donchiero, with other townes standing vpon the one and other shore of the river of Some. That there should be betwene them a league and confederation perpetuall for the defense of their estates, with obligation to aid one another when the deliuerie

king.

After much a do and manie remonings, the French king was come on the confines of Fontarabie, a towne appertaining to the emperor, standing vpon the Ocean sea, and is a frontier betwene Biskaye and the duchie of Gules. And on the other side, the ladie regent was arrived with the children of France, at Baion, not manie leagues from Fontarabie. The torments of the golfe toke hit by the waie, which was the cause that he had lingred some time longer than the date appointed of permutation. But at last, the eighteenth daie of March, the French king accompanied with the viceroy and capteine Alarcon with fiftie horse, was presented vpon the shore of the river that diuideth the realme of France from the kingdome of Spaine. And on the other side, vpon the shore opposite appeared monsieur Lawtrech with the kings children and like number of horse. There was in the midst of the river a great barke made fast with anchors, in which was no person. The king was rowed nere to this barke in a little boat, wherein he was accompanied with the viceroy, capteine Alarcon, and eight others, all armed with short weapons: and on the other side of the barke were likewise brought in a little boat, monsieur Lawtrech with the hostages & eight others, weaponed according to the others.

The French
king with the viceroy are imbarkeed.

After this the viceroy went into the barke with the king, and all his companie: and also monsieur Lawtrech with his eight that accompanied him, so that they were within the barke a like number of both parts, Alarcon and his eight being with the viceroy, and Lawtrech and the others with the person of the king. And when they were all thus within the barke, the Dolphin, who being giuen to the viceroy and by him committed to capteine Alarcon, was forthwith bestowed in their boate, and after him followed the little duke of Orleans, who was no sooner entred the barke, than the French king leaped out of the barke into his boate, which he did with such quicknesse and celeritie, that the exchange or permutation was thought to be done at one selfe instant; so welcome to him was libertie, without the which nothing is sweet, nothing is comfortable, as the poet saith:

Libertas per dulce bonum, bona cetera reddit.

king is not a little glad of his libertie.

Asone as the king was on the other side of the shore, his new libertie making him fearefull of ambush, he mounted vpon a Turkish horse of a wonderfull swiftnesse, which was prepared for the purpose: and running betwene feare and gladnesse vpon the spur, he neuer staid till he came to St. John de Lus, a towne of his obedience, foure leagues from the place. And being there readilie relieved with a fresh horse, he ran with the same swiftnesse to Baion, where, after he had passed ouer the offices of court done to him by his people, he dispatched with great diligence a gentleman to the king of England, to whom he wrote with his owne hand letters of his deliuerie, charging the messenger under verie lying commission, to tell the king of England, that as he acknowledged the effect of his libertie to be wrought wholely by him and his operations, so in recompense, he offered to remaine to him a perpetuall and assured friend, and to be guided in all his affaires by his counsell. And afterwards he sent an other solempne ambassage into England, to ratifie the peace which his mother had made with him, as one that reaped a verie great foundation in the amitie of that king.

Quic. pag. 968.

When the French king was gotten into Baion, being required by a gentleman of the viceroy, to ratifie the accord according to the obligation of his word, being come into a place free and assured, he deferred it from one daie to another, interposing reasons and excuses general: wherein, to the end to hold still the emperor in hope, he sent to aduertise him by a man especiall, that he forbore for the present to accomplish the ratification, not by omission or wilful negligence, but vpon this necessitie, that before he proceeded realitie to such an act, he was to labour to reapeale and reduce the minds of his subjects contented with the obligations he had made, tending to the diminution of the crowne of France. Nevertheless, he would in his time resolve all difficulties, and obserue with fidelitie all that he had promised to him, both in substance and circumstance. By this dealing, no lesse doubtfull for the manner, than dangerous in meaning, might easilie be comprehended what were his intentions, the same being more manifestlie detected at the arrivall of the messengers sent to him not manie daies after, by the pope and Venetians, in whome was no great need of industrie or labour, to sound out the plaine course of his inclination.

For, after he had receiued them with manie demonstrations and offices of court, he intertained them severallie and apart with sundrie speeches of compassion, such as tended to manifest complaints against the inhumanitie of the emperor: who he said did neuer administer to him during his captivitie, and one office appertaining to the rank of a prince, nor at anie time shewed himselfe touched with that affection and commiseration which one prince ought to expresse in the calamities of another; and much lesse would vse anie course of common comfort, either to relieue the heauinesse of his condition with anie propertie of apt consolation, or once to enter into consideration, that the same accident that had fallen vpon him, might also be as heauilie heaped vpon his owne head. In this complaint, he alleged the example of Edward king of England called of some Edward Long-Shanks. To whome when was presented as prisoner John king of the Frenchmen, taken by the prince of Wales his son in the battell of Poitiers, he did not onelie receive him with great comfort and compassion of his afflicted case, but also, all the time of his imprisonment within the realme of England, he let him go at libertie vnder a free gard.

Furthermore he had daile familiar conuersation with him, he would oftentimes haue him to accompany him on hunting, to communicate in the open aire and solace of the field, and was not curious to call him to eat with him at his table. And by these humanities much lesse that he lost his prisoner, or ranged him to an accord lesse favourable; but of the contrarie, by the operation of those graces and good offices, there grew betwene them such a familiaritie and confidence, that the French king, after he had continued manie yeares in France, made a voluntarie voiage into England, to honour and gratifie vnder that propertie of office, the liberalitie and frankenesse of the king. He alleged that as there was onelie remembrance of two kings of France that had bene taken prisoners in battell, king John and himselfe, so the diuersitie of the examples was also worthie of singular memorie, seeing vpon the one was expressed all facilitie and mildnesse of the victor, and to the other were ministred all those rigours and severities, which tyrants in the height and pride of their fortune are wont to vse. Whereby to he added manie circumstances discovering the discontentment of his mind, wherevpon ensued practices wherewith the emperor was not well pleased.

The king of England alledged by the French king as a president of humilitie in the case of a captive king.

The king of England alledged by the French king as a president of humilitie in the case of a captive king.

Thus soon after that this peace was accorded, and the French king delivered, the emperor married the lady Isabel daughter to Emanuel king of Portugal, and had with him eleven hundred thousand marks. This treaty the French affairs intermured, as we have heard with our owne, and were needfull to us, and wher we will end, and returne to England.

Cardinal Wolsey being still most highlie in the emperours favour, obtained licence to erect a college at Oxford, and another at Ipswich, the towne where he was borne, the which foundations he began rather of a vain desire of glorie and worldlie praise, than of the institution of true religion and advancement of doctrine, and therefore sith he was not moved thereto by the grace of true godlinesse and bountifull liberality, he went about to clype Peter and Paul: for the great goodlikenesse of the king to suppress certeine small monasteries, and after got a confirmation of the pope that he might impleure the goods, lands, and revenues belonging to those houses, to the maintenance of two colleges, wherby not onely he, but also the pope were evil spoken of through the whole realme. In March the king sent Cuthbert Lenthall bishop of London, and Sir Richard Whittington merchant of the dukedome of Lancaster, a knight of the order, into Spain, to conferre with the emperor touching causes concerning the taking of the French king, and to warre to be made into France on euery side.

The emperor being determined thus to make warre in France, he wrote to his himselfe in prison, his council considered that about all things great treasure and victuals of monie must needs be provided. Wherupon the cardinal there was deputed strange commissions, and sent in the end of March into euery shire, and commissioners appointed, and printed instructions sent to them how they should proceed in their shires, and order the people to bring them to their percoles: which was, that the first part of euery mans substance should be paid in monie or plate to the king without delay, for the furniture of his warre: heere followed much crying, weeping, and exclamation against both king & cardinal, that pite it was to see. And to be worse, notwithstanding all that could be said or done, forged or occassioned by the commissioners to perswade the people to this contribution, the same would not be granted. And in excuse of their default it was alledged, that wrong was offered, and the ancient customs & lawes of the realme broken, which would not any man to be charged with lay payment, except it were granted by the estates of the realme in parlement assembled. The like answer was made by them of the spiritualitie, whom was demanded the fourth part of their goods.

Wherupon the emperor sent ambassadores, and offered to admit of John Bokun into the realme as before we have heard, for some other cause. The ninth of April departed out of England, not taking leave of the king, nor of the cardinal, and so much did he use condole, that he passed through France in post, and came to the emperor before the ambassadores of England came thither. And together with his report, or otherwise, the accustomed lawe that the emperor followed to the Englishmen, began again to occur, as was well perceived, what the matter was. This yeare at Westminster died Thomas a duke of Suffolke, and was honourable buried at Westmouster. The cardinal travelled earthenly with the maier and aldermen of London, about the same monie to be granted, and likewise the commissioners appointed in the shires of the realme, left upon the same: but the barthen was so greivous, that it was generallye vented, and the common in euery place so moued, that it was like to grow to rebellion.

After the people would not assemble before the commissioners in no houses, but in open places, and in Huntingtonshire diuerse resisted the commissioners, and would not suffer them to sit, which were apprehended and sent to the Fleet. The duke of Suffolke sitting in commission about this subflowe in Suffolke, perswaded by courteous meanes the rich clothiers to assent thereto: but when they came home, and went about to discharge and put from them their spinners, carders, fullers, weavers, and other artificers, which they kept in worke afore time, the people began to assemble in companies. Wherof when the duke was aduertised, he commanded the constables that euery mans hartes should be taken from him. But when that was knowne, then the rage of the people increased, raising openie on the duke, and Sir Robert Druce, and threatened them with death, and the cardinal also. And herewith there assembled together after the manner of rebels four thousand men of Lanham, Sudburie, Wyndesore, and other towne sherrifments, which put themselves in hartesse, and raised the beis alarme, and began still to assemble in great number.

The duke of Suffolke perceiving this, began to gather such power as he could, but that was verie slender, for the gentlemen that were with the duke, but so much that all the bridges were broken, so that the assemble of those rebels was somewhat letted. The duke of Suffolke being therof aduertised, gathered a great power in Suffolke, and came to warre the commons, sending to them to know their intent: received answer, that they would live and die in the kings causes, and be to him obedient. Wherupon he came himselfe to talke with them, and willing to know who was their captain, that he might answer for them all: it was told him by one John Greene a man of fifte yeares of age, that Howertie was their captain, the which with his cousin Jherolme, had brought them to that doing. For wher as they and a great number of other in that countie, had not put upon themselves, but upon the substantiall occupiers, now that they through such payments as were demanded of them, were not able to maintain them in worke, they must of necessity perishe, want of sustentance.

The duke hearing this matter, was sore for their case, and promised them, that if they would depart home to their dwellings, he would be a meane to their pardon to the king. Wherupon they were contented to depart. After this, the duke of Suffolke, and the duke of Suffolke came to Burie, and thither collected much people of the countie in their shires with halberts about their neckes, meekely desiring pardon for their offences. The dukes in which demeaned themselves, that the commons were appeased, and the demand of monie ceased in all the realme, for well it was perceived that the commons would pay none. Then went the two dukes to London, and brought with them the chiefe captains of the rebellion, which were put in the Fleet. The king then came to Westminster to the cardinals palace, and assembled there a great councell, in the which he openly protested, that his mind was neuer to aske any thing of his commons which might sound to the breach of his lawes, wherefore he wished to know by whose meanes the commissions were so freine gotten forth, to demand the first part of euery mans goods.

The cardinal excused himselfe, and said, that when it was moved in councell how to raise monie to the kings use, the kings councell, and name the commons, for the king

2 rebellion in Suffolke, and the gentlemen of the shire, and the commons of the shire.

The duke of Suffolke gathered a great power in Suffolke, and came to warre the commons, sending to them to know their intent.

Howertie and Jherolme, the which with his cousin Jherolme, had brought them to that doing.

The commons of the rebellion committed rebellion.

The cardinal of York excused himselfe touching the commissions gotten forth, to demand the first part of euery mans goods.

ges, said, that he might lawfullie demand anie summe by commission, and that by the consent of the whole councell it was done, and toke God to witnes that he neuer desired the hinderance of the commons, but like a true counsellor deuised how to enrich the king. The king indeed was much offended that his commons thus intreated, & thought it touched his honoz, that his counsell should attempt such a doubtfull matter in his name, and to be denied both of the spirituatlie and temporaltie. Therefore he would no more of that trouble, but caused letters to be sent into all shires, that the matter should no further be talked of: & he pardoned all them that had denied the demand openlie or secretlie. The cardinal, to deliuer himselfe of the euill will of the commons, purchased by procuring & aduancing of this demand, affirmed, and caused it to be huted abroad, that though his intercession the king had pardoned and released all things.

Those that were in the Towler and fleet for the rebellion in Suffolke, and resisting the commissioners aswell there as in Huntingdon shire and Kent, were brought before the lords in the Star chamber, and there had their offences opened and shewed to them: and finally the kings pardon declared, and thereon they were deliuered. In this season a great number of men of warre laie at Bullongne, and in other places thereabout, which diuerse times attempted to indamage the Englishmen, and to spoile the English pale: but they could neuer spoile the marshes where the greatest part of the cattell belonging to the inhabitants was kept. Tindale men with aid of the Scots, did much hurt in England by robberies, which they exercised: and therefore were sent thither, sir Richard Bulmer, and sir Christopher Dacres, to restraine their doings. Diuerse came to them, and submitted themselves: but the greatest theues kept them in the mounteins of Cheuiot, and did much hurt, yet at length they leuered, and manie of them were taken.

Tindale men great robbers

The cardinall by his power legantine sent one of his chapleins called doctor John Allen, to visit the religious houses of this realme about this season, which doctor praised amongst them greatly to his profit, but more to the slander both of himselfe and of his maister. On the eighteenth daie of June, at the manor place of Wyndesore, the kings sonne (which he had begot of Elizabeth Blunt, daughter to sir John Blunt knight) called Henrie Fitzroie, was created first earle of Nottingham, and after on the selfe same daie he was created duke of Richmond and Somerset. Also the same daie the lord Henrie Courtenie earle of Denonshire, and cosine germane to the king, was created marquisse of Excester: and the lord Henrie Brandon sonne to the duke of Suffolke and the French queene, a child of two yeares old, was created earle of Lincolne: and sir Thomas Banniers lord Ross was created earle of Rutland, and sir Henrie Clifford earle of Cumberland, and the lord Fitzwater sir Robert Katcliffe was created vicount Fitzwater, and sir Thomas Bullen treasurer of the kings household was created vicount Rochefort.

Henries hafe sonne created earle and duke in one daie.

The French kings mother as then regent of France, procured a safe conduct for an ambassadoz to be sent into England to treat of peace, and there, with sir John Fokin called monsieur de Clair, which (as we haue heard) in the last yeare was kept secret in maister Larks house. By his procurement a truce was granted to indure from the thirtieth of Iulie for fortie daies betwene England and France both by sea and land. In the later end of Iulie came into England the cheefe president of Rome with sufficient authoritie to conclude anie agreement that should be granted. At his suite the king was contented that a truce should be taken, to endure from the fourteenth of August, till the first of December. This yeare the king sent doctor Henrie Standish bishop of saint Asse, and sir John Baker knight into Denmarke, to intreat with the nobles of that countrie for the reduction of their king Christierne to his realme and former dignitie: but the Danes hated him so much for his crueltie, that they could not abide to heare of anie such matter, and so these ambassadoz returned without speeding of their purpose for the which they were sent.

But the French ambassadoz did so much both by offers and intreaties, that the king condescended to a peace, which being concluded, was proclaimed in London with a trumpet the eight of September. By the covenants of this peace the king of England should receiue at certeine daies twentie hundred thousand crownes, which then amounted in sterling monie to the summe of foure hundred thousand pounds sterling, of which one payment of fiftie thousand pounds was paid in hand. In October were sent into France, sir William Fitzwilliam treasurer of the kings house, and doctor Taylor, as ambassadoz from the king of England to the ladie regent, whome they found at the citie of Lion, where of hir they were honozable receiued: and in their presence the said ladie regent toke a corporall oth in solemne wise, and according to the custome in such cases vied, to performe all the articles and covenants passed and concluded in the league and treatie of peace by hir commissioners.

The emperor was nothing pleased, in that the king of England had thus concluded peace with the Frenchmen, and therefore the English merchants were not so courtouslie dealt with, as they had bene afore time. In this winter was great death in London, so that the terme was adourned: and the king kept his Christenmasse at Eltham, with a small number, and therefore it was called the still Christenmasse. In Januarie was a peace concluded betwixt the realmes of England and Scotland for three yeares and six moneths. The cardinall about this time coming to the court, which then laie (as before we haue heard) at Eltham, toke order for altering the state of the kings house. Spanie officers and other seruants were discharged, and put to their pensions and annuities. In which number were fourtescore and foure yeomen of the gard, which before hauing twelue pence the daie with checke, were now allowed five pence the daie without checke, and commanded to go home into their countries. Diuers ordinances were made at that season by the cardinall, touching the gouernance of the kings house, more profitable than honozable, as some said, and were called long after, The statutes of Eltham.

On Shrouetuesdaie there was a solemne iusts held at the manor of Grenewich, the king & eleuen other on the one part, and the marquisse of Excester with eleuen other on the contrarie part. At those iusts by chance of shiuring of a speare sir Francis Brian lost one of his eyes. The eleuenth of february being fundaie, the cardinall with great pompe came to the cathedrall church of Wantes, where he sat in pontificalibus under his cloth of estate of rich cloth of gold, and there doctor Barnes an Augustine frier bare a fagot for certeine points of heretic alleaged against him; and two merchants of the Stillard bare fagots for eating of flesh on a fridaie: and there the bishop of Rochester doctor Fisher made a sermon against spartine Luther, which certeine yeares before, that is to wit, about the yeare a thousand five hundred and rightene, had begun to preach and write against the authoritie of the pope.

We must here note, that the emperour being at Windsor in the fourteenth yere of the kings reigne covenanted, amongst other things, to take to wife the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England: but now upon considerations his mind changed, for the which the Englishmen sore murmured against him. On the nine and twentieth of Aprill being Sundaye, the cardinall long a solemne masse in the kings chappell at Greenwich, and after the same was ended, the king swore in presence of the ambassadoys of France, and of the ambassadoys of Rome, of the emperour of Venice, and of Florence, to observe and keepe the peace and league concluded betwixt him and his loving brother, and perpetuall alie the French king, during his life and one yere after.

In this meane while, there was a secret league concluded betwixt the pope, the Venetians, the Florentines, and Francis Sforza duke of Milan: into the which league the French king also entered, after he was returned into France. There was also place left to the king of England would, he should be admitted as protector of the same. But the emperour might not be admitted, till he had delivered the French kings children (having a reasonable summe of monie for the same) and had restored the duke of Milan to his whole duchie. It was thought indeed, that the emperour being wrongfullie informed against this duke, rather through envie of some of the emperours capteins, than for any cause ministered by the duke, dealt verie treightlie with him, & meant to defeat him of his duchie. For redresse therof, and also to provide that the emperour should not grow too strong in Italie to the danger of other estates, this league was devised: by force whereof he might be brought to reason, if he would refuse convenient offers and indifferent waies of agreement.

This league was concluded the two and twentieth of Maie in this yere. What followed thereof, ye may read more at large in the histories of Italie and France, where the warres are more at large touched, which chanced in that season betwixt the emperour, and the confederats, and how the imperiall armie toke the citie of Rome, and besieging the pope in castell saint Angelo, constrained him to yield, and agree to certaine propositions put unto him. ¶ Who being by his aduersitie made naked of all helpe present, and lesse expectation to be rescued there was so great want of valour and order, was driven to turn the race of his fortune, compounding the first daie of June with the imperials almost under the same conditions with the which he might have accorded before. That the pope should paie to the armie foure hundred thousand ducketts in this order: one hundred thousand presentlie to be defraied of the gold, monie, and treasure reserved in the castell: fiftie thousand within twentie daies, and two hundred and fiftie thousand within two moneths: assigning to him for these defraiments, an impole of monie to be charged upon the whole church state. That he should deliver into the power of the emperour, to reteine them so long as he thought good, the castell saint Angelo, the rockes of Ostia, of Civita Vecchia, of Civita Castellana, together with the cities of Parma, Piasanca, and Modena.

Furthermore, that the pope together with all those cardinals that were with him, which were thirtene in number, should remaine prisoners within the castell, untill the first payment of an hundred and fiftie thousand ducketts were satisfied. That afterwards they should go to Naples or to Caietta, to expect what the emperour would determine of them. That for assurance of the payments, wherof he third part apportioned to the Spaniards, he should deliver in for hostages, the archbishops of Siponto and Viterbo, the bishops of Viterbo & Verona, together with James Salviato, Simon de Alcalá, and Laurence brother to cardinall Rodolfo. That Hans de Cero, Albert Pio, Datto Bailon, the knight Casalo, the ambassadour of England, with all others that were saved within the castell, except the pope and the cardinals, should depart in suertie. That the pope should give absolution to the Colonnois of the censures they had incurred. And that when he should be led out of Rome, a legat should remaine there for him with authoritie to dispose and administer iustice.

During the popes captivitie, Rome was sore afflicted with the plague, in somuch that the rage thereof so greatlie increased, that the castell of saint Angelo was visited, to the great danger of the life of the pope; about whome died certeine spectall men that did service to his person: who amid so manie afflictions and aduersities, and no other hope remaining to him than in the clemencie of the emperour, appointed for legat with the consent of the capteins, cardinall Alexander of Farnese, who notwithstanding being issued out of the castell, and Rome, refused under that occasion to go in the said legation. The capteins desired to carie the person of the pope with the thirtene cardinals that were with him, to Caietta: but he laboured against that resolution with great diligence, petitions, and art.]

¶ In the month of Maie was a proclamation made against all unlawfull games, according to the statutes made in this behalfe, and commissions awarded into euerie shire for the execution of the same; so that in all places, tables, dice, cards, and boules were taken and burnt. Wherefore the people murmured against the cardinall, saying: that he grudged at euerie mans pleasure, saving his owne. But this proclamation small time indured. For when yong men were forbidden boules and such other games: some fell to drinking, some to setting of other mens comies, some to stealing of deere in parks, and other vniustices.

This yere in the citie of London a great grudge was conceived against merchants strangers, for that they by vertue of licences, which they had purchased to bring woad into the realme, contrarie to a statute thereof provided, brought ouer such plentie thereof, and vttered it aswell in the citie, as abroad in the countrie, so franklie, that Englishmens woad laie unbought. At length the maior called a common council in the month of August, and there were manie billes laied against the strangers, and at last it was enacted, that no citizen nor freman should buy nor sell in no place, nor exchange nor meddle with certeine strangers, called Anthoine Bonuice, Laurence Bonuice, Anthoine Auald, Anthoine Caueler, Francis de Ward, Thomas Calneant, and a great sort more, whose names I let passe. And if any person did meddle or occupie with them contrarie to this act, he should lose his freedom and libertie in the citie of London. By which act the strangers were so bideled, that they came to a reasonable point and conclusion.

In this season the angell noble was tuff the first part of an ounce Trote, so that six angells were tuff an ounce, which was fourtie shillings sterling; & the angell was worth two ounces of silver: so that six angells were worth twelue ounces, which was but fourtie shillings in silver. By reason of the good weight and low valuation of the English coine, merchants daily carried ouer great store, because the same was much inhauced there. So that, to meet with this inconuenience, in September proclamation was made through all England, that the angell

The king kept a solemne Christmasse at Greene, with with reuerles, maskes, disguisings, & bankets: and the thirtieth daie of December, was an enterpise of iusts made at the tilt by six gentlemen, against all comers, which balliantlie furnished the same, both with speare and sword: and like iusts were kept the third daie of Januarie, where were three hundred speares broken. That same night, the king and manie yong gentlemen with him, came to Bidewell, and there put him and sixtene other, all in masking apparell, and then toke his barge, and rowed to the cardinals place, where were at supper a great compaignie of lords and ladies, and then the maskers danced, and made goodlie pastime: and when they had well danced, the ladies plucked awate their visors, and so they were all knownen, and to the king was made a great banket.

On the fourteenth of Januarie came to the court don Hugo de Mendoza, a man of a noble familie in Spaine: he came as ambassadour from the emperour to the king, with large commission, for the emperour put it to the kings determination, whether his demands which he required of the French king were reasonable or not. This noble man tarried here two yeres. This Christmasse was a goodlie disguising plaied at Graies In, which was compiled for the most part by maister John Ho, sergeant at the law manie yeres past, and long before the cardinall had any authoritie. The effect of the play was, that lord gouernance was ruled by dissipation and negligence, by whose misgouernance and euill order ladies publike weale was put from gouernance: which caused rumor popul, inward grudge and disdain of wanton souereignetie, to rise with a great multitude, to expell negligence and dissipation, and to restore publike welth againe to hir estate, which was so done.

The argument of the plaie

This plaie was so set forth with rich and costlie apparell, with strange deuises of maskes & morisyes, that it was highlie praised of all men, sauing of the cardinall, which imagined that the play had bene deuised of him, and in a great furie sent for the said maister Ho, and toke from him his cosse, and sent him to the flect: and after he sent for the yong gentlemen, that plaied in the plaie, and them highlie rebuked and threatned, and sent one of them called Thomas Poile of Kent to the flect, but by means of friends maister Ho and he were deliuered at last. This plaie soze displeased the cardinall, and yet it was neuer meant to him, as you haue heard. Wherefore manie wisemen grudged to see him take it so hartilie, and euer the cardinall said that the king was highlie displeased with it, and spake nothing of himselfe. But what will you haue of a guiltie conscience but to suspect all things to be said of him (as if all the world knew his wickednesse) according to the old verse:

Conscius ipse sibi de se putat omnia dici.

Ambassadors
fro the French
king.

The second of March were receiued into London the bishop of Tarbe, Francis bicount of Thurane, and maister Anthonie Welsie second president of Paris, as ambassadours from the French king. They were lodged in Tailors hall. On Shrouetuesdaie the king himselfe in a new harnesse all gilt, of a strange fashon that had not bene scene, and with him eight gentlemen all in cloth of gold of one suite, embroidered with knots of siluer, and the marques of Cresset, and eight with him in blew beluet and white sattin, like the waves of the sea, these men of armes came to the tilt, and there ran manie fresh courses, till two hundred fourscore and six speares were broken, and then they disarmed and went to the quenes chamber, where for them was provided a costlie banket.

The French ambassadours sued (as was said) to haue the ladie Marie daughter to the K. of England, giuen in mariage to the duke of Orleans, second sonne to their master the French king: but that matter was put in suspence for diuerse considerations. And one was, for that the president of Paris doubted whether the mariage betwene the king and hir mother (the being his brother's wife) was lawfull or not. While the French ambassadours late thus in London, it happened one euening as they were coming from the Blache friers, from supper to the Tailors hall, two boies were in a gutter casting downe rubbish, which the raine had giuen there, and vntwares hit a lackeie belonging to the bicount of Thurane, and hurt him nothing, for scantlie touched it his cote. But the French lords toke the matter highlie, as a thing done in despite, & sent word to the cardinall. Who being too hasty of credence, sent for sir Thomas Seimor knight, lord maior of the citie, and in all hast commanded him upon his allegiance, to take the husband, wife, children, and seruants of the house, and them to imprison, till he knew further of the kings pleasure, and that the two boies apprentices should be sent to the Tower: which commandement was accomplished without anie fauor. For the man, and his wife, and seruants, were kept in the counter till the first daie of Maie, which was six weekes full, and their neighbours of gentleness kept their house in the meane time, and one of the apprentices died in the Tower, and the other was almost lame. Of the crueltie of the cardinall, and of the pride of the Frenchmen, much people spake, & would haue bene reuenged on the Frenchmen, if wise men in the citie had not appeased it with faire words.

In question

On the fourteenth daie of March were conueied from London to Grenewich by the earle of Rutland and others, the lord Gabriel de Salamanca earle of Ottonburgh, John Burgrau of Silberberge, and John Faber a famous cleerke, after bishop of Elicn, as ambassadours from don Ferdinand, brother to the emperour, newlie elect king of Hungarie and Beaine, after the death of his brother in law king Lewes, which was slaine by the Turke the last summer, as you haue heard before. This compaignie was welcomed of the high officers, and after brought in to the kings presence, all the nobilitie being present, and there after great reuerence made, maister Faber made a notable oration, taking his ground of the gospel, Exiit seminator seminare semen suum, and of that he declared how Christ and his disciples went forth to sow, and how their seed was good that fell in to the good ground, and brought forth good fruit, which was the christian faith: and then he declared how contrarie to that sowing, Mahomet had sowne seed, which brought forth euill fruit. He also shewed from the beginning, how the Turkes haue increased in power, what realmes they had conquered, what people they had subdued euen to that daie.

He declared further what acts the great Turke then lining had done, and in especiall he noted the getting of Belgrad, and of the Rhodes, and the slaying of the king of Hungarie, to the great rebuke (as he said) of all the kings christened. He set forth also what power the Turke had, what diuersities of compaignies, what armor, what captains he had, so that he thought, that without a marvellous great number of people he could not be overthowne. Wherefore he most humbly besought the king, as S. Georges knight, knight, and defender of the faith, to assist the king his master in that godlie warre and vertuous purpose.

To this oration the k. by the mouth of sir Thomas Apoze answered, that much he lamented the losse that happened in Hungarie, and if it were not for the warre which were betwene the two great princes, he thought that the Turke would not haue enterprised that act. Wherefore he with all his studie would take paine, first, to set an brittle and peace throughout all christendome; and after that, both with monie and men, he wold be redie to helpe toward that glorious warre, as much as any other prince in christendome.
After this done, the ambassadours were well theri-fied, and diuerse times resorted to the court, and had great cheare and good rewards, and so the third daie of Maie next ensuing, they toke their leaue and departed homeward.

In the winter season of this yeare fell great abundance of raine, and namelie in September, October, and December. And on the firstenth of Januarie it rained so abundantly, that great floods thereby insuing, destroyed corne fields, pastures, and drowned manie sheepe and beasts. When was it dyie till the twelue of Aprill, and from thence it rained euerie day or night till the third of June, & in Maie it rained thirtie hours continuallie without ceasing, which caused great floods, & did much harme, namelie in corne, so that the next yeare it failed within this realme, and great dearth ensued.

This time a bill was set vp in London, much contrarie to the honour of the cardinall, in the which the cardinall was learned that he should not counsell the king to marrie his daughter into France: for if he did, he should shew himselfe enimie to the king and the realme, with manie threatening words. This bill was deliuered to the cardinall by sir Thomas Sei-mor, maior of the citie, which thanked him for the same, & made much search for the author of that bill, but he could not be found, which soe displeased the cardinall. And vpon this occasion the last daie of Aprill at night he caused a great watch to be kept at Westminster, and had there cart guns readie charged, & caused diuerse watches to be kept about London, in Pewington, St. Johns Street, Westminster, saint Giles, Kingston, and other places nere London: which watches were kept by gentlemen & their seruants, with householders, and all for feare of the Londoners because of this bill. When the citizens knew of this, they said that they marvelled why the cardinall hated them so, for they said that if he mis-trusted them, he loued them not: and where loue is not, there is hatred: and they affirmed that they neuer intended any harme toward him, and mused of this chance. For if five or six persons had made alarm in the citie, then had entred all these watchmen with their traine, which might haue spoiled the citie without cause. Wherefore they much murmured against the cardinall and his indiscret doings.]

The French ambassadours at Greenwich on sunday the first of Maie, sware in the name of their master the French king to obserue the peace and league concluded betwene them, for tearme of two princes lines. These ambassadours had great cheare, and lustes were enterprised for the honour and pleasure of them at the kings commandement by sir Nicholas Carew, sir Robert Jerningham, sir Anthonie Browne, and Nicholas Haruic squier challengers.
Against whome ran the marques of Orcester, and thirteen with him as defendants. When these ambalsadors should returne, they had great rewards gi-uen them of the king, and so toke their leaue and departed. Shortly after the king sent sir Thomas Bullen vicount Rochford, and sir Anthonie Browne knight, as ambassadours from him into France, which came to Paris to the bishop of Bath that late there for the king as legier.

Then these three went to the court, and saw the French king in person sware to keepe the league & amitie concluded betwene him & the king of England. Also the king sent sir Francis Poins knight ambassadour from him to Charles the emperor, and with him went Clarenceaur king of armes, to demand the one halfe of the treasure and ordinance which was taken at Paula, for so much as that warre was made as well at the kings charge as at the emperours. Also they were commanded to demand one of the French kings sonnes, which lay in hostage with the emperor, that is to wit, the duke of Ale-ance to be deliuered to the king of England; and further that he shuld call backe his armie out of Italie.
And if it were so that he refused these reasonable requests, then shoud they in the kings name denounce open warre against him: The English merchants liked the matter nothing at all, that there should be any warres betwixt the emperor and the king of England. And where they were desired by the cardinall to keepe their marts at Calis, they would not assent thereto.

In this meane time great warres were managed betwene the pope and other princes, amongst whom the duke of Burbon (of whom you haue heard often mention before in sundrie actions) lenieng a great power, led the same towards Rome, and in-camped within the medow nere to the citie, from whence with the insolencie of a souldier he sent a trumpet to demand passage of the pope through the citie of Rome, to go with his armie to the realme of Naples. The morning following vpon the point of the daie, by the consideration of his case and the aduerities thereof, he found there remained no other hope for his affaires, than to be resolute to relaeue the afflictions of his armie, and according to the opportunitie that was offered by the citie of Rome, either to die or to vanquish. In which resolution pushed on more and more by the murmurs and exclamations of his souldiers, in whom he could not discern which was greater, either their insolencies or their necessities, he dyed nere the suburbs by the waie of the mounteine and Santo Spirito, where he began to giue a furious assault. Wherein he seemed to haue the saueur of fortune, who made him present his armie in more suertie by the benefit of a thicke mist, which being risen before daie, and increased with degrees of fog and thicknesse, became such a couer to his whole campe, that his souldiers were not discerned till they were nere the place where they began to giue the assault.

The duke of Burbon through a last despaire of his estate advanced before all his companies, either for that he had no other expectation of refuge, in case he returned not victorious, or else by his owne example he thought to call on with a greater courage the lanceknights, who it seemed went not resolute to the seruice. But such was his destinie to determine his life & his glorie together, or rather such the reward of his wilfull forwardnes, which for the most part brauely wreched effects vpon such as seeke not to accompanye their valour with counsell and discretion.
In the beginning of the assault he was stricken with a bullet of an harquebuz, of which wound he fell downe dead to the earth, receiuing instant vpon his bodie and life the price of the action, which contrarie to all iustice and pietie he went about to execute. But much lesse that his death did abate or diminish, seeing it did inflame and redouble the courage of his souldiers, who fighting with a wonderfull constancie the space of two houres, made waie at last by their hands and weapons to enter the suburbs, where they were were not onelie holpen by the weaknesse of the rampires which were great and generall, but also they found helpe in the slender resistance which the defendants made.

The morall of the foze laid action worth the noting.

An experience of right good doctrine, to such as haue not as yet gotten by the benefit of examples past, the knowledge of things present, who in that action maie discern what propertie of difference is betwene the vertue of souldiours exercised and trained in war, and armes newlie and hapillie leuied, and compounded of the multitude of a people more wilfull than skilfull; and by so much lesse apt to be drawn vnder discipline, by how much more by their nature and custome they are seldome conformable to anie good order. For there was at the defense of the suburbs one part of the youth of Rome, vnder the ensignes of the people; notwithstanding that manie of the Cebelines & faction of Colonna desired, or at least did not feare the victorie of the imperials. They hoped in regard of their faction, to receiue no harme or offense by the victors: the same being the cause whie they proceeded so coldlie in the defense. neuer thelesse, for that according to the rules of warre, it is a hard matter to take toiwnes without artilleries, there died of the assailants, partlie by that want, and partlie through their wilfull forwardnesse, about a thousand footmen; who hauing once by their valor made the waie open to enter in, all the defendants fled before them as men whose feare was far above anie other sense or passion in them.

Rome taken and sacked.

In which disorder, some took the waie which his fortune and not his wit laid out for him: some in the astonishment taking to fle, who durst no more fight, were slaine by the entrie afoze he could resolve vpon the waie of his safetie; some either better prepared, or more hapillie preferred, found that safetie in running away, which they could not but doubt if they had longer endured the fight: and some with that resolution which their present calamitie would suffer, ran by heapes towards the castell, where in place of rescue they found a feare conformable to their owne: inasmuch as all things being reduced to confusion and manifest flight, the suburbs were entierlie abandoned & left a preie to the victors. And the person of the pope, who expected with great deuotion in the palace of Clatican what would be the issue of the assault, hearing that the enemies were entered, had also (with the others) his passions of feare & frailtie, and in that timorous contemplation of his owne perill, he fled with certeine cardinales to the castell.

The pope with certeine cardinales fle to the castell of saint Angelo.

This feare kept him from being resolute in a perill that was so desperate, neither did he thinke, that with the presence and maiestie of his person, though it was couered with the haile of the highest dignitie on earth, he was able to put by the danger, which the valor and fidelitie of his souldiours could not defend with their weapons. Where he consulted with the cardinales, whether it were more for his safetie to remaine there, or during the furie of the astonishment, to retire with the light horsemen of his guard into some place of more suertie by the waie of Rome. But he, who was appointed by destinie, to be an erample of the calamities that maie thunder vpon popes, and how fraile is the authoritie and maiestie of that see, being certified by the relation of Berard de Padoa, who was fled from the armie imperiall, that the duke of Burboin was dead, and that the whole armie standing abated in courage for the death of their capteine, desired to come to accord with him. In which matter they sent out men to parlee with the principallies there, he watched lie left there all his counsellies to go awaie, both he and his capteins remaining no lesse irresolute in the prouisions for defense, than they had bene slow in the expeditions.

So that the daie following, the Spaniards neither taking order nor counsell, to defend the quarter beyond Liber, entered the place without anie resistance. And from thence, not finding anie impediments to stop their victorie, the same evening they entered the citie of Rome by the bridge Nisio, where, except such as reposed in the confidence of their faction, and certeine cardinales, who for that they bare a name to embrace the emperours quarrell, beleeued to find more suertie than the others, all the residue of the court and citie (as happeneth in accidents so furious) was conuerted into fleeing and confusion. But the souldiours being within the citie, which they knew wanted nothing to make them right glorious, and well satisfied of all things appertaining to their desires, they began to omit no time to execute the thing they had so deartlie bought. Curious one ran to pillage with the same vnbidded libertie, which in such cases maketh souldiours both insolent and impious.

The Spaniards entered to Rome by the bridge Nisio.

There was small care or regard borne either to the name of friends, factions, or fauourers; and much lesse was respected the authoritie of cardinales and prelats, or dignitie of temples and monasteries; and lastlie, not reserved from violaton, the holie relics brought thither from all parts of the world; yea, uen things sacred, and speciallie dedicated, were profaned from their shrines and holie places, and made subiect to the furious wills and discretion of the souldiours. It is not onelie impossible to reaccount, but also to imagine the calamities of that citie raised to a wonderfull greatnesse, and appointed by Gods ordinance to suffer manie fortunes and directions, hauing bene sacked by the Goths within ix. C. and lxxx. yeares. It is hard to particulate the greatnesse of the prete, both for the generall wealth and riches which the greedy hands of the souldiours had made by in heaps, and for other things more rare and pretious drawn out of the store-houses of merchants and courtiers. But the matter which made the spoile infinit in value, was the qualitie and great number of prisoners redeemed with most rich and huge ransomes.

The reader is to tolerate the report of this misfortune though fauouring of superstition.

And to make by a full tragedie of miserie and infamie, the lanceknights being so much the more insolent and cruell, by how much they bare hatred to the name of the church of Rome, took prisoners certeine prelats, whom with great contempt and indignitie they set vpon asses and leane mules, and with their faces reuered to the croup of the beasts, they led them thorough the citie of Rome, apparelled with the habits and markes of their dignitie: yea they passed manie of them to cruell toiments, who either died in the furie of the action, or at least with the painefulnesse thereof they liued not long after, first yielding a rancome, and afterwards rendering their liues. The generall slaughter as well at the assault as in the rage of sacking, was about foure thousand bodies. All the palaces of the cardinales were sacked, except some particulars, who to saue the merchants that were retired thither with their goods, together with the persons and goods of manie others reserved of the generall calamitie, made promise of great summes of monie. To whom notwithstanding was vsed this iniquitie, that some of them that had compounded with the Spaniards, were afterwards sacked by the lanceknights, or at least constrained to a second rancome.

This spectacle could not but afford plentie of hart-griefe.

The ladie marquesse of Mantua compounded for hir palace for the summe of fiftie thousand ducats, which were paid by the merchants and others retired thither: of which summe the rumour ran, that Ferrand hir sonne had ten thousand for his share. The

The cardinall of Sienita dedicated in a perpetuall devotion to the name of the emperoz, after he had agreed with the Spaniards, as well for him selfe as for his palace, was afterwards made prisoner by the lanceknights, who made botie and pricke of his palace; and afterwards leading him all naked with buffets and bastinadoes into the bozough, he was placed to redeeme his life out of their hands, with a promise of five thousand ducats. The cardinales Smerua and Bonsero passed vnder almost the like calamitie, who being prisoners to the lanceknights, were rated at a ranfome which they paid, after they had bene in a vile spectacle caried in procession thorough the towne of Rome.

This furie of souldiours executed in a place of so great riches and profit, could endure no dispensation of anie sort or qualitie of men, seeing the prelates and cardinales, Spanissh and Germans, who made themselves assured that the souldiours of their nation would spare them from oppression and taxation, were taken and passed by the same measure of miserie and calamitie as others did. Right pittifull were the criengs and lamentations of the women of Rome: and no lesse worthy of compassion, the calamitie of nunnies and virgins professed, whom the souldiours rauished by tropes out of their houses to satiate their lust, no age, no sex, no dignitie or calling was free from the violation of souldiours, in whom it was doubtfull whether bare more rule, the humors of crueltie to kill, or the appetite of lust to defouler, or lastlie, the rage of couetousnesse to rob and spoile: yea in the violation of these women might be discerned a confirmation of the iudgements of God hid den from mortall men, for that he suffered to be deliuered by to the violence of men, barbarous and bloody, the renowned chastitie of women professed and virgins.

This spectacle could not but afford evidence of part-grace.

To this compassion was ioined the infinite clamors of men forced against all law of humanitie, partie to wrest from them unreasonable ranfomes, and partie to disclose their goods which they had hid den from the ruine of the souldiours. All these things, sacraments and relikes of saints, whereof the churches were full, being despoiled of their ornaments, were pulled downe, and laid vpon the earth, suffering no small propfanations, by the vile hands of the lanceknights. And whatsoever remained vpon the preies and spoillings of the imperiales, which were things but base and vile, were raked and caried away by the pezants and tenants of the lands of the Colonnois, whose insolencie caried them into Rome during the generall furie. Whelie the cardinall of Colonno attaining the daie after, preferred in his compassion the honoz of manie women that hapilie were fled for rescue into his house. The rumoz went that the valuation and price of this sacke in gold, silver, and iewels, amounted to more than a million of ducats, but the matter of ranfomes contained a greater quantitie.] question.

When Rome was thus taken by the imperiales, and the pope brought into captiuitie, therewith the king was so incensed against the emperour by the instigation of the cardinall, that he had determined not to spare anie treasure for the popes deliuerance. There rose a secret bruite in London that the kings confessor doctor Longland, and diuerse other great clerks had told the king that the marriage betwene him and the ladie Katharine, late wife to his brother prince Arthur was not lawfull: whereupon the king should sue a diuorse, and marrie the duchesse of Alanz for sister to the French king at the towne of Calis this summer: and that the vicount Rochford had brought with him the picture of the said ladie. The king was offended with those tales, and sent for sir Thomas Seimoz mazo of the citie of London, secretly charging him to see that the people ceased from such talke.

But what so euer the commons talked, it was determined that the cardinall should go ouer into France as high ambassadour for the king, and to take with him twelue score thousand pounds, to be employed on the warres to be made by the confederats against the emperour, if he would not condescend to such demands as the English ambassadours on the kings behalfe should exhibit vnto him. The third of Iulie this triumphant cardinall passed thorough London with twelue hundred horse towards the sea side, and coming vnto Canturburie rested there, and there declared to the people what had charged vnto the pope, and caused the monks of Chisties church to sing their Letanie after this maner: Sancta Maria ora pro Clemente papa, &c. Then he exhorted the people to fast and pray for the popes deliuerance, accordinglie as he had already sent commissions vnto all the bishops within the realme to follow that order, which was to fast three daies in the weeke, and to be in euerie parish solemne processions. The eleuenth of Iulie the cardinall toke shipping at Dover, and landed the same daie at Calis, from whence he departed the two and twentieth of Iulie, and with him was the bishop of London Cuthbert Tunstall, the lord Sands chamberleine to the king, the earle of Derby, sir Henrie Guilford, sir Thomas Poze, with manie other knights and esquires, in all to the number of twelue hundred horse, and of carriages there were foure score wagons, and three score mules and sumpter horses.

He that is desirous to vnderstand with what honour this triumphant cardinall was receiued in all places as he passed thorough Picardie by order giuen by the French king, maie read thereof at large in the chronicles of maister Edward Hall. At Amiens he was receiued by the French king himselfe, and by his mother with all other chiefe peres of France. There was nothing forgot that might do him honour or pleasure. But to the effect of his businesse. After he had shewed his commission, they fell in counsell, and in the end grew to a full conclusion of a league to be accorded and established betwixt the kings of England and France: the couenants and articles whereof were drawne and written vp in a faire charter, which was sealed in solemne wise, and deliuered vnto the cardinals by the kings owne hand.

After this, it was agreed, that Duot de Foies, commonlie called monsieur de Lawtrech, should go into Italie with a puissant armie to procure the popes deliuerance, & repell the emperours power out of all the partie of Italie, if he refused such reasonable offers & articles of agreement as were drawen, & should be exhibited to him. In this armie went sir Robert Jerningham, John Carew of Hakam, & 80 other English gentlemen, which were sent by the cardinall from Amiens. When the armie was assembled, the cardinall deliuered the monie which he had brought out of England with him in barrels, with the which the armie was paid two moneths before hand, & the surpluse was deliuered to sir Robert Jerningham, which was called treasure of the wars. This armie was called in Latine, Exercitus Anglia & Gallorum regum pro pontifice Romano liberando congregatus, that is to saie, The armie of the kings of England and France, gathered for the deliuerance of the bishop of Rome: and so was it reputed.

the kings letters, and further declared their message as they had in commandement. The emperor made to them a courteous answer for that time, and said he would take counsell in the matter, and then should they receiue further answer, and in the meane time they might repose them. Within a date or two after he called to him doctor Le that was the kings ambassador legier there with him, & the said sir Francis Poins, and said to them; My lords we haue perceiued the king your maisters demands, which are weightie and of great importance. Wherefore we intend with all speed to write to the king our uncle, and when we haue receiued answer from him, we shall deliuer you of such things as you require, praieng you in the meane time to take patience.

The emperor protracted time of purpose, because he was loth to answer directlie to such grieuous and most irkesome complaints, because he gessed by the course of things that the French king would shortly be constrained to agree to those conditions of peace, which he at the first had offered. But the French king & the cardinall being together at Amiens, amongst other things determined there betwixt them in counsell, deuised further what articles of offer should be sent to the emperor, which if he refused, then open defiance to be made vnto him in name of both the kings. The articles were these in effect.

Articles proposed to the emperor being in number sixteen.

1 First that the French king should paie for his ransome 25000 crownes: one winter callet it two millions. 2 Also that he should release all the pension that he had in Naples, with all the right of the same. 3 Also that he should neuer claime title to the dutchie of Millane. 4 Also he should release the superiortie of Flanders for ever, and the right which he had to the citie of Doine. 5 Also he should release all the homages of all persons within those countries. 6 Also to withdraue his armie out of Italie. 7 Also to forsake the aid of the Switzers against the emperor. 8 Also to take no more part with Robert de la Marck against the emperor. 9 Also neuer to aid the king of Nauarre against him, although he had married the kings sister. 10 Also neuer to aid the duke of Gelderland, nor to challenge the same dutchie. 11 Also to aid the emperor with ships and men to his coronation. 12 Also to marie the ladie Eleonor quene of Portugall sister to the emperor. 13 Also that the Dolphine should marie the said quenes daughter. 14 Also that if the French king had anie children male by the said quene, then the dutchie of Burgognie to remaine to the said child being male. 15 Also that the French king should be friend to the emperor & his friends; and enemie to his enemies.

These with manie other articles, which were not openlie knowne, were sent to the bishop of Tarbe, and to the vicount of Thuraine ambassadors with the emperor from the French king. Other articles were also sent to the English ambassadors being in Spaine, as to moue the emperor to some reasonable end with the French king: and that the king of England would release vnto him all the summes of monie due to him, as well by the emperor Maximilian his grandfather as himselfe, and take the French king as debto: for the same. If he would not agree to these offers, then was it accorded, that the French king should marrie the ladie Marie daughter to the king of England, and they both to be enemies to the emperor. When all these things were concluded, the cardinall took his leaue of the French king & his mother, and with great rewards returned, comming to Richmond, where the king then laie, the last of September.

Ambassadors from the French king.

In October, there came ambassadors from the French king into England, the lord Annas de Mont-merancie, great maister of the said French kings house, the bishop of Baion chiefe president of Rione, and monsieur de Humiers accompanied with sicke gentlemen well appointed. These ambassadors were receiued with all honour that might be deuised. On Alhalloves daie the king comming to the cathedrall church of saint Paule, where the cardinall sang masse, swore befoze the high altar in the presence of the French ambassadors to keepe and performe the league. On sundaie the tenth of Nouember, the king being elected knight of the order of St. Michael, receiued at Greenwich the said order by the hands of the great maister of France, and monsieur Humiers that were companions of the same order: in like case as the French king the same daie at Paris receiued the order of the garter by the hands of the lord Lisle, doctor Tailor, maister of the rolles, sir Nicholas Carew knight maister of the kings hozles, sir Anthonie Botone knight, and sir Thomas Wriothesle knight, otherwise called Cartier king of armes, the which were sent thither with the whole habit, collar, and other habillements of the order as apperteined.

After that the French ambassadors had bene highlie feasted, banketed, and interteined, with all hono: and pastime conuenient, the great maister and all his companie took leaue of the king, and with great rewards returned into France, leaving the bishop of Baion behind them, who abode ambassador legier in England. In this moneth of Nouember, Arthur Bilsnie, Gesteire Lome, and one Garet that spake against the popes authoritie, were abjured by the cardinall. By reason of the great wet that fell in the sowing time of the corne, and in the beginning of the last yeare, not in the beginning of this, corne so failed, that in the citie of London for a while bread was scant, by reason that commissioners appointed to see order taken in shires about, ordeined that none should be conueied out of one shire into another.

Which order had like to haue bred disorder, for that enerie countrie and place was not prouided alike, and namelie London, that maketh his prouision out of other places, felt great inconuenience hereby, till the merchants of the Stiliard, and others out of the Dutch countries, brought such plentie, that it was better cheape in London than in anie other part of England, for the king also releued the citizens in time of their need with a thousand quarters by waie of lone of his owne prouision. The scarcitie at the first was more than the dearth. For in the beginning of their want, wheat was onelie at sixteen shillings a quarter, & from thence it rose to twentie shillings, and after to six and twentie shillings eight pence the quarter, till remedie by outward prouision was procured and had. In this meane while the lord Lautrech with his armie was entred into Italie, where how he sped, and what came of that expedition, we shall find in the histories of France and Italie, and therefore in this place I passe it over. Sir Francis Poins knight, in the end of December, returned out of Spaine into England, leaving Clarceur behind him to bring further answer.

The emperor at the request of this sir Francis Poins, who made the same in name of his maister the king of England, was contented to release twelue articles, which were reputed most preiudiciall to the French king, onelie to gratifie the king of England: but the cardinall kept the king still in displeasure toward the emperor, for the fauour which he bare to the French king, whose onelie purposes he sought to aduance. The articles which were drauene at Amiens when the cardinall was there, were exhibited to the emperor by the French ambassadors, and because because he refused the same, word was sent to Clarenceur king of armes, to make defiance to the emperor. Whereupon on the Wednesday the two and twentieth of Januarie, Guien king of armes to the French king, and Clarenceur king of armes to the king of England, being in the cite of Burges in Spaine, came to the court of Charles the elect emperor, about nine of the clocke in the morning, and there did request of his maiestie, that it would please him to appoint them an houre of audience.

The lord de Chaour by ordinance from his maiestie gave them answer, that it should be about ten of the clocke before none the same daie. And at the same houre his maiestie came into the great hall of his court accompanied with diuerse pzelats, dukes, marquestes, earles, barons, and other great lords and good personages, of diuerse nations of his kingdom and seignories in great number. The emperor sitting in a chaire prepared according to his dignitie, the two kings of armes of France & England being in the nether end of the hall, holding upon their left arms each one his coat of armes, did make three solenne reuerences accustomed, with knee to the ground. And when they were at the lowest staire before his imperiall maiestie, Clarenceur king of armes of England, hauing the words in both their names, spake as followeth.

Sir, following the thre edicts inuolablie kept and obserued by your predecessours emperours of Rome, kings, princes, and capteins, Guien king of armes of the most christened king; and also Clarenceur king of armes to the king of England our soueraigne & naturall lords: we presenting our selues before your sacred maiestie, for to declare certeine things from the said kings our maisters: beseech your maiestie, that haauing regard to the said lawes according to your benignitie and mercie, that it would please you to giue vs sure accesse and good intreating in your countries, lands, and seignories, attending your answer, with sure conduct to returne vnto the countries, lands, and seignories of our said soueraigne lords. The emperor then had them saie on what foucer the kings your maisters haue giuen you in charge: your priuileges shall be kept, none shall do you anie displeasure within my kingdomes or territories. After this, Guien read a writing signed with the hand of the said Guien king of armes.

A copie of the said writing read as followeth.

Sir, the most christened king my soueraigne and naturall lord hath commanded me to saie to you, that he hath conceived a maruelous greife and displeasure of that, that in place of amitie, which he so much desired to haue with you, the former enmitie in full force still remaineth. By the which he seeth and perceiueth, that the evils and inconueniences long since begun, shall continue and augment, not onelie vnto you, and vnto him, with your vassals and subiects, but also vnto all christendome: and that the forces and youths which the one and the other ought to employe against the enemies of the faith, shall be spent to the effusion of christian blood, and in offense vnto God: and that you and he endowd with so manie gracions gifts, shall not inioy the benefits, which it pleased the son of God to leane to vs, by his testament, which is peace, wherof all goodnesse proceedeth; and in place of the same shall haue war, wherof foloweth all calamities, dangers, inconueniences, poverties, and miseries. Wherevnto you shall submit your selfe vnto them whome yee may command, and shall hazard the blood and substance of your subiects in the pursues of strangers. Euerie one as for himselfe ought to haue regard thereto, and for the short time that we haue here to liue, not to go about to depriue himselfe of that tranquillitie, ioy, god regard and pastime, that the princes may haue by peace: and by following the warre, to be in povertie, heauinesse, and hazard of losse of goods, honours, and liues: and that worst is, after they haue had euill daies in this world, to be in danger of eternall paine in the world to come, thorough them that haue bene the cause thereof, and that would not yeld vnto reason.

The king my soueraigne lord is ready to put himselfe for his part in all deuoir, and more than so, to haue peace and amitie with you: and by this means peace shall be procured throughout all christendome, whereby men might do God good seruice, in making warre on the Infidels, which will be so thankfull to him, that it will put off the punishment of faultes, which haue bene committed heretofore by reason of the warres, which haue too long indured betwene you two, and not yet like to cease, considering the termes which you hold and seeke to mainteine, sith on the one part, certeine aduocbing themselves on you, haue assailed and taken by force the cite of Rome, which is the place of the holie and apostolike see, where they haue committed and done all the mischefe that might be deuised.

The churches and reliques were profaned, the pope holding saint Peters seat, as vicar of God on earth, taken and put out of his libertie. By means whereof, they that haue committed and executed the said execrable deeds and wickednesse, with their authors and fauours, be fallen and run in paines of right; and they that hold them captiues, beare themselves on you; and he that doth keepe them, hath bene and is of the principall capteins, of whome you haue bene serued in your warres in Italie and other parts. And on the other side, the difference which at this time resteth betwene you and the king my soueraigne and naturall lord, is principallie vpon the ranfome and recouerie of the princes his sonnes, which you hold for hostages of the same. He hath oftentimes offered, and yet doth offer to paie to you, and giue to you, not onelie that which may be said to be reasonable, and in such cases accustomed, but also more largelie.

You ought not to stand vpon things which by force and constraint he hath promised, the which iustlie and honestlie he maie not performe nor accomplish: you had a great deale more gained, to haue taken the said ranfome which was offered vnto you, than to continue the warre, and to giue occasion of all the evils and inconueniences that daily happen thereby thorough christendome. You see the king of England, with whome he hath brotherlie amitie for euer, and also the Venetians, Florentines, and duke of War, and other princes and potentats, following and holding the partie of the said christian king, for that they see he yeldeth to reason, and by reason you will not thereto incline, the vniuersall peace can not be concluded in christendome. The enemies of the faith gaine countries: all Italie is in armes, blood and rapine, and the apostolical see in trouble: so that if on your part you seeke not reindie, and that things do thus continue as they haue begun, it is to be feared that God will be angrie.

And for as much (sir) as to the declarations which the aboue said princes haue offered vnto you, and the presentations which the said christian king hath made vnto you, you haue refused to giue eare, thereby to come to some accord with him, and to content your selfe with a ranfome more than reasonablie: also for

And of all this he calleth God (who knoweth all things) to witnesse. And for that under colour of the publication of the pretended trette of Madrid made, he being yet prisoner in Spaine, diuerse of your subjects, and of them of the king of England, and of his haue carried their merchandises and other goods into the kingdomes, freights, and seignories the one of the other, whereby maie insue great damages, if of them no mention should be made in this present declaration and signification: my soueraine lord and the said king of England be contented that libertie be giuen unto all subjects being in the said kingdomes, countries, freights, and seignories, to retire and depart from thence with all their goods and merchandises within fortie daies after this intimation made. Prouided that you shall do the like unto their subjects in all & euerie their merchandises. Giuen the eleuenth daie of Nouember 1527, & signed Cuien king of armes.

The emperours words to Cuien the French kings herald.

The emperor after the defiance giuen by Cuien, spake in this sort: I do vnderstand that which you haue read from the king your maister, & I do much maruell why he doth desire me, for he being my prisoner by right warre, and I hauing his faith by reason he can not do it. It is unto me a noueltie to be defied of him, seeing it is six or seuen yeares that he hath warred against me, and yet giuen me no defiance. And sith that by the grace of God I haue defended my selfe from him (as he hath scene, and euerie one else) without that he hath giuen me anie warning, or considering the reason and iustification whereon I do rest my selfe, for the which I thinke I haue not otherwise deserved towards God: I hope that at this time now you aduertise me of it, being aduertised I shall defend my selfe the better, in such sort that the king your maister shall do me no hurt: for sith he doth desire me, I am halfe assured.

How the emperor was affectioned for the pope in his captivity.

And touching that which you spake of the pope, none hath bene more sorrowfull than I of that which was done, and it was without my knowledge or commandement: and that which hath bene done, was done by vntrulle people, without obedience to anie of my captains. And yet I aduertise you, that the pope long since is set at libertie, and yesterday I had certeine newes of it. And touching the sonnes of your maister, he knoweth that I haue them for pledges; and also my lords his ambassadors know well, that the fault hath not lien in me that they haue not bene delivered. And as for that of the king of England my god brother and vnckle, I beleue if it be so as you do say, that he is not well informed of things passed: and if he were, yet could I not saie as your writing containeth, I desire to send him my reasons for to aduertise him of all the truth. And I beleue when he shall know it, that he will be unto me as he hath bene.

The emperor's answer to the king of England's displeasure.

The here bleth an ament from bene rectified to moue the emperor

I neuer denied the monie which I borrowed of him, and I am ready to paie it as by reason & right I am bound: and thanked be God I haue enough to do it. Neuertheless, if he will make warre against me, it will be to my great displeasure, & I cannot but defend my selfe. I praye to God that he giue me no more occasion than I thinke I haue giuen unto him. And to the rest, for that your writing is great, and the paper sheweth it selfe to be gentle, seeing that they haue written what they would, you shall giue me the writing, whereby more particularlie I maie answer in another paper, wherein shall be nothing but truth. This answer being made by his maiestie with his owne mouth unto Cuien king of armes, the said Cuien toke his cote of armes that he had on his left arme (as before is said) and put it on, and then Clarenceur king of armes of England said vnto his maiestie, not by writing, but by mouth, as followeth.

The English heralds message delivered by word of mouth.

It, the king my soueraine lord hath commanded me to say vnto you, that seeing the necessitie of peace in the christian religion, as well by reason of the inforcements manie yeers past, begun by the great Turke enimie vnto our faith, which by force of armes hath taken awaie from the christians the citie and Ile of Rhodes, one of the principall bulwarks of christendome, and in Hungarie the fortress of Belgrad, and part of the cuntry there, as also by heresies and new sects, of late risen in diuerse places of christendome; and likewise knowing the great warres being kindled in all parts, by meanes of which all christendome is in trouble, confusion, and marvellous diuision, and not long since by your people and ministers and souldiers in your armie, and vnder your captains the holie citie of Rome hath bene sacked and robbed, the person of our holie father the pope taken prisoner, and kept by your people, the cardinals likewise taken and put to ransom, the churches robbed, bishops, priests, and people of religion put to the sword, and so manie other evils, cruelties, and innumerable facts committed by your people, that the aire and the land are infected therewith.

The report of the heralds faithfull and irrefragable by Cuien's answer, lib. 18.

And it is verie like, that God is verie greatly stirred and prouoked vnto it. And to speake after the maner of men, if by amendment it be not pacified, innumerable evils and inconueniences shall happen vnto all christendome. And for that the rot and increase of the said warre, proceedeth of the contentions and debates betwene you, and the most christened king his god brother, and perpetuall alie: to make an end of which debates, the king my soueraine lord hath sent his ambassadors and others, vnto the most christened king his god brother, with whom he hath done so much, that for the loue that he hath borne him; he hath made vnto you so great offers, and so reasonable, that you cannot, nor ought reasonable to refuse them, as conditions and offers for his ranfome exceeding the ranfome accustomed of all kings. And if in this, the confideration of peace had not bene, an euill example might thereof grow for other kings and chieffest princes subiect vnto the like fortune.

Of which offers and conditions he hath likewise advertised you by his ambassadours, praised and besought you for the honour of God, and the wealth of all christendome, for the benefits and pleasures that he hath done vnto you diuerse waies; and that in time of your great need, that it would please you to accept the said offers; and make an end of the said warres, that haue so long endured. Likewise as a chastened prince bound to the protection of his pope, and so apostolike, and consequentie, to the deliuerance of his boldnesse (whom you cannot, nor ought to, haue prisoner without great offense) that you would restore his boldnesse vnto a full and entier libertie. Also he hath oftentimes shewed by diuerse obligations, and other means, how you are indebted vnto him in diuerse great summes of monie, that he hath giuen and lent you in your necessitie, requiring you to make payment.

Which offers, and the augmenting of the same, haue bene made and made againe, with all demonstrations and honest reasons that haue bene possible, And in the end there hath bene made vnto you instance for the deliuerie of our holie father, whom you haue restrained or caused to be restrained in place of deliuerie, which is very strange, & against the true estate & dutie of a christian prince. So that the king my soueraigne, & the most christian king his brother, and perpetuall alie, can no longer indure it with their honours and dutie towards God and the church. And seeing you will not condescend to reason, nor accept the said offers being more than reasonable; no; satisfie the king my said soueraigne of the debts by you due, as you are bound, he hath concluded with the said most christian king his good brother & perpetuall alie, & other of his confederats, to doe his endeavour to constrain you by force & might of armes to deliuer our holie father, & likewise the children of France, whom you hold, in pateng you a reasonable ranfome, and to satisfie him of that you owe him.

Therefore the king my Sovereigne lord, as a true and constant prince, willing to keepe inviolable his faith, which he hath promised unto the said chrysian prince, and other his allies, and not willing to leave the person of our said holie father the pope in captivity, as also will not the said chrysian king: they two doe summon you at this time for all, to accept these last offers, for the deliuerance of the said children of France, and for the wealth of an vniuersall peace, & to deliuer the person of our said holie father, & also to paie speedilie and without anie more delaye, the debts by you due unto the king my Sovereigne,

And if you refuse these small offers, and also to deliver the person of our said holie father, and paie the said debtes, as a good christian prince; and lover of peace is bound to do; the king my soueraigne, and the said christian king his good brother, not without great sorrow and displeasure, do declare to be your enemies, and so hereafter do hold and repute you for such one, denouncing vnto you warre by sea and land, and desiring you with all their forces,

10 Herethefore, considering that there be diuers of your subiects, and great quantitie of their goods in the realmes of England and France, and other lands & lordships of the said pincines: likewise there be diuers of the subiects of the kings of England and France; and of their goods in your kingdomes, countreies, lands, and lordships, the which may recieve aswell of the one part as of the other, great and unrecoverable hurts and damages, if without advertisements and monition they should be taken 20 and detained: the kings maiestie my soueraigne, and the most christian king of France his god brother be willing that libertie be giuen vnto your subiects being in their kingdomes, countreies, and lordships, for to retire and depart with all their goods and merchandise, within fourtie daies after this intimation, so that the like libertie and permission be in like sort granted to their subiects. ¶ To this defiance of the king at armes of England the emperours maiestie did answer in these wordes.

The emperours answer to the English heralds oration.

Do vnderstand that which you haue declared, and I cannot thinke that if the king of England were thoroughlie aduertised of things as they haue passed, and of the reason to which I haue yeilded, he woulde not saie that which you haue said, and therefore mine intention is to aduertise him. As to that which you spake of the pope, I was neuer consenting to his destruction, which was neuer done by my commandement: & I giue you to vnderstand, that he is deliuered, and I am sorie for the harmes that were done at the time when he was taken, of the which I take my selfe not to be in fault, as I haue told the king at armes of France, And as to the deliuerance of the French kings sons, where means haue bene made for their deliuerance, I haue bene ready to giue eare thereto, and the fault resteth not in me, for that the peace hath not bene concluded.

But now that you tell me that the king your maister will force me to deliuer them, I will answer thereto in other sort than hitherto I haue done, and I trust to keepe them in such wise, that by force I shall not need to deliuer them: for I am not accustomed to be forced in things which I do. As to the debts which the king of England hath lent me, I haue neuer denied it, neither do I denie it, but am ready to 60 paie it as right requiteth, as I haue caused it to be declared vnto him, and I my selfe haue shewed nolesse to his ambassadors, and deliuered my saying by writing, and I cannot beloeue that for such things (which I refuse not to accomplish) he will make war against me, and if he will so do it will grieue me, but yet I must defend my selfe: and I praye God that the king your maister giue me not greater occasion to make him war, than I haue giuen him. You shall deliuer me in writing, that which you haue said, to the which I will answer by writing particularlie.

This answer made by the emperour to the king of armes Clarenceaur, the said Clarenceaur took his coat of armes, which he had lieng on his left armie.

arme (as before is said) and put it upon him. The emperour herewith commanded him to deliuer by writing into the hands of the lord of Buclans all that he had uttered by word of mouth, as is above exprest. Which Clarenceaur promised to do, so he did afterwards, signed with his owne hand, word for word. Clarenceaur hauing thus done his dutie, incontinentlie withdrew: but before his departure, the lord of Buclans said to him, and also to Guen, these wordes ensuing. Behold here this writing in my hand, containing the articles of the composition betwene the emperour and the pope.

That the pope should be no partie against the emperour, neither in the affaires of Millaine, nor in the kingdome of Naples. That he should accord vnto the emperour the crossade in Spaine, and a tenth of the reuenues ecclesiastike through all his dominions. That to assure the obseruation of these things, Ostia should remaine in the hands of the emperour, and Ciuita Vecchia which Andrea Dore had left to him before. That he should assigne ouer to him Ciuita Castellana, a towne which had refused to receiue the imperials, Pario Perusquo procaro of the like being entred within the rocke by secret commission from the pope, notwithstanding he made semblance of the contrarie. That he should also deliuer ouer to him the rocke of Farlie, and to put into his hands for hostages Hippolito and Alexander his nephues, and till they were come from Parma the emperour to be possessed of the cardinals Pisani, Triulco, and Caddi, whome they led to the reahme of Naples.

Further more, that he should make present payment to the lanceknights of three score thousand ducates, and to the Spaniards thirtie & five thousand. That in so doing they should let him come out at libertie with all the cardinals, and they to go out of Rome and out of the castell, alwaies interpreting to libertie when soeuer they should be conueied in safetie to Vmbetto, Spoleto, or Perousa. That within fiftene daies after his going out of Rome he should paie the like quantitie of monie to the lanceknights, and afterwards the residue within thre moneths to the Spaniards & lanceknights souerlie, according to their shares and portions. Which residue together with the summes paid, amounted to more than three hundred and fiftie thousand ducats.

This is the true copie (said the lord of Buclans) of the capitulation, made touching the deliuerance of the pope, and how he is deliuered, and departed from castell saint Angelo, the tenth of December last past: put it in your relation. The said king of armes answered; We will so do: and so for that time they parted. Here, because mention is made of the popes deliuerance out of prison, it shall not be amisse to set downe the manner thereof as it is reported by Guicciardine. All things hauing their orderlie expedition, & the resolution set downe, that the tenth of December the Spaniards should accompanie him into a place of surterie, he fearing some variation either for the ill mind which he knew don Hugo bare to him, or for anie other accident that might happen, the night before he stole secretlie out of the castell in the closing of the evening, disguised in the attire of a merchant. Lewis de Consaguo who was in the paie of the emperour, taried for him in the medowes with a strong companie of harquebuziers, and with that gard did accompanie him to Montfalcon, where dismissing almost all his bands of footmen, he was led by the same Lewis euen to Vmbetto, into which citie he entred by night without the companie of anie one cardinall. An example worthe of consideration, and perhaps neuer happened since the church was great: that a pope should in that sort fall from so great a puissance and reuerence, his eyes to behold the losse and sacke of Rome, his person to be turned ouer into captiuitie, and his whole estate reduced to the disposing of an other, and within fets moneths after, to be restored & established in his former greatnesse. So great towards princes Christian is the authoritie of the pope, and the respect which mostall men doe beare to him.

At the same instant that the heralds were at the emperours court, the emperour called before him the said Guen king of armes of France, and said to him as followeth. It is reason that you enioy your priuileges, you ought also to do your dutie; and therefore I praye your selfe to be your master, per ceau to his bone person, that which I shall tell you, which is this: that since the libertie of Milan, contrarie to the same, ouer of his subjects haue bene taken going about the it bisnesse, and other also going to serue me in Italie, which haue bene detained prisoners, with intreaties, and by force thrust into the galies; and besides I haue of his subjects the which I might likewise take, ye shall aduertise him, that if he deliuer me some mine, I will deliuer his; if not, as he shall intreat mine, I will intreat his; and that he send me answer hereof within fortie daies: if not, I will take the refusal for an answer.

The king of armes Guen asked if his maiestie ment this concerning the merchants. Wherevnto the emperour answered: This is be like that which is contained in your writing, touching the merchants, to which point (said he) I will answer by writing. And herewith Guen making thre obeisances, said; Sir I will glasse do it. Then said the emperour, Let the king your master further, that I beleue that which hath not bene aduertised of that which I told to his ambassadors in Granada, which toucheth him nere. For I told him in such a case so noble a prince, that if he had understood the same, he would haue made me an answer. Ye shall do well to know it of his ambassador. For by that he shall understand, that I haue kept better faith to him in that I haue promised at Madrid than he to me, and I praye you to tell him, and saile not before. Guen answered, Without doubt sir I will do it: and so making his obeisance he departed.

The emperour appointed John le Alemand the baron of Buclans to see that no displeasure nor trouble speach were vnto the said kings of armes; but that they should be well vsed: which was done to their good contentation. After this, the seauen and twentieth of Januarie, the said kings of armes came to the said lord of Buclans, who by the emperours appointment deliuered an answer vnto either of them in writing, accordinglie as the emperour had promised; the copies thereof are set forth at large in the annales of Aquitaine, and so belesse here omitted. To conclude, the French king toke such displeasure with the emperours answers made vnto his king of armes Guen, whereby he was charged to do otherwise than by his faith giuen he ought to haue done, that the eight and twentieth daie of March being in the citie of Paris, accompanied with a great number of the princes of his blood, cardinals and other prelates and nobles of his realme, and also the ambassadors of diuerse princes and potentates, he called before him Nicholas Wererot lord of Granuelle, vnto whom he said in effect as followeth.

honourable behauiour, which you haue shewed in doing your dutie being here with me, you haue deserved at my hands, sith I must needs saie, ye haue acquit your selfe in euerie behalfe, as well to the honoz of your maister, as god contentation of each man else, so that I am assured the fault resteth not in you, whie things haue not come to better end and purpose than they haue done, for the god zeale and affection, which I haue euer proued in you to the advancement of peace and quieting of things, wherein I doubt not but you haue done your due to the full.

But being informed that your maister the elect emperour, against all right and law, as well diuine as humane, had commanded to be done vnto my ambassadors, and likewise to the other of the league remaining with him, for the furtherance of things toward a peace, and contrarie to all godd custums, which hitherto haue bene obserued betwixt princes, not onelie christians, but also infidels, me thought I could not otherwise do, for the behoufe of mine owne ambassadors, arrested and against reason kept in ward, but to do the same to you, although I had no mind to vse you euill, for the reasons aboue said, for the which, and for the dutie you haue shewed in doing that appertained, I assure you my lord ambassador, that beside that I doubt not but your maister will recompense you for the same, ye may be assured that where particularlie in anie thing I may pleasure you, I will do it with as good a will as you can require me.

And to make answer to that which your maister by word of mouth hath said vnto Guien and Clarenceau kings of armes of the king my god brother and perpetuall and best alie, and of me vpon the intimation of the warre which hath bene made by vs, consisting in eight points, I will that each one vnderstand it. First, as to the which he saith he marvelleth that he hauing me a prisoner by iust warre, and hauing also my faith, I should desie him, and that in reason I neither may nor ought to do it; I answer thereto, that if I were his prisoner here, and that he had my faith, he had spoken true: but I know not that the emperour hath euer at anie time had my faith, that may in anie wise auaille him. For first in what warre so euer I haue bene, I know not that I haue either seene him or encountered with him.

When I was prisoner, garded with foure or fift hundred harquebusers, sicke in my bed, and in danger of death, it was an easie matter to constrain me, but not verie honorable to him that should do it: and after that I returned into France, I know not anie that hath had power to compell me to it: and to do it willingly without constraint, it is a thing which I waie moze, than so lightlie to bind my selfe thereto. And because I will not that my honoz come in disputation, although I know well that euerie man of warre knoweth sufficientlie, that a prisoner garded is not bound to anie faith, nor can bind himselfe thereto in anie thing: I do neuertheless send to your maister this writing signed with mine owne hand, the which my lord ambassador I priaie you read, and afterwards promise me to deliuer it vnto your maister, and not to anie other. And herewith the king caused it to be deliuered to the said ambassador by maister John Robertet, one of the secretaries of the estate, and of his chamber.

The ambassador toke the writing in his hand, and after excused himselfe to the king, saing: That as to him, by the letter which his maister & soveraigne lord had written vnto him now lastlie, his commission was already expired, and that he had no farther commandement nor instructions from his maiestie, but to take leave of the king with as much speed as he might, and to returne home. Which he most humblie besought him to permit him to do, without further charge or commission, although he knew that he was at his commandement, and that he might at his pleasure constrain him, as seemed to him god. Herevnto the king answered; My lord ambassador, sith you will not take vpon you to read this writing, I will cause it to be read in this companie, to the end that euerie one may vnderstand and know that I am clared in that, whereof against truchy he goeth about to accuse me.

Beside that, if you afterwards will not beare it, & deliuer it to him, I will send one of my heralds here present to go in companie with you: for whom you shall procure a good & available safe conduct, that he may passe vnto your maister, protesting & demanding, that an act maie be registred before this companie, that if he will not it should come to his knowledge, that I am discharged, in that I do my best to cause him to vnderstand it accordingly as I ought to do, and in such sort as he can not pretend cause of ignorance. After the king had ended these words, he called to him the said Robertet, and commanded him to reade the said writing with a loud voice, which was done word for word.

The copie of the said writing directed to the emperour.

Francis, by the grace of God, king of France, lord of Genes, &c. To you Charles, by the same grace, chosen emperour of Rome, and king of Spaine. We do you to wit, that being aduertised, that in all the answers that you haue made to our ambassadors and heralds, sent to you for the establishing of peace, in excusing your selfe, without all reason you haue accused vs, saing, that we haue plight you our faith, and that thereupon (besides our promise) we departed out of your hands and power. In defense of our honour, which hereby might be burthened too much against all truth, we thought good to send you this writing; by which we giue you to vnderstand, that notwithstanding that no man being in ward is bound to keepe faith, and that the same might be a sufficient excuse for vs: yet for the satisfieng of all men, and our said honoz (which we mind to keepe, and will keepe, if it please God, vnto the death) that if ye haue charged, or will charge vs, not onelie with our said faith, and deliuerance, but that euer we did anie thing that became not a gentleman that had respect to his honoz; that ye lie fallie in your throat: and as oft as ye saie it, ye lie: and we determine to defend our honoz to the uttermost drop of our blood. Wherefore, seeing ye haue charged vs against all truth, write no moze to vs hereafter: but appoint vs the field, and we will bring you the weapons. Protesting, that if after this declaration ye write into anie place, or vse anie words against our honoz, that the shame of the delaie of the combat shall light on you, seeing that the offering of combat is the end of all writing: Made at our god towne and citie of Paris, the eight and twentieth daie of March.

March. In the pere of our Lord, one thousand five hundred twentie and eight, before Easter. Thus signed. Francis.

This Robertet was one of the secretaries to the estate.

After that Robertet had read this writing there in presence of the emperours ambassadores, the king made further replie unto the points contained in the emperours answers to the defiance: and withall to conclude, told the said ambassadores, that his master the emperour had constrained him by such mes- sage as he had sent to him, to make the answer in truth, which he had made: and further willed him to deliver unto the emperour the writing which he had signed with his hand, and to saie to him, that he took him for so honorable a prince, that considering the matter therewith he charged him, and the answer that he made, he would not faile but to answer him like a gentleman, and not by writing like an advocate. For if he otherwise do (saie the king) I will answer his chancelor by an advocate, and a man of his estate, and a more honest man than he.

Shortlie after, the emperours ambassadores returned home into Spaine in safetie, and well intreated. And uppon their returne, the ambassadores of France were set at libertie, and delivered beyond Frontierabie, & so came safelie home into France. Then a French herald, appointed to accompanie the ambassadour Grandeuill, brought the writing of the combat unto the emperour, because Grandeuill refused to meele with it. So the which the emperour five months after, or thereabouts, sent an answer by one of his heralds; who being arrived at Paris, meant uppon the sudden to present his letters unto the French king. But the king getting intelligence thereof, the tenth of September, sitting within his great hall of his palace at Paris aforesaid, before the table of marble in a roiall seat, addressed and set up for him sixteen steps in height, appointed to give audience to the said herald.

The emperour answered the French kings letters.

What states both native and foreign were present in the French kings hall.

On his right hand sate in chaires the king of Navarre, the duke of Alanson and Berrie, the earle of Foix and Arminacke. And on the same side sate also upon a bench, the duke of Wandosme a pere of France, lieutenant generall, and gouverneur of Picardie, don Hercules de Est, eldest sonne to the duke of Ferrar, duke of Chartres and Montargers, who latelie before had married the ladie Kener, a daughter of France, the duke of Albanie regent and gouverneur of Scotland, the duke of Longueville, great chamberleine of France. And nere to them upon another bench sate the presidents and counsellors of the court of parlement; and behind them manie gentlemen, doctors, and learned men. On the left hand were set in chaires prepared for them, the cardinall Saluarie the popes legat, the cardinall of Bourbon, and duke of Laon, a pere of France, the cardinall of Sens chancelor of France, the cardinall of Lorain, the archbishop of Parbon, the ambassadores of the kings of England and Scotland, of the segniorie of Venice, of Millan, of the Cantons, of the Swisses, and of Florence.

On an other bench sate the bishop of Transilvania, ambassadour for the king of Hungarie, the bishop and duke of Angres, one of the peeres of France, the bishop & earle of Poion, an other of the peeres of France, the archbishop of Lion, primate of all France, the archbishop of Burges primate of Aquitaine, the archbishops of Aux and Rouen, the bishops of Paris, Meaux, Lisieux, Pascon, Limoges, Abbeys, Conserans and Terbe. And behind them sate the masters of the requests, and the counsellors of the great councill. On either side the kings seate stood the earle of Beaumont great master and marshall of France, the lord de Wion admirall of France who stood on either side of the French kings seate lieutenant generall, and gouverneur of Burgognie. And behind the same seate were manie knights of the order, that is to wit, the earle of Laual, lieutenant generall and gouverneur of Britaine, the lord of Pontmerancie, the lord Daubignie capitaine of an hundred lances, and of the Scottish gard, the earle of Brienne, Lignie, and Rouille, the lord of Fleurang, ges marshall of France, the lord of Ruffois, the lord of Cenoilliac great esquier and master of the artillerie of France, Loys monsieur de Cenes, the lord of Hunters, and the earle of Carptle.

Behind them was the earle of Estamps prioness of Paris, and with him manie gentlemen of the kings chamber: among the which was the earle of Lancarull, the lord of Guien, the son of the earle of Rouille, the son of the lord of Fleurang, the lord de la Rochepot, the lord Donartie great master of the waters and forrests, the lord of Lude, the lord of Janlis, the lord de Villebon, ballie of Rouen, the baron of Chateau Poiant, the lord de la Loue, the count de la Potheaugroing, and the lord of Merces. And besides these, the masters and officers of the household & gentlemen waiters, with the more part of the two hundred gentlemen or pensioners, as we terme them. At the entrie into the said thronor or tribunall seat, were the capteins of the garbs, and the prioness of the household. And before the king kneeled the others of the chamber upon the one knee: and at the foot of the step that went up to the kings seate were the prionesses of the merchants and escheins of the towne of Paris. Beneath in the hall (the gates whereof were still open) there was an infinite number of people of all nations: and in presence of them all, the king made this declaration.

The cause wherefore I have made this assemblee, is, for that the emperour elect hath sent to me an herald of armes, who (as I coniecture, and as the same herald hath said, and as his safe conduct importeth) hath brought me letters, patents and autentike, concerning the sacertie of the field for the combat that should be betwixt the said elected emperour and me. And forasmuch as the said herald, under colour to bring the sacertie of the field, may use certeine flacions, dissimulations, or hypocrites, to shift off the matter, whereas I desire expedition, and to have it dispatched out of hand; so that by the same an end of the warres, which have so long continued, may be had, to the ease and comfort of all chistendome, to avoid the effusion of blood, and other mischances which come thereof: I have wished it knowne to all chistendome, to the end that euerie one may understand the truth, from whence procedeth the mischance and the long continuance thereof.

I have also caused this assemblee to be made, to shew that I have not without great cause enterprised such an act; for the right is on my side: and if I should otherwise have done, mine hono: had bene greatlie blemished. A thing which my lords that are of my blood, and other my subiects would have taken in euill part. And knowing the cause of the combat, and my right, they will beare with it, as god and loiall subiects ought to do, trusting by Gods helpe to proceed in such sort therein, that it shall plainelie appere if the right be on my side or not: and how, against truth, I have bene accused for a breaker of my faith, which I would be loth to do, nor at anie time have meant so to do. The kings my predecessours and ancessors, whose pictures are ingrauen and set here in order within this hall, which in their daies have successivelie atchued glorious acts, and greatlie augmented the realme of France, would thinke me unworthie, and not capable to be their successor, if against mine hono: I should suffer my selfe to be charged with such a note, noie by the emperor, and should not defend my person and honoꝝ in the manner and forme accustomed.

And herewith he declared the whole case as it stood. First, how being taken at Pania by fortune of war, he neuer gaue his faith to anie of his enemies, & consenting to be led into Spaine, caused his owne gallies to be made ready to conueie him thither, where at his arrivall, he was committed to ward within the castell of Spadill, garded with a great number of harquebuziers & others. Which unconteous dealing found in the emperor, so much grieved him, that he fell sicke, and laie in danger of death: Whereupon the emperor comming to visit him after his recovery of health, an accord was made betwixt the deputies of the emperor and the ambassadours of the ladie his mother then regent of France: which accord was so unreasonable, that no prince being in libertie would haue consented thereto, noꝝ for his deliuerance haue promised so great a ranfome. Which trette yet they constrained him (as he said) to sweare to performe, being prisoner, against the protestation which he diuerse times had made, yea as yet being sicke, and in danger of reciduation; and so consequentie of death.

After this, he was conueied forth on his iourne home wards, still garded & not set at libertie. And it was told him, that after he came into France, it was conuenient that he should giue his faith; for that it was knowne well enough, that what he did or promised in Spaine, it nothing auailed. And further he remembred not that the emperor had told him at anie time, that if he performed not the contents of the treatie, he would hold him for a breaker of his faith, & though he had, he was not in his libertie to make anie answer. Two things therefore said he in this case are to be considered. One, that the trette was violentlie wꝛong out from them that could not bind his person, and the which (as to the residue) had bene accomplished by his mother, deliuering his sonnes in hollage. The other thing was his pretended faith, on which they can make no ground, sith he was not set at libertie. And herewith he shewed manie reasons, to proue that his enemies could not pretend in right that they had his faith.

Further he said, that in matter of combat there was the assaillant, which ought to giue suertie of the field, and the defendant the weapons. Herewith also he caused a letter to be read, which the emperor had written to maister John de Calumont president of Bourdeaux, the said kings ambassadour in the court of the said emperor: the tenor of which letter imported, that the emperor put the said ambassadour in remembrance of speech which he had uttered to the said ambassadour in Granada, repeating the same in substance as followeth. That the king his maister had done naughtilie in not keeping his faith which he had of him, according to the treatie of Spadill; and if the king would saie the contrarie, I will (said the emperor) mainteine the quarrell with my bodie against his. And these be the same words that I spake to the king your maister in Spadill, that I would hold him for a lewd and haughtie man, if he brake the faith which I had of him, &c.

Then after the said letter had bene read, he caused also his answer made by way of a cartell to be read, the tenor whereof ye haue heard before. That done, he continued his tale, in declaring what order he had obserued to procure the emperor to the combat, without all shifting delaies: so as if the herald now come from the emperor would vse anie talke, other than to deliuer him an authentike writing for suertie of the field, and not obserue the contents of his safe conduct, he meant not to giue him audience. And hereupon was the herald called to come in, and declare his message. Who apparelled in his cote of armes, made his apperance before the king there sitting, accompanied (as ye haue heard) into whose presence the king said.

Herald, dost thou bring the suertie of the field, such one as thy maister, being the assaillant, ought to deliuer unto the defendant, being such a personage as I am? The herald herewith said: Sir, make it please you to giue my licence to do mine office: Then said the king: Giue me the pattent of the field, and saie what thou wilt. The herald beginning his tale, The sacred. Then said the king: Shew me the pattent of the field, for I hold thy maister for so noble a prince, that he hath not sent thee without the suertie of the field, sith I haue demanded it; and thou knowest that thy safe conduct, containeth no lesse but that thou shouldest bring it. The herald answered, that he trusted he had brought that which might content his maiestie.

The king replied & said: Herald, giue me the pattent of the field, giue it me: and if it be sufficient, I will receiue it, and after saie what thou wilt. The herald said he had in commandement not to deliuer it, except he might declare that which he had first to saie. The king said: Thy maister can not giue lawes to vs in France. To conclude he told the herald, that he peraduenture might speake things that his maister would not anouch, and that he had not to deale with him, but with his maister. The herald then required that he might haue licence to depart: which the king granted. And withall the king commanded that it might be registred what had passed in this behalfe, for a testimonie that the fault rested not in him in that he receiued not the pattent. The herald likewise for his discharge, required a copie in writing of that which had passed, and the same was granted.

Thus far haue I ouerpasse the common bounds of my purpose, in speaking so largelie of this matter of combat, because of the rarenes thereof, changing betwixt two so mightie princes, although it came not to the effect of triall. And now to returne to that which folloved further upon the defiance, denounced to the emperor by the two kings of armes, Guen and Clarenceur. Ye shall vnderstand, that the lords and nobilitie, to the number of seuen hundred in whose presence it was giuen, toke it so offeruatiue, that drawing forth their swords, they swaie that the same should be reuenged: for other wise they protested, that the infamie would rebound to them and their heires for ever. Herewith the warre was proclaimed through all Spaine with baners displayed, in which were painted a red sword, with a burning cresset against the French king and his partakers, but not mentioning the king of England by expresse name. But it was recited in the proclamation, that the king of England had menaced and defied the emperor in the French kings quarrell.

Then were the English merchants in Spaine attached, and their goods put in safetie, till it might be knowne how the emperours subiects were ordered in England. Then likewise were all the ships of the emperours subiects here arrested: and in semblable manner all the Englishmen and their goods and ships were arrested by the ladie regent in the low countries. The common people in England much lamented, that warre should arise betwixt the emperor and the king of England, speciallie because the emperours dominions had holpen and releued them with graine in time of their necessitie & want. But chesellie this matter touched merchants which haunted the emperours dominions. Yet at length were those of the low countries set at libertie, and their goods to them deliuered, in fauour of intercourese of merchandise. But so: for much as the Spaniards were still deteined, the ladie regent also deteined the ships and goods of the English merchants though the set their persons at libertie.

The incōmoditie rising of lacke of interest course for traffike.

By this meanes the trade of merchandise was in manner fore-let here in England, and namelie the clothes laie on their hands, whereby the common-wealth suffered great decaye, and great numbers of spinners, carders, tuckers, and such other that lived by clothworking, remained idle, to their great impoverishment. And as this warre was displeasing to the Englishmen, so was it as much or more displeasing to the townes and people of the low countries, & in especiall to the townes of Antwerpe & Barrois, where the marts are kept. So that at length there came ambassadours from the ladie regent, the which associating themselves with don Hugo de Spendoza ambassadour for the emperour, came to the king at Richmond the twentieth and ninth of March, and there moved their sute so effectually, that an abstinence of warre was granted, till time that a further communication might be had: and upon this point letters were sent into Spaine, France, and Flanders, and so this matter continued untill answers were brought from thence againe.

In abstinence of war granted upon sute made to the king of England.

The emperours ambassadours intreated not so earnestly to move the king to haue peace with their master, but the French ambassadours solicited the king as earnestly to enter into the warre against him, and suerly they had the cardinall on their side. But yet the king wisely considering with other of his counsell, what damage should insue thereby unto his subjects, and speciallie to the merchants and clothiers, would not consent so easilie to the purpose of the Frenchmen, though he had twentieth thousand pounds sterling out of France, of yearely pension, to continue friend & alie to the French king. But he protested euer that he would see the realm of France defended to his power, and studie no lesse to haue a peace concluded, which might be as honourable to the French king as to himselfe, and beneficiall unto their people, of whom by warres, might be made both slaughter and bloudshed, which are companions inseparable of battell; as the poet well saith:

Hinc breuiter diua moris aperta via est.

Creation of the earle of Osserie.

On the two and twentieth of Februarie the king created at Windsor sir Piers Butler of Ireland, erle of Osserie, & also a Dutch craire of Arnew chaled a French craire by the Thames from Hargate to the Tower wharfe, and there as they fought sir Edmund Wallingham lieutenant of the Tower perceluing them, called his men together, and entering the ships took both the captiues. The kings counsell took by the matter betwixt them, for the Fleming chalenged the Frenchman as a lawfull prize. An abstinence of the warre was taken in the beginning of this yeare betwixt Flanders, and the countries of Picardie on this side the river of Some to begin the first of Maie & indure till the last of Februarie. By means of this truce all the Englishmen might lawfullie passe into the low countries, but not into Spaine: which was græued the merchants that haunted those parties. It was further agreed, that if no generall peace could be had, during the time of this truce: then all the merchants should haue respit two moneths after to passe into their owne countries with their wares and merchandises in safetie.

A truce and the benefits insuing from the same.

The sweating sicknesse, whereof died both courtiers and others.

In the end of Maie began in the citie of London the disease called the sweating sicknesse, which afterwards infected all places of the realme, and sue manie within five or six houres after they sickened. This sicknesse, for the manner of the taking of the patients, was an occasion of remembering that great sweat which raged in the reigns of this kings grandfather; and happilie men caused the same remedie then used to be renewed. By reason of this sicknesse, the tearme was adiourned, and the circuit of the assises also. There died diuerse in the court of this sicknesse, as sir Francis Poins, which had bene ambassadour in Spaine, and diuerse others. The king for a space remoued almost euerie daie till he came to Tintinhagar, a place of the abbott of saint Albons, and there he with the quene, and a small compaignie about them, remained till the sicknesse was past. In this great mortallitie died sir William Compton knight, and William Carew esquier, which were of the kings private chamber.

A prisoner brake from the sessions hall at Newgate when the sessions was done, which prisoner was brought downe out of Newgate in a basket, he seemed so weake: but now in the end of the sessions he brake thorough the people unto the Greie friers church, and there was kept sir or seauen daies per the thiriffes could speake with him, and then because he would not abjure and aske a crowner, with violence they took him thence, and cast him againe in prison, but the law serued not to hang him.

We heare heard how the people talked a little before the cardinals going ouer into France the last yeare, that the king was told by doctor Longland bishop of Lincoln and others, that his marriage with quene Katharine could not be good nor lawfull. The truth is, that whether this doubt was first moved by the cardinall, or by the said Longland, being the kings confessor, the king was not onelie brought in doubt, whether it was a lawfull marriage or no; but also determined to haue the case examined, cleared, and adiudged by learning, law, and sufficient authoritie. The cardinall verelie was put in most blame for this scruple now cast into the kings conscience, for the hate he bare to the emperour, because he would not grant to him the archbishopricke of Toledo, for the which he was a suer. And therefore he did not onlie procure the king of England to loine in friendship with the French king, but also sought a diuise betwixt the king and the quene, that the king might haue had in marriage the duchesse of Alanson, sister unto the French king; and (as some haue thought) he travelled in that matter with the French king at Amiens, but the duchesse would not giue eare thereunto.

But howsoeuer it came about, that the king was thus troubled in conscience concerning his marriage, this followed, that like a wise & sage prince, to haue the doubt cleared, he called together the best learned of the realme, which were of seuerall opinions. Wherefore he thought to know the truth by indifferent iudges, least peradventure the Spaniards, and other also in fauour of the quene would saie, that his owne subjects were not indifferent iudges in this behalfe. And therefore he wrote his cause to Rome, and also sent to all the vniuersities in Italie and France, and to the great clearkes of all christendome, to know their opinions, and desired the court of Rome to send into his realme a legat, which should be indifferent, and of a great and profound iudgement, to heare the cause debated. At whose request the whole consistorie of the college of Rome sent thither Laurence Campeius, a priest cardinall, a man of great wit and experience, which was sent hither before in the tenth yeare of this king, as we haue heard, and with him was ioined in commission the cardinall of Porke and legat of England.

This cardinall came to London in October, and did intimate both to the king & quene the cause of his coming: which being knowne, great talke was had thereof. The archbishop of Cantuarbie sent for the famous doctors of both the vniuersities to Lambeth, Sir William Compton knight, and William Carew esquier, which were of the kings private chamber.

both, and there were euerie daie disputations and comminings of this matter. And because the king meant nothing but vprightlie therein, and knew well that the quene was somewhat wedded to hir owne opinion, and wished that he should do nothing without counsell, he had hir chose the best clearks of his realme to be of hir counsell, and licenced them to do the best on hir part that they could, according to the truth. Then the elected William Warham archbishop of Canturburie, and Nicholas Westbischop of Ebie, doctors of the lawes; and John Fisher bishop of Rochester, and Henrie Standish bishop of saint Asaph, doctors of diuinitie, and manie other doctors and well learned men, which for suertie like men of great learning defended hir cause, as farre as learning might mainteine and hold it vp.

This yere was sir James Spenser maio: of London, in whose time the watch in London on whilsummer night was laid downe. About this time the king receiued into fauour doctor Stephan Cardiner, whose seruice he vsed in matters of great secrecie and weight, admitting him in the roome of doctor Pace, the which being continuallie abroad in ambassages, and the same oftentimes not much necessarie, by the cardinals appointment, at length he toke such græfe there with, that he fell out of his right wits. The place where the cardinals should sit to heare the cause of matrimonie betwixt the king and the quene, was ordeined to be at the Blacke friers in London, where in the great hall was preparation made of seats, tables, and other furniture, according to such a solemne session and roiall apparance.
 The court was platted in tables and benches in manner of a confessorie, one seat raised higher for the iudges to sit in. When as it were in the midst of the said iudges aloft above them thre degræs high, was a cloth of estate hanged, with a chaire roiall vnder the same, wherein sat the king; and besides him, some distance from him sat the quene, and vnder the iudges feet sat the scribes and other officers: the chiefe scribe was doctor Stæuens, and the caller of the court was one Cooke of Winchester.

Then before the king and the iudges within the court sat the archbishop of Canturburie Warham, and all the other bishops. Then stood at both ends within the counsellors learned in the spirituall lawes, as well the kings as the quenes. The doctors of law for the king (whose names yee haue heard before) had their conuenient roimes. Thus was the court furnished. The iudges commanded silence thilke their commission was read, both to the court and to the people assembled. That done the scribes commanded the crier to call the king by the name of king Henrie of England, come into the court, &c. With that the king answered and said, Here. Then called he the quene by the name of Katharine quene of England come into the court, &c. Who made no answer, but rose out of hir chaire.

And because she could not come to the king directly, for the distance seuered betwene them, she went about by the court, and came to the king, kneeling downe at his feet, to whom she said in effect as followeth: Sir (quoth she) I desire you to doe me iustice and right, and take some pittie vpon me, for I am a poore woman, and a stranger, bozne out of your dominion, hauing here no indifferent counsell, & lesse assurance of friendship. Alas sir, what haue I offended you, or what occasion of displeasure haue I met ed you, intending thus to put me from you after this sort: I take God to my iudge, I haue bene to you a true & humble wife, euer conformable to your will and pleasure, that neuer contraried or gaine said any thing thereof, and being alwaies contented with all things wherein you had any delight, whether little or much, without grudge or displeasure, I loued for your sake all them whom you loued, whether they were my friends or enemies.

I haue bene your wife these twentie yeaeres and moze, & you haue had by me diuerse children. If there be anie iust cause that you can alleage against me, either of dishonestie, or matter lawfull to put me from you; I am content to depart to my shame and rebuke; and if there be none, then I pæle you to let me haue iustice at your hand. The king your father was in his time of excellent wit, and the king of Spaine my father Ferdinando was reckoned one of the wisest princes that reigned in Spaine manie yeaeres before. It is not to be doubted, but that they had gathered as wise counsellors vnto them of euerie realme, as to their wisedomes they thought meet, who deemed the marriage betwene you and me good and lawfull, &c. Therefore, I humbly desire you to spare me, vntill I may know what counsell my friends in Spaine will aduertise me to take, and if you will not, then your pleasure be fulfilled. With that she arose vp, making a lowe curtelle to the king, and departed from thence.

The king being aduertised that she was readie to go out of the house, commanded the crier to call hir againe, who called hir by these wordes: Katharine quene of England, come into the court. With that (quoth maister Griffith) Madame, you be called againe. On (quoth she) it maketh no matter, I will not tarrie, go on your waies. And thus she departed, without anie further answer at that time, or anie other, and neuer would appeare after in anie court.
 The king perceiuing she was departed, said these wordes in effect: For as much (quoth he) as the quene is gone, I will in hir absence declare to you all, that she hath bene to me as true, as obedient, and as conformable a wife, as I would wish or desire. She hath all the vertuous qualities that ought to be in a woman of hir dignitie, or in anie other of a baser estate, she is also surelie a noble woman bozne, hir conditions will well declare the same.

With that quoth Wolseye the cardmall: Sir, I most humbly require your highnesse, to declare before all this audience, whether I haue bene the chiefe and first mouer of this matter vnto your maiestie or no, for I am greatlie suspected herein. My lord cardmall (quoth the king) I can well excuse you in this matter, marrie (quoth he) you haue bene rather against me in the tempting hereof, than a setter forward or mouer of the same. The speciall cause that moued me vnto this matter, was a certeine scrupu-lositie that picked my conscience, vpon certeine wordes spoken at a time when it was, by the bishop of Baion the French ambassado: who had bene hither sent, vpon the debating of a marriage to be concluded betwene our daughter the ladie Marie, and the duke of Orleans, second son to the king of France.

Vpon the resolution and determination whereof, he desired respite to aduertise the king his maister thereof, whether our daughter Marie should be legitimate in respect of this my marriage with this woman, being sometimes my brothers wife. Which wordes once concluded within the secret bottom of my conscience, ingendered such a scrupulous doubt, that my conscience was incontinentlie accombed, vexed, and disquieted; whereby I thought my selfe to be greatlie in danger of Gods indignation. Which appeared to be (as me seemed) the rather, for that he sent vs no (true male; and all such (false male as my said wife had by me, died incontinent after they came into the world, so that I doubted the great displeasure of God in that behalfe.

Thus my conscience being tossed in the waues of a scrupulous mind, and partlie in despair to haue great griefe vnto the cardinall, as he that perceiued aforehand, that the king would marie the said gentlewoman, if the diuorſe took place. Therefore he began with all diligence to disappoint that match, which by reason of the misliking that he had to the woman, he iudged ought to be auoided more than present death. While the matter stood in this state, and that the cause of the queene was to be heard and iudged at Rome, by reason of the appeale which by him was put in: the cardinall required the pope by letters and secret messengers, that in anie wise he should defer the iudgement of the diuorſe, till he might frame the kings mind to his purpose.

Howbeit he went about nothing so secretlie, but that the same came to the kings knowledge, who took so high displeasure with such his cloaked dissimulation, that he determined to abase his degree, sith as an unthankfull person he forgot himselfe and his dutie towards him that had so highlie advanced him to all honor and dignitie. When the nobles of the realme perceiued the cardinall to be in displeasure, they began to accuse him of such offenses as they knew might be poued against him, and thereof they made a booke containing certeine articles, to which diuerſe of the kings counsell set their hands. The king vnderstanding more plainlie by those articles, the great pride, presumption, and conuolousness of the cardinall, was soe moued against him; but yet kept his purpose secret for a while. Shortlie after, a parlement was called to begin at Westminster the third of Nouember next ensuing.

In the meane time the king, being informed that all those things that the cardinall had done by his power legantine within this realme, were in the case of the premonition and prouision, caused his attorney Christopher Hales to sue out a writ of premonition against him, in the which he licenced him to make his attorney. And further, the fourteenth of Nouember the king sent the two dukes of Norfolk and Suffolke to the cardinals place at Westminster, who (went as they were commanded) and finding the cardinall there, they declared that the kings pleasure was that he should surrender by the great seale into their hands, and to depart simple vnto Ather, which was an house situate nigh vnto Hampton court, belonging to the bishopricke of Winchester. The cardinall demanded of them their commission that gaue them such authoritie, who answered againe, that they were sufficient commissioners, and had authoritie to doe no lesse by the kings mouth. Notwithstanding, he would in no wise agree in that behalfe, without further knowledge of their authoritie, saying; that the great seale was deliuered him by the kings person, to introy the ministrati- on thereof, with the roome of the chancelor for the terme of his life. Whereof for his fault he had the kings letters patents.

This matter was greatlie debated betwene them with manie great words, in so much that the dukes were faine to depart againe without their purpose, and rode to Windsor to the king, and made report accordingly; but the next daie they returned againe, bringing with them the kings letters. When the cardinall deliuered vnto them the great seale, and was content to depart simple, taking with him nothing but onelie certeine prouision for his house: and after long talke betwene him and the dukes, they departed with the great seale of England, and brought the same to the king. When the cardinall called all his officers before him, and took account of them for all such stuffe, whereof they had charge. And in his gallerie were set diuerſe tables, whereupon lay a great number of goodlie rich stuffe, as whole peeces of silke of all colours, velvet, sattin, damaske, taffata, gro-graine, and other things. Also, there lay a thousand peeces of fine Holland cloth.

There was laid on euerie table, bookes reporting the contents of the same, and so was there inventories of all things in order against the kings coming. He caused to be hanged the walles of the gallerie on the one side with cloth of gold, cloth of tiffine, cloth of siluer, and rich cloth of bodken of diuerſe colours. On the other side were hanged the richest suite of coapes of his owne prouision made for his colleges of Oxford and Ipswich, that euer were seene in England. Then had he two chambers adjoining to the gallerie, the one most commonlie called the gilt chamber, and the other the counsell chamber, wherein were set by two broad and long tables vpon trestles, whereupon was set such a number of plate of all sorts, as was almost incredible.

In the gilt chamber were set out vpon the table nothing but gilt plate, and vpon a cupbord and in a window was set no plate but gold, verie rich: and in the counsell chamber was all white and parcell gilt plate, and vnder the table in baskets was all old broken siluer plate, and bookes set by them purporting euerie kind of plate, and euerie parcell, with the contents of the ounces thereof. Thus were all things prepared, giuing charge of all the said stuffe, with all other remaining in euerie office, to be deliuered to the king, to make answer to their charge: for the order was such, that euerie officer was charged with the receipt of the stuffe belonging to his office by indenture. So Sir William Calcoigne, being his treasurer, he gaue the charge of the deliuerie of the said goods, and therewithall, with his traine of gentlemen and yeomen, he took his barge at the priuie staires, and so went by water vnto Putnicie, where when he was arrived, he took his mule, and euerie man took their horses, and rode straight to Ather, where he and his familie continued the space of three or foure weekes, without either beds, sheets, table cloths, or dishes to eat their meat in, or therewith to buie any: the cardinall was forced to borrow of the bishop of Carleill, plate and dishes, &c.]

After this, in the kings bench his matter for the premonition, being called vpon, two attorneys, which he had authorized by his warrant signed with his owne hand, confessed the action, and so had iudgement to forfeit all his lands, tenements, goods, and cattels, and to be out of the kings protection: but the king of his clemencie sent to him a sufficient protection, and left to him the bishopricks of Poike and Winchester, with plate and stuffe conuenient for his degree. The bishopricke of Duresme was giuen to doctor Tunstall bishop of London, and the abbacie of saint Albons to the prior of Poike. Also the bishopricke of London being now void, was bestowed on doctor Stokesleie, then ambassadour to the universities beyond the sea for the kings marriage.

The ladie Margaret duchesse of Saroy aunt to the emperor, and the ladie Lois dutchesse of Angolesme mother to the French king, met at Cambzeie in the beginning of the moneth of June, to treat of a peace, where were present doctor Tunstall bishop of London, and sir Thomas More then chancelor of the duchie of Lancaster, commissioners for the king of England. At length through diligence of the said ladies a peace was concluded betwixt the emperor, the pope, and the kings of England and France. All these met there in the beginning of Iulie, accompanied with diuerſe great princes and counsellors, on euerie part. And after long debating on both sides, there was a good conclusion taken the fift daie of August. In the which was concluded, that the treatie of Madrid should stand in his full strength and vertue, saving the third and fourth, and the eleuenth and fourteenth.

15 Item, that the duchesse of Wandosme, and Lois earle of Hauers, should haue all such right and actions, as they should haue had before the warre began.

In the emperours countries, when all things were writtten, sealed, and finished, there was a solemne masse song in the cathedrall church of Cambzeie, the two ladies ambassadors of the king of England, sitting in great estate: and after masse the peace was proclaimed betwene the three princes, and Te Deum song, and monie cast to the people, and great fires made through the citie. The same night the French king came into Cambzeie, well and noble accompanied, and saluted the ladies, and to them made diuerse bankets: and then all persons departed into their countrie, glad of this concord. This peace was called the womens peace, for because that notwithstanding this conclusion, yet neither the emperor trusted the French king, nor he neither trusted nor loued him, and their subjects were in the same case. This proclamation was proclaimed solemnelie by heralds with trumpets in the citie of London, which

For during the wars, merchants were euill handled on both parties, which caused them to be desirous of peace. On the foure & twentieth of Nouember, was sir Thomas More made lord chancelor, & the next day led to the Chancery by the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolke, and there swoorne.

At the daie appointed the parlement began, on which daie the king came by water to his place of Whitehall, and there he and his nobles put on their robes of parlement, and so came to the Blache friers church, where a masse of the Holie-ghost was solemnelie song by the kings chappell: and after the masse, the king with all the lords of parlement and commons, which were summoned to appeare at that daie, came into the parlement chamber, where the king sate in his throne or seat of roiall: and sir Thomas More his chancelor, standing on the right hand of the king behind the barre, made an eloquent oration.

In this oration he declared, that like as a god shepheard, which not alonelic keepeth and attendeth well his shepe, but also foreseth and prouideth for all things which either may be hurtfull or noisome to his flocke, or maie preserue and defend the same against all perils that may chance to come: so the king which was the shepheard, ruler and gouernour of his realme, bigilantlie foresaw things to come, considered how diuers lawes before this time were made, not by long continuance of time and mutation of things, verie insufficient and vnperfect: and also by the fraile condition of man, diuerse new enenities were sprong amongst the people, for the which no law was yet made to reforme the same. Which was the verie cause whie at that time the king had summoned his high court of parlement. And he resembled the king to a shepheard or hearde man for this cause: for if a prince be compared to his riches, he is but a rich man; if a prince be compared to his honour, he is but an honourable man: but compare him to the multitude of his people, and the number of his flocke, then he is a ruler, a gouernour of might & puissance, so that his people maketh him a prince, as of the multitude of shepe cometh the name of a shepheard. And as you see that amongst a great sort of shepe some be rotten & faultie, which the god shepheard sendeth from the god shepe: so the great wonder which is of late fallen (as you all know) so craftie lie, so scabbedlie, yea and so vntrulie sugled with the king, that all men must needes ghesse and thinke, that he thought in himselfe that he had no wit to perceiue his craftie doing; or else that he presumed that the king would not see nor know his fraudulent sugling and attempts. But he was deceived: for his graces sight was so quicke and penetrable, that he saw him, yea and saw through him, both within and without, so that all things to him was open, and according to his desert he hath had a gentle correction. Which small punishment the king will not to be an example to other offenders, but clearelie declareth, that whosoever hereafter shall make like attempt, or commit like offense, shall not escape with like punishment. And because you of the common house be a grosse multitude, and can not speake all at one time: therefore the kings pleasure is, that you shall resort to the nether house, & there amongst your selues, according to the old and ancient custome, to chouse an able person to be your common mouth and speaker: and after your election so made, to aduertise his grace thereof, which will declare to you his pleasure, what day he will haue him present in this place. After this done, the commons resorted to the nether house.

house, and they chose for their speaker Thomas Aud-leic esquier, and attourneie of the duchie of Lancaster: and the same daie was the parlement adioyned to Westminster.

On the first daie of the same moneth, the king came to the parlement chamber, and all the lords in their robes. And there the commons of the nether house presented their speaker, which there made an eloquent oration, which consisted in two points. The first point was, that he much praised the king for his equitie and iustice, mixed with mercie and pitie, so that none offense was forgotten and left unpunished, nor in the punishment the extremitie no; the rigor of the law cruellie extended: which should be a cause to bryde all men from doing like offenses, and also a comfort to offenders to confesse their crime and offense, and an occasion of amendment and reconciliation. The second point was, that he disabled himselfe both for lacke of wit, learning, and discretion to so high an office, beseeching the king to cause his commons to resort eiesones to their common house, and there to chose an other speaker for that parlement.

To this the king (by the mouth of the lord chancellor) answered, that where he disabled himselfe in wit and learning, his owne orate oration there made testified the contrarie. And as touching his discretion and other qualities, the king himselfe had well knowen him and his doings since he was in his service, to be both wise and discret: and so for an able man he accepted him, and for the speaker he him admitted. When the commons were assembled in the nether house, they began to commune of their griefes, wherewith the spiritualtie had before time greivously oppressed them, both contrarie to the law of the realme, and contrarie to all right: and in spe-ciallie they were moued with six great causes.

The first for the excessive fines, which the ordinaries toke for probats of testaments, in somuch that sir Henrie Guilford knight of the garter, and control-lor of the kings house, declared in the open parlement on his fidelitie, that he and others being executors to sir William Compton knight, paid for the probat of his will to the cardinall and the archbishop of Canturburie a thousand markes sterling. After this declaration were shewed to manie extortions done by ordinaries for probats of willes, that it were too much to rehearse.

The second was the great polling and extream eration, which the spirituall men used in taking of corps, presents, or mortuaries. For the children of the defunct should all die for hunger, and go a begging, rather than they would of charitie giue to them the litle coin which the dead man owght, if he had but onlie one; such was the charitie then.

The third cause was, that priests being suruisors, Stewards and officers to bishops, abbats, and other spirituall heads, had and occupied farmes, granges, and grasing in euerie countrie, so that the poore husbandmen could haue nothing but of them; and yet for that they should paie deerie.

The fourth cause was, that abbats, priors, and spirituall men kept tan-houses, and bought and sold wall, cloth, and all maner of merchandize, as other temporall merchants did.

The fifth cause was, because that spirituall persons promoted to great benefices, and hauing their liuings of their flocke, were lieng in the court in lords houses, and toke all of the parishioners, and nothing spent on them at all: so that for lacke of residence both the poore of the parish lacked refreshing, and vniuersallie all the parishioners lacked preaching and true instruction of Gods word, to the great perill of their soules.

The first cause was, to see one priest little learned, to haue ten or twelue benefices, & to be resident vpon none; and to know manie well learned scholars in the vniuersities, which were able to preach & teach, to haue neither benefice nor exhibition.

These things before this time might in no wise be touched, nor yet talked of by anie man, except he would be made an heretike, or lese all that he had.
For the bishops were chancellors, and had all the rule about the king, so that no man durst once presume to attempt anie thing contrarie to their profit or commoditie. But now, when God had illuminated the eyes of the king, and that their subtilie doings were once espied; then men began charitably to desire a reformation: and so at this parlement men began to shew their grudges. Whereupon the burgeses of the parlement appointed such as were learned in the law, being of the common house, to draw one bill of the probats of testaments, another for mortuaries, and the third for non residence, pluralities, and taking of farmes by spirituall men. The learned men toke much paines, and first set forth the bill of mor-tuaries; which passed the common house, and was sent vp to the lords. To this bill the spirituall lords made a faire face, saing: that suerlie priests and curats toke more than they should, and therefore it were well done to take some reasonable order: thus they spake, because it touched them little.

But within two daies after was sent vp the bill concerning probats of testaments; at the which the archbishop of Canturburie in especiall, and all other bishops in generall both frowned and grunted, for that touched their profit. In somuch as doctor John Fisher bishop of Rochester said openlie in the parlement chamber these words: My lords, you see daily what billes come hither from the common house, and all is to the destruction of the church. For Gods sake see what a realme the kingdome of Boheme was; and when the church went downe, then fell the glorie of the kingdome: now with the commons is nothing but downe with the church; and all this mesemeth is for lacke of faith onlie. When these words were reported to the commons of the nether house, that the bishop should saie, that all their doings were for lacke of faith, they toke the matter greivouslie, for they imagined that the bishop esteemed them as heretikes, and so by his slanderous words would haue perswaded the temporall lords, to haue restrained their consent from the said two billes, which they before had passed, as you haue heard before.

Wherefore the commons, after long debate, determined to send the speaker of the parlement to the kings highnesse, with a greivous complaint against the bishop of Rochester. And so on a daie, when the king was at leasure, Thomas Audleic speaker for the commons, and thirtie of the chiefe of the common house, came to the kings presence in his palace at Westminster, which before was called Porce place; and there verie eloquentlie declared what a dishonor to the king and the realme it was, to saie, that they which were elected for the wisest men of all the shires, cities, and boroughs, within the realme of England, should be declared, in so noble and open presence, to lacke faith: which was equiualent to saie, that they were infidels, and no christians, as ill as Turkes, or Saracens, so that what paine or studie neuer they toke for the common wealth, or what acts or lawes fouer they made or stablished, should be taken as lawes made by Painims and heathen people, and not worthe to be kept by christian men. Wherefore he most humbly besought the kings highnesse to call the said bishop before him, and to cause him to speake more discretlie of such a number as was in the common house.

The king was not well contented with the saying of the bishop, yet he gentlie answered the speaker, that he would send for the bishop, and send them word what answer he made, and so they departed againe. After this the king sent for the archbishop of Canturburie and six other bishops, and for the bishop of Rochester also, and there declared to him the grudge of the commons; to the which the bishop answered, that he meant the doings of the Bohemians was for lacke of faith, and not the doings of them that were in the common house. Which saying was confirmed by the bishops being present, who had him in great reputation: and so by that onelie saying the king accepted his excuse, and thereof sent word to the commons by sir William Fitz Williams knight, treasurer of his household; which blind excuse pleased the commons nothing at all. After diuerse assemblies were kept betwene certeine of the lords, and certeine of the commons, for the billes of probats of testaments, and the mortuaries; the temporallie laid to the spiritualtie their owne lawes and constitutions; and the spiritualtie soze defended them by prescription & vsage, to whom this answer was made by a gentleman of Greies inne: The vs-age hath euer bene of theues to rob on Shroeters hill, ergo is it lawfull?

With this answer the spiritual men were soze offended, because their doings were called robberies.
But the temporall men stood still by their sayings, inasmuch that the said gentleman said to the archbishop of Canturburie, that both the exaction of pro-bats of testaments, and the taking of mortuaries, as they were used, were open robberie and theft. After long disputation, the temporall lords began to leane to the commons: but for all that the billes remained unconcluded for a while. In the meane season, there was a bill assented to by the lords, and sent downe to the commons: the effect whereof was, that the whole realme by the said act did release to the king, all such summes of monie as he had borrowed of them at the loane, in the fiftenth yeare of his reigne (as you haue heard before.) This bill was soze argued in the common house, but the most part of the commons were the kings seruants, and the other were so laboured to by other, that the bill was assented unto.

When this release of the loane was knowen to the commons of the realme, Lord so they grudged & spake ill of the whole parliament. For almost euerie man counted it his debt, and reckoned suerlie of the payment of the same. And therefore some made their willes of the same, and some other did set it ouer to other for debt, and so manie men had losse by it, which caused them soze to murmur, but there was no reme-die. The king like a good and discret prince, seeing that his commons in the parlement house had released the loane, intending somewhat to requite the same, granted to them a generall pardon of all offences; certeine great offenses and debts onelie excepted: also he aided them for the redresse of their grievances against the spiritualtie, and caused two new billes to be made indifferentlie, both for the probats of testaments and mortuaries; which billes were so reasonable, that the spiritual lords assented to them all, though they were soze against there mindes, & in especiall the probats of testaments soze displeased the bishops, and the mortuaries soze displeased the parsons and vicars.

After these acts thus agreed, the commons made another act for pluralities of benefices, non residence, being selling and taking of farmes by spirituall persons. Which act so displeased the spiritualtie, that the priests railed on the commons of the common house, and called them heretikes and schisma-tikes, for the which diuerse priests were punished.

This act was soze debated about in the parlement chamber, and the lords spirituall would in no wise consent. Wherefore the king perceiuing the grudge of his commons, caused eight lords and eight of his commons to meet in the Star chamber at an after none, and there was soze debating of the cause, in somuch that the temporall lords of the upper house, which were there, took part with the commons, against the spiritual lords; and by force of reason caused them to assent to the bill with a little qualific-ing. Which bill the next daie was wholie agreed to in the lords house, to the great reioicing of the laie people, and to the great displeasure of the spiritual persons.
During this parlement was brought downe to the commons the booke of articles, which the lords had put to the king against the cardinal, the chiefe wher-of were these.

1 First, that he without the kings assent had procured to be a legat, by reason whereof he took awaie the right of all bishops and spiritual persons.

2 Item, in all writings which he wrote to Rome, or anie other forren prince, he wrote Ego Rex meus, I and my king: as who would saie, that the king were his seruant.

3 Item, that he hath slandered the church of England in the court of Rome. For his suggestion to be legat was to reforme the church of England, which (as he wrote) was Facta in reprobam sensum.

4 Item, he without the kings assent carried the kings great seale with him into Flanders, when he was sent ambassado; to the emperor.

5 Item, he without the kings assent, sent a commission to sir Gregorie de Cassado, knight, to conclude a league betwene the king & the duke of Fer-rar, without the kings knowlege.

6 Item, that he hauing the French pockes presented to come and breath on the king.

7 Item, that he caused the cardinals hat to be put on the kings coine.

8 Item, that he would not suffer the kings clerke of the market to sit at saint Albons.

9 Item, that he had sent innumerable substance to Rome, for the obtaining of his dignities, to the great impouerishment of the realme.

These articles, with manie more, read in the common house, and signed with the cardinals hand, was confessed by him. And also there was shewed a writ-ting sealed with his seale, by the which he gaue to the king all his moueables and immoueables. On the date of the Conception of our ladie, the king at Porke place at Westminster, in the parlement time, created the vicount Rochford erle of Wilshire, and the vicount Fitz Water was created earle of Suffex, and the lord Hastings was created earle of Huntington. When, all things were concluded in the parlement house, the king came to the parlement chamber the 17 daie of December, and there put his roiall assent to all things done by the lords and commons, and so proroged his court of parlement till the next yeare. After the parlement was thus ended, the king removed to Greenwich, and there kept his Christmasse with the queene in great triumph: with great plentie of viands, and diuerse disguisings and enterludes, to the great reioicing of his people.

The king, which all this while, since the doubt was moued touching his marriage, abstained from the queenes bed, was now aduertised by his ambassadors, whom he had sent to diuerse vniuersities for the aboluing of his doubt, that the said vniuersities were agreed, and clereslie concluded, that the one brother might not by Gods law marrie the other brothers wife, carnallie knowen by the first marriage, in anie wise dispense with the same. For ye must understand, that amongst other things alleged for dispense of the marriage to be lawfull, euendence was giuen of certeine words, which prince Arthur spake the morrow after he was first married to the quene, whereby it was gathered, that he knew his carnallie the night then passed. The words were these, as we find them in the chronicle of master Edward Hall.

In the morning after he was risen from the bed, in which he had laine with hir all night, he called for drinke, which he before time was not accustomed to do. At which thing, one of his chamberleines maruellling, required the cause of his drought. To whom he answered merilie, sateng; I haue this night bene in the midst of Spaine, which is a hot region, and that iourne maketh me so drie: and if thou haddest bene vnder that hot climat, thou wouldest haue bene drier than I. Again, it was alleged, that after the death of prince Arthur, the king was deferred from the title and creation of prince of Wales almost halfe a yeare, which thing could not haue bene doubted, if he had not bene carnallie known. Also the king caused a bull to be purchased, in the which were these words resforan cogniam, that is, and peraduenture carnallie known: which words were not in the first bull granted by pope Iulie at his second marriage to the king, which second bull with that clause was onelic purchased to dispense with the second matrimonie, although there were carnall copulation before, which bull needed not to haue bene purchased, if there had bene no carnall copulation, for then the first bull had bene sufficient. To conclude, when these & other matters were laid forth to proue that which she denied, the carnall copulation betwixt hir and prince Arthur, his counsellors left that matter, and fell to persuasions of naturall reason. And lastlie, when nothing else would serue, they stood stille in the appeale to the pope, and in the dispensation purchased from the court of Rome, so that the matter was thus shifted off, and no end likelie to be had therein.

The king therefore understanding now that the emperor and the pope were appointed to meet at the citie of Bononie alias Bologna, where the emperor should be crowned, sent thither in ambassage from him the earle of Wilshire, doctor Stokessleie, elected bishop of London, and his almoner doctor Edward Lee, to declare both vnto the pope and emperor, the law of God, the determinations of vniuersities in the case of his marriage, and to require the pope to do iustice according to truth, and also to shew to the emperor, that the king did moue this matter onelic for discharge of his conscience, and not for anie other respect of pleasure or displeasure earthlie. These ambassadours comming to Bononie were honorablie receiued, and first doing their message to the pope, had answer of him, that he would heare the matter disputed when he came to Rome, and according to right he would do iustice.

The emperor answered, that he in no wise would be against the lawes of God, & if the court of Rome woulde iudge that the matrimonie was not good, he could be content: but he solicited both the pope and cardinals, to stand by the dispensation, which he thought to be of force enough to proue the marriage lawfull. With these answers the ambassadours departed and returned homeward, till they came on this side the mounteins, and then receiued letters from the king, which appointed the earle of Wilshire to go in ambassage to the French king which then laie at Bourdeaux, making gift for monie for redeming of his children: and the bishop of London, was appointed to go to Padua, and other vniuersities in Italie, to know their full resolutions and determinate opinions in the kings case of matrimonie: and the kings almoner was commanded to returne home into England, and so he did.

¶ You haue heard before how the cardinal was attainted in the premonstratens, and how he was put out of the office of the chancelor, & laie at Ather. In this Lent season the king by the aduise of his counsell licensed him to go into his diocesse of Yorke, & gaue him commandement to keepe him in his diocesse, and not to returne southward without the kings speciall licence in writting. So he made great provision to go northward, and a parcelled his seruants newlie, and bought manie costlie things for his household: and so he might well enough, for he had of the kings gentleness the bishopricks of Yorke and Winchester, which were no small things. But at this time diuerse of his seruants departed from him to the kings seruice, and in especial Thomas Crumwell one of his chiefe counsell, and chiefe doer for him in the suppression of abbeies. After that all things necessarie for his iourne were prepared, he took his waie northward till he came to Southwell, which is in his diocesse, and there he continued this yeare, euer grudging at his fall, as you shall heare hereafter. But the lands which he had giuen to his colleges in Oxford and Ipswich, were now come to the kings hands, by his atteindor in the premonstratens: and yet the king of his gentleness and for fauour that he bare to good learning, erected againe the college in Oxford, and where it was named the cardinals college, he called it the kings college, & indowd it with faire possessions, and put in new statutes and ordinances. And for bicause the college of Ipswich was thought to be nothing profitable, therefore he left that dissolved.

In this yeare the emperor gaue to the lord master of saint Iohnes of Ierusalem, and his brethren the Island of Malta lieng betwene Sicill and Barbary, there to imploye themselves vpon Chyfts enemies, which lord master had no place sure to inhabit there, since he was put fro the Rhodes by the Turke that besieged Vienna, but missed of his expectation. For the chyftians defended the same so valiantlie against the said Turke and his power, that he lost manie of his men by slaughter; manie also miscaried by sicknesse and cold: so that there perished in all to the number of fourescore thousand men, as one of his bassats did afterwarde confesse, which was to him a great displeasure; and in especiallie bicause he neuer besieged citie before, but either it was yielded or taken. In the time of this siege a metrichian did make these two verses in memorie of the same:

Cesar in Italiam quo venit Carolus anno, Cincha est ripheis nostra Vienna Getis.

In the beginning of this yeare was the hauing and reading of the new testament in English translated by Tindall, Joye, and others, forbidden by the king with the aduise of his counsell, and nameilie the bishops, which affirmed that the same was not trulie translated; and that therein were prologs and prefaces sounding to heresie, with vncharitable railing against bishops and the cleargie. The king therefore commanded the bishops, that they calling to them the best learned men of the vniuersities, should cause a new translation to be made, that the people without danger might read the same for their better instruction in the lawes of God, and his holie word. Diuerse persons that were detected to vse reading of the new testament, and other booke in English set forth by Tindall, and such other as were tied the realme, were punished by order taken against them by sir Thomas More then lord chancelor, who held greatlie against such booke, but still the number daile increased.

caused all his new testaments which he had bought with manie other bookes, to be brought into Pauls churchyard in London, and there were openlie burned. In the end of this yeare, the wild Irishmen, knowing the earle of Kildare to be in England, entered his land, and spoiled and burnt his countrie, with diuerse other countries. And the erle of Osserie being the kings deputie made little resistance, for lacke of power. Wherefore the king sent the earle of Kildare into Ireland, & with him sir William Skevington knight, master of the kings ordinance, and diuerse gunners with him, which so politikelie ordered themselves, that their enemies were glad to offer amends, and to treat for truce: & so sir William Skevington the next yeare returned into England, leaving there the earle of Kildare for the kings deputie.

Now I will returne to the execution of the treatie of Cambrige, in the which it was agreed, that the ladie Cleane, and the French kings children should be deliuered when the ransom appointed was paid as you haue heard in the last yeare. Wherefore the French king gathered monie of his subjects with all speed, and when the monie was readie, he sent the great master of France called Annas de Permonancie and diuerse other nobles to Balon with the monie, and to receive the ladie and the children. And thither came to them the great constable of Castile and monsieur Prat for the emperor, & there the crowns were weied and touched: and that fault sooner the Spaniards found in them they would not receiue a great number of them, and so they carried the children backe from Fontarbie into Spaine. Thus the great master of France and his companie late still at Balon, without hauing his purpose performed, from March till the end of June, and longer had lien if the king of England had not sent sir Francis Bryan to Balon to warrant the paiement: wherevpon the date of deliuerance was appointed to be on saint Peters date in June.

At which date the great master, with one and thirtie mulets laden with the crownes came to the one side of the riuer of Audate, which riuer departeth Spaine and France, and there taried till the first date of Iulie: on which date the ladie Cleane, and the children were put in two great boates, hauing onelie twelue gentlemen of Spaine with them: and in like maner the great master with two great boats, in the which the monie was, and twelue gentlemen with him. All these boats met at a bridge made in the middell of the riuer. The constable of Spaine and his twelue gentlemen met with the great master of France and his twelue gentlemen on the bridge: and after a little salutation, the Frenchmen entered into the two boats where the ladie and the two children were; and the Spaniards into the two boats where the monie was, and then ech part passed to land. Thus were the French kings wife and children deliuered into his hands, for which deliuerance was great ioy and triumph made in France: and also in Iulie were fiers made in London and diuerse other places for the same consideration and cause.]

Now will we leaue France, and returne to England, renewing the remembrance of cardinal Wolsey, who after great sute made to the king, was licenced to remoue from Ather to Richmond, which place he had a little before repaired with great costs, for the king made an exchange thereof with him for Hampton court. The cardinall hauing licence of the king to repaire to Richmond, made hast thither, and lodged there in the lodge of the great parke, which was a verie pretie house, there he laie untill the beginning of Lent. Then he remoued into the charterhouse of Richmond, where he laie in a lodging which doctor Collet made for himselfe, untill he remoued northward, which was in the passion weeke after, and euerie daie he resorted to the charterhouse there, and would sit with one of the most ancient fathers, who perswaded him to despise the vaine glorie of the world.

Then prepared the cardinall for his tourne into the north, and sent to London for liuerie clothes for his seruants, and so rode from Richmond to Hendon, from thence to a place called the Kie, the next daie to Kallstone, where he lodged in the priorie; the next daie to Huntingdon, and there lodged in the abbey; the next daie to Peterborough, and there lodged in the abbey, where he abode all the next weeke, & there he kept his Easter, his traine was in number an hundred and threescore persons. Vpon Maundie thursdaie he made his maundie, there hauing nine and fiftie poore men, whose feet he washed, and gaue euerie one twelue pence in monie, thre els of god canuas, a paire of shoes, a cast of red herrings, and thre white herrings, and one of them had two shillings.

On thursdaie next after Easter, he remoued to master Fitz Williams, sometime a merchant-tailor of London, and then of the kings counsell; the next weeke he remoued to Stamford, the next daie to Grantham, the next daie to Belwarke, and lodged in the castell that night and the next daie also: from thence he rode to Southwell, where he continued most part of all that summer, untill the latter end of graue time, and then he rode to Scrobie, where he continued untill Michaelmasse, and then to Catwode castell within seven miles of York, whereof we will speake moze hereafter. On the sixteenth of Maie, a man was hanged in chaires in Finsburie field, for murdering doctor Miles vicar of saint Edmes. The fourth and fift of Nouember was a great wind, that blew downe manie houses and trees, after which wind followed so high a tide, that it drowned the marshes on Ester side and Kent, with the yle of Thanet, and other places, destroying much cattell. The nineteenth of September, in the cite of London, a proclamation was made for the restraining of the popes authoritie in England, as followeth.

A proclamation published in England in the behalfe of the kings prerogatiue roiall against the pope.

The kings highnes streitlie chargeth and commandeth, that no maner of person, of what estate, degree, or condition soeuer he or they be of, doe purchase or attempt to purchase from the court of Rome or elsewhere, nor vse & put in execution, diuulge, or publish any thing hertofore within this yeare passed purchased, or to be purchased hereafter, containing mater preiudiciall to the high authoritie, iurisdiction, and prerogatiue roiall of this his said realme, or to the let, hinderance, or impeachment of his graces noble & vertuous intended purposes in the premises, vpon paine of incurring his highnesse indignation, and imprisonment, and further punishment of their bodies for their so doing at his graces pleasure, to the dreadfull example of all other.

Some iudged, that this proclamation was made, because the queene (as was said) had purchased a new bull for ratification of hir marriage. Others thought that it was made, because the cardinall had purchased purchased a bull to curle the king, if he would not restore him to his old dignities, and suffer him to correct the spiritualtie, the king not to meddle with the same. In deed manie conjectured, that the cardinall grudging at his fall from so high dignities, stieked not to write things sounding to the kings reproch, both to the pope, and other princes; for that manie opprobrious words were spoken to doctor Bonars the kings orator at Rome, and that it was said to him, that for the cardinals sake the king should have the worse speed in the sute of his matrimonie.

Cardinall Wolseie living at Calwood, held there an honourable and plentiful house for all commers, and also built & repaired the castell, which was great-lie in decay, having artificers and labourers about thre hundred persons baillie in wages. At length being thereunto perswaded by the doctors of the church of Woke, he determined to be installed there at Woke minster, the next monday after Alhallowes daie, against which time due preparation was made for the same, but not in such sumptuous wise, as his predecessors before him had used. For whereas the cardinall was not abashed to send to the king, requiring him to lend him the mitre and pall which he was wont to weare when he sang masse in ante solemne assemblee: the king upon sight of his letters, could not but marvell at the proud presumptionnes of the man, saying: What a thing is this, that prides should thus reigne in a person that is quite under foot.

The daie being once knowne unto the worship-full gentlemen of the countrie, and other, as abbatts, and priors, and notice of his installation, they sent in such provision of vittells, that it is almost incredible, all which was unknowne to the cardinall, for as much as he was presented and disappointed of his purpose, by the reason that he was arrested of high treason, as ye shall hereafter heare. So that most part of this former provision that I speake of, was sent unto Woke the same daie of his arrest, and the next daie following: for his arrest was kept as close as could be. The order of his arrest was thus. It was appointed by the king & counsell, that sir Walter Walsh knight, one of the kings privie chamber, should be sent downe with a commission into the north unto the earle of Northumberland (who was sometime brought up in house with the cardinall) and they twaine being joinctlie in commission to arrest the cardinall of high treason, maister Walsh toke his horse at the court gate, about none, upon Alhallowes daie, toward the earle of Northumberland.

And now have I occasion to declare what happened about the same time, which peradventure signified the troubles following to the cardinall. The cardinall sitting at dinner upon Alhalowes daie, having at his bozds end diverse chaplains sitting at dinner, ye shall understand that the cardinals great crosse stood in a corner at the tables end, leaning against the hanging, and when the bozds end was taken up, and a convenient time for the chaplains to arise, one doctor Augustine a Venecian, and physician to the cardinall, rising from the table with the other, having upon him a great gowne of boisterous velvet, overthrew the crosse, which trailing downe along the tappet, with the point of one of the crosses, brake doctor Bonars head that the blood ran downe, the companie there standing greatlie astonied with the chance.

The cardinall perceiving the same, demanded what the matter meant of their sudden amaze. And they shewed him of the fall of his crosse upon doctor Bonars head. Wherby it (quoth he) dratone anie blood: Pea forsooth my lord (quoth they.) With that he cast his eyes aside, & shaking his head, said Da alium omen, & therewith saying grace, rose from the table, & went to his chamber. Now marke the signification how the cardinall expounded this matter at Wommet after his fall. First, ye shall understand, that the crosse which he bare as archbishop of Woke, signified himselfe; and Augustine the physician who overthrowe the crosse, was onelie he that accused the cardinall, whereby his enemies caught an occasion to overthrow him: it fell upon doctor Bonars head, who was maister of the cardinals faculties and spirituall jurisdictions, and was then dammed by the overthrow of the crosse: yea, and more over, drawing blood of him, betokened death, which shortly after did insue.

About the time of this mischance, the same verie daie and season, maister Walsh toke his horse at the court as nigh as could be judged. Now the appointed time drew nere of his installation, and sitting at dinner upon the fridaye next before the monday on the which daie he intended to be installed at Woke, the earle of Northumberland and maister Walsh, with a great companie of gentlemen of the earles house, & of the countrie, whome he had gathered together in the kings name, came to the hall at Calwood, the officers being at dinner, and the cardinall not sullie dined, being then in his fruits. The first thing that the earle did after he had set order in the hall, he commanded the porter at the gates to deliver him the keyes thereof. Who would in no wise obeie his commandement, though he were roughlie threatened, and shrewdly commanded in the kings name to make delivrie of them to one of the earles servants.

Sir (quoth he) seeing that ye do but intend to set one of your servants in my place to keepe the gates, I know no servant that ye have but I am as able as he to do it, and keepe the gates to your purpose (whatsoever it be) also the keyes were delivered me by my lord and maister, wherefore I praye you to pardon me, for whatsoever ye shall command me to do in the ministracion of mine office, I shall do it with a good will. With that (quoth the earle) hold him a booke (& commanding him to laie his hand thereon:) Thou shalt sweare (quoth he) that thou shalt well and trulie keepe the gates to the kings use, and to do all such things as we shall command: and that ye shall let passe neither in nor out at these gates, but such as ye be commanded by us. And with this oth he received the keyes at the earles hands.

All these doings knew the cardinall nothing, for they stopped the staires, so that none went up to the cardinals chamber, and they that came downe could no more go up againe. At the last one escaped, who shewed the cardinall that the earle was in the hall.
Whereat the cardinall marvelled, and would not believe him, but commanded a gentleman to bring him the truth, who going downe the staires, saw the earle of Northumberland, and returned, and said it was verie he. Then (quoth the cardinall) I am sorie that we have dined, for I feare our officers be not provided of anie store of good fish, to make him some honorable chere, let the table stand (quoth he.) With that he rose up, and going downe the staires, he encountered the earle coming up with all his suite.
And as soone as the cardinall espied the earle, he put off his cap, and said, My lord ye be most hartlie welcome, and so embraced each other.

Then the cardinall toke the earle by the hand, and had him up into the chamber, whome followed all the number of the earles servants. From thence he led him into his bed-chamber, and they being there all alone, the earle said unto the cardinall with a soft voice, laing his hand upon his arme: My lord I arrest you of high treason. With which words the cardinall being marvellouslie astonied, standing both

Where is your commission (quoth he) that I may see it? Praise sir that you may not (saide the erle). Well then (quoth the cardinal) I will not obeye your rest. But as they were debating this matter betwene them in the chamber, as busie was maister Walsh in arresting doctor Augustine at the doore of the palace, saieing vnto him, Go in traitor or I shall make thee.

At the last maister Walsh being entred the cardinals chamber, began to plucke off his hood, and after knelled downe to the cardinal. Vnto whom the cardinal said, Come hither gentleman & let me speake with you: Sir, here my lord of Powherberland hath arrested me, but by whose authoritie he sheweth not, if ye be ioined with him I praise you shew me. Indeed my lord (quoth maister Walsh) he sheweth you the truth. Well then (quoth the cardinal) I praise you let me see it. Sir I beseech you (quoth maister Walsh) hold vs excused: there is annexed to our commission certeine instructions, which you may not see. Well (quoth the cardinal) I trow ye are one of the kings priuie chamber, your name is Walsh, I am content to yeld to you, but not to my lord of Powherberland without I see his commission: the worst in the kings priuie chamber is sufficient to arrest the greatest piers of the realme by the kings commandement, without anye commission, therefore put your commission and authoritie in execution, spare not, I will obeye the kings will; I take God to iudge, I neuer offended the king in word nor deed.

Then the earle called into the chamber diuerse gentlemen of his owne seruants, and after they had taken the cardinals keyes from him, they put him in custodie of the earles gentlemen, and then they went about the house to set all things in an order. Then sent they doctor Augustine awaie to London with as much speed as they could, who was bound vnto the howse like a traitor. But it was sundae toward night per the cardinal was conueied from Calwood, who lodged that night in the abbeye of Domeset. The next daie he remoued toward Doncaster, and was there lodged at the Blacke friers. The next daie he was remoued to Sheffield parke, where the earle of Shrewsburie with his ladie, and a traine of gentlemen and gentlewomen receiued him with much honour. Then departed all the great number of gentlemen that conducted him thither.

ries house.

The cardinal being thus with the earle of Shrewsburie, continued there eightene daies after, vpon whome the earle appointed diuerse gentlemen to attend continuallie, to see that he should lacke nothing, being serued in his owne chamber as honorable as he had bene in his owne house, and once euerie daie the earle would repaire to him and commune with him. After the cardinal had thus remained with the earle of Shrewsburie about a fortnight, it came to passe at a certeine time as he sat at dinner in his owne chamber, hauing at his boyds end a messe of gentlemen and chapleins to keepe him companie, toward the end of his dinner, when he was come to eating his fruits, his colour was perceined often to change, whereby he was iudged not to be in good health.

table.

Where vpon one of his gentlemen said, Sir, me seemes you are not well at ease. To whom he answered with loud voice, Forsooth no moze I am, for I am (quoth he) taken suddenlie with a thing about my stomack, that lieth there along as cold as a whetstone, which is no moze but wind, I praise you go to the apothecarie, & inquire of him if he haue anye thing that will breake wind vpwart. Then went he to the earle and shewed him what estate the cardinal was in, and what he desired. With that, the earle caused the apothecarie to be called before him, & demanded of him if he had anye thing that would breake wind vpwart in a mans bodie. And he answered he had such geger. Then (quoth the earle) fetch me some. When the apothecarie fetched a white confession in a faire paper, & shewed it to the earle; who commanded one to giue the assaie thereof before him, and then the same to be brought to the cardinal, who receiued it: vp all at once into his mouth.

But immediatlie after suerlie, he auoided much wind vpwart: So (quoth he) ye may see that it was but wind, and now I am well eased, I thanke God, and so rose from the table, and went to his prayers. And that done, there came on him such a losenesse, that it caused him to go to the steele. And not long after the earle of Shrewsburie came into the gallerie to him; with whome the cardinal met: and then sitting downe vpon a bench, the earle asked him how he did, and he most lamentable answered him, and thanked him for his good intertainment. Sir (quoth the earle) if ye remember, ye haue often wished to come before the king, to make your answer; and I haue written to the king in that behalfe, making him priuie of your lamentation that ye inwardlie haue receiued for his displeasure, who accepteth all your doings therein, as friends be accustomed to do in such cases: therefore I would aduise you to plucke vp your hart, and be not agast of your enities, I doubt not but this your iournie to his highnesse shall be much to your aduancement.

The king hath sent for you that worthy knight maister Kingston, and with him foure and twentie of your old seruants, now of the gard, to the intent ye may safely come to his maiestie. Sir (quoth the cardinal) I trow maister Kingston is consistable of the Tower. Yea, what of that (quoth the erle) I assure you he is elected by the king for one of your friends. Well (quoth the cardinal, as God will, so be it, I am subiect to fortune, being a true man, ready to accept such chances as shall follow, and there an end; I praise you where is maister Kingston. Quoth the earle, I will send for him. I praise you so do (quoth the cardinal) at whose message he came. And as soone as the cardinal espied him, he made hast to encounter him, and at his comming he knelled to him, and saluted him in the kings behalfe, whome the cardinal bare-headed offered to take vp, and said: I praise you stand by, knelle not to me, I am but a wretched replet with miserie, not esteeming my selfe but as a vile affect, bitterlie cast awaie, without desert, as God knoweth.

Then said maister Kingston with humble reuerence: Sir, the king hath him commended vnto you. I thanke his highnesse quoth the cardinal, I trust he be in health. Yea (quoth maister Kingston) and he commanded me to saie to you, that you should assure your selfe that he beareth you as much good will as euer he did, and willet you to be of good chere. And where report hath bene made, that ye should commit against him certeine heinous crimes, which he thinks to be vnture, yet he can do no lesse than send for you to your triall, & to take your iournie to him at your owne pleasure, commanding me to be attendant vpon you. Therefore sir I praise you, when it shall be your owne pleasure to take your iournie, I shall be ready to giue attendance. Maister Kingston (quoth he) I thanke you for your newes, and sir, if I were as lustie as I haue bene but of late, I would ride with you in post, but I am diseased with a flur that maketh me verie weake, but I shall with all speed make me ready to ride with you to meere. When night came, the cardinal layed verie sick with with the laske, the which caused him continuallie to go to the skole all that night, in so much that he had that night fittie strokes: therefore in consideration of his infirmite, they caused him to tarrie all that day: and the next daie he took his iournie with master Kingston, and them of the gard, till he came to an house of the earle of Shrewsburies called Hardwike hall, where he late all night verie euill at ease. The next daie he rode to Spotingham, and there lodged that night moze sicke: and the next daie he rode to Leicester abbey, and by the waie warded so sicke that he was almost fallen from his mule; so that it was night before he came to the abbey of Leicester, where at his comming in at the gates, the abbat with all his convent met him with diuers torches light, whom they honozable receiued and welcomed.

To whom the cardinal said: Father abbat, I am come hither to lay my bones among you, riding so still untill he came to the staires of the chamber, where he alighted from his mule, and master Kingston led him vp the staires, and as soone as he was in his chamber he went to bed. This was on the saturday at night, and then increased he sicker and sicker, untill mondaie, that all men thought he would haue died: so on tuesdaye saint Andzwees euen, master Kingston came to him and bad him god morrow, for it was about six of the clocke, and asked him how he did: Sir (quoth he) I tarrie but the pleasure of God, to render vp my poore soule into his hands. Not so Sir (quoth master Kingston) with the grace of God, yee shall liue and doe verie well, if yee will be of good cheere. Nay in god sooth master Kingston, my disease is such, that I can not liue: for I haue had some experience in physicke.

Thus it is, I haue a flux with a continuall feuer, the nature whereof is, that if there be no alteration of the same within eight daies, either must insue excoiation of the intrailles, or transie, or else present death, and the best of them is death, and (as I suppose) this is the eight daie, & if yee see no alteration in me, there is no remedie, saue (though I may liue a daie or twaine after) but death must insue. Sir (quoth master Kingston) you be in much penituenes, doubting that thing, that in god faith yee need not. Well, well, master Kingston (quoth the cardinal) I see the matter how it is framed: but if I had serued God as diligentlie as I haue done the king, he would not haue giuen me ouer in my greie haire: but it is the lust reward that I must receiue for the diligent paines and studie that I haue had to doe him seruite, not regarding my seruite to God, but onelie to satisfie his pleasure.

I praise you haue me most humble commended unto his roiall maiestie, & beseech him in my behalfe to call to his princelie remembrance all matters proceeding betwene him & me from the beginning of the world, and the progresse of the same, &c. Master Kingston fare well, I can no moze saie, but I wish all things to haue good successe, my time draweth on fast. And euen with that he began to draw his speech at length, & his tong to faste, his eyes being set, whose sight failed him. When they did put him in remembrance of Christ his passion, & caused the peomen of the gard to stand by to see him die, and to witnesse of his words at his departure: & incontinent the clocke stroke eight, and then he gaue vp the ghost, and departed this present life: which caused some to call to remembrance how he said the daie before, that at eight of the clocke they should lose their master.

Here is the end and fall of pride and arrogancie of men exalted by fortune to dignitie: for in his time he was the hautiest man in all his proceedings a line, hauing moze respect to the honor of his person, than he had to his spirituall profession, wher in should be shewed all meekenes, humilitie, and charitie. [An example (saith Guicciardin, who handleth this storie effectually, and sheweth the cause of this cardinals ruine) in our daies worthie of memorie, touching the power which fortune and ennie hath in the courts of princes.] He died in Leicester abbey, & in the church of the same abbey was buried. Such is the suertie of mans brittle state, doubtfull in birth, & no lesse feeble in life, which is as vncertaine, as death most certaine, and the meanes thereof manifold, which as in number they exceed; so in spangeness they passe: all degrees of ages & diuersities of seres being subiect to the same. In consideration whereof, it was notable said by one that wrote a whole volume of infirmities, diseases, and passions incident to children:

A primis vita diuersos flamine morbos Perpetimur, diuis afflictiisque malis: Donec in usum redeat qui vixit ab ortu, Antea quam discat vivere, vita cadit.

Sebast. Anstet-mus.

This cardinal (as Edmund Campian in his historie of Ireland describeth him) was a man undoubtedly borne to honor: I thinke (saith he) some princes bastard, no butchers sonne, exceeding wise, faire spoken, high minded, full of reuenge, bitious of his bodie, loffie to his enemies, were they neuer so big, to those that accepted and sought his friendship wonderfull courteous, a ripe scholeman, thall to affections, brought a bed with flatterie, insatiable to get, and moze princelie in bestowing, as appeareth by his two colleges at Ipswich and Drenford, the one ouerthrowne with his fall, the other unfinished, and yet as it lieth for an house of students, considering all the appurtenances incomparable thorough Christendome, whereof Henrie the eight is now called founder, because he let it stand. He held and intioed at once the bishopricks of Dorke, Duresme, & Winchester, the dignities of lord cardinal, legat, & chancellor, the abbey of saint Albons, diuerse priories, sundrie fat benefices in commendam, a great preferer of his seruants, an aduancer of learning, stout in euerie quarell, neuer happie till this his overthrow. Wherein he shewed such moderation, and ended so perfectlie, that the houre of his death did him moze honor, than all the pompe of his life passed. Thus far Campian. Here it is necessarie to adde that notable discourse, which I find in Iohn Stow, concerning the state of the cardinal, both in the yeares of his youth, and in his settled age: with his sudden comming vp from preferment to preferment; till he was aduanced to that step of honor, which making him insolent, brought him to confusion.

This Thomas Wolsey was a poore mans sonne of Ipswich, in the countie of Suffolke, & there borne, and being but a child, verie apt to be learned, by the meanes of his parents he was conueied to the vniuersitie of Drenford, where he shortly prospered so in learning, as he was made bachellor of art, when he passed not fittene yeares of age, and was called most commonlie thorough the vniuersitie the boie bachellor. Thus prospering in learning, he was made fellow of Pawdeline college, and afterward appointed to be scholemaster of Pawdelin schole, at which time the lord marquesse Dorset had three of his sonnes there at schole, committing vnto him as well their education as their instruction. It pleased the said lord marquesse against a Christmas season to send as well for the scholemaster, as for his children home to his house for their recreation, in that pleasant and honorable feast.

Then being there, the lord their father, perceiving them to be right well imployed in learning for their time, he hauing a benefice in his gift, being at that time void, gaue the same to the scholemaster in reward of his diligence at his departure after Christmas.

mas to the vniuersitie, and hauing the presentation thereof, repaired to the ordinarie for his induction, and being furnished of his instruments, made speed to the benefice to take possession, and being there for that intent, one sir James Daullet knight dwelling thereabouts, took occasion against him, and set the scholemaster by the heeles during his pleasure, which after was neither forgotten nor forgiven.

For when the scholemaster mounted to the dignitie to be chancellor of England, he sent for master Daullet, & after manie sharpe words, intained him to attend untill he were dismissed, and not to depart out of London without licence obtained; so that he continued there within the middle Temple the space of five or six yeares, and late then in the Gatehouse next the street, which he reedified verie sumptuously, garnishing the same all ouer the outsid with the cardinals armes, with his hat, cognisances, and other deuises in so glorious a sort, that he thought thereby to haue appeased his old displeasure.

Now after the decesse of the lord marquisse, this same scholemaster considering himselfe to be but a simple beneficed man, and to haue lost his fellowship in the college, which was much to his releefe, thought not long to be unprouided of some other helpe, and in his trauell thereabouts, he fell in acquaintance with one sir John Raphant, a verie graue & ancient knight, who had a great come in Calis vnder king Henrie the seventh: this knight he serued, and behaued himselfe so discretly, that he obtained the especial fauor of his master, insomuch that he committed all the charge of his office vnto his chapleine, and (as I vnderstand) the office was the treasurership of Calis, who was in consideration of his great age discharged of his come, and returned againe into England, and thorough his instant labor, his chapleine was promoted to be the kings chapleine, and when he had once cast anchor in the port of promotion, how he wrought, I shall sometime declare.

He hauing there a iust occasion to be in the sight of the king daile, by reason he said masse before him in his closet, and that being done, he spent not the daie in idleness, but would attend vpon those whom he thought to beare most rule in the counsell, the which at that time was doctor For, bishop of Winchester, secretaire, and lord of the priue seale: and also sir Thomas Louell knight, a sage counsellor, master of the wards, and constable of the Tower: these graue counsellors in proceesse of time perceiued this chapleine to haue a verie fine wit, and thought him a meet person to be preferred to wittie affaires. It chanced at a certeine season that the king had an vrgent occasion to send an ambassadoz vnto the emperor Maximilian, who laie at that present in the low countrie of Flanders, not farre from Calis.

The bishop of Winchester, and sir Thomas Louell, whome the king counselled and debated with vpon this ambassage, saw they had a conuenient occasion to prefer the kings chapleine, whose wit, eloquence, and learning, they highly commended to the king. The king commanded them to bring his chapleine before his presence, with whome he fell in communication of great matters, and perceiuing his wit to be verie fine, thought him sufficient, commanding him therevpon to prepare himselfe to his iourney, and hauing his depeach, he took his leaue of the king at Richmond about none; & so comming to London about foure of the clocke, where the barge of Graues end was readie to lanch forth, both with a prosperous tide and wind, without anye abode he entered the barge.

Hauing so done, he passed forth with such speed, that he arrived at Graues end within little more than three houres, where he tarried no longer than his post horses were a prouiding, and then travelled so speedily that he came to Dover the next morning, whereas the passengers were readie under saile to Calis, into the which passenger, without tarrying, he entered, and sailed forth with them, that long before none he arrived at Calis, and hauing post horses, departed from thence with such speed, that he was that night with the emperor, and disclosed the whole summe of his ambassage to the emperor, of whome he required speedie expedition, the which was granted him by the emperor; so that the next daie he was clerlie dispatched with all the kings requests fullie accomplished.

At which time he made no longer delate, but took post horses that night, and rode toward Calis, conducted thither with such persons as the emperor had appointed; and at the opening of the gates of Calis, he came thither, where the passengers were as readie to returne into England, as they were before at his iourney forward, insomuch that he arrived at Dover by ten of the clocke before none, and hauing post horses, came to the court at Richmond the same night, where he taking some rest untill the morning, repaired to the king at his first comming from his bedchamber to his closet, whom when the king saw, he checked him, for that he was not on his iourney: Sir (quoth he) if it may please your highnesse, I haue already bene with the emperor, and dispatched your affaires (I trust to your graces contentation) and with that presented vnto the king his letters of credence from the emperor.

The king being in a great maze and wonder of his speedie returne and proceedings, dissembled all his wonder, and demanded of him whether he encountered not his pursuivant the which he sent vnto him, supposing him not to be out of London, with letters concerning a verie necessarie matter, neglected in their consultation; Pea forsooth (quoth the chapleine) I met with him yesterday by the waie, and hauing no vnderstanding by your graces letters of your pleasure, haue notwithstanding bene so bold vpon mine owne discretion (perceiuing that matter to be verie necessarie in that behalfe) to dispatch the same. And forsomuch as I haue excused your graces commission, I most humble requite your graces pardon. The king reioysing not a little, said; We do not onelie pardon you thereof, but also give you our princelie thanks, both for the proceeding therein, and also for your good and speedie exploit, commanding him for that time to take his rest, and repaire againe after dinner for the further relation of his ambassage.

The ambassadoz, when he saw time, repaired before the king and counsell, where he declared the effect of all his affaires so exactly, with such grauitie and eloquence, that all the counsell that heard him, commended him, esteeming his expedition to be almost beyond the capacite of man. The king gaue him at that time the beaurie of Lincoln. From thence forward he grew more and more into estimation and authoritie, and after was promoted by the king to be his almoner. After the death of king Henrie the seventh, and in the flourishing youth of king Henrie the eight, this almoner handled himselfe so politickly, that he soon found the means to be made one of the kings counsell, and to grow in fauor with the king, to whome the king gaue an house at Whitehall in Fleetstreet, sometime sir Richard Empsons, where he kept house for his familie; and so daile attended vpon the king, and in his especial fauor, who had great sute made vnto him.

His sentences & wittie persuasions in the court chamber were alwaies so pitthe, that the counsell (as occasion moued them) continually assigned him to

to be the oppositor to the king in all their procedings, in whome the king receiued such a leaning fantasie, for that he was most earnest and readiest of all the counsell to aduance the kings will and pleasure: the king therefore esteemed him so highly, that all the other counsellors were put from the great favor that they before were in, insomuch that the king committed all his will vnto his disposition, which the almoner perceiuing, tooke vpon him therefore to discharge the king of the weightie and trouble some businesse, persuading the king that he should not need to spare any time of his pleasure for any businesse that should happen in the counsell.

And whereas the other counsellors would diuerse times perswade the king to haue sometime recourse into the counsell chamber, there to heare what was done; the almoner would perswade him to the contrarie, which delighted him much: and thus the almoner ruled all them that were before him, such did his politic and wit bring to passe. Who was now in high favor but master almoner? And who ruled all vnder the king, but master almoner? Thus he persecuted in favor, untill at last in came presents, gifts, and rewards so plentifulle, that he lacked nothing that might either please his fantasie, or enrich his coffers.

And thus proceeding in fortunes blisfulnesse, it thanced the warres betwene the realmes of England and France to be open, insomuch as the king was fullie perswaded in his most roiall person to trauaise his forren enemies with a puissant armie; wherefore it was necessarie that this roiall enterprize should be speedilie provided and furnished, in e-uerie degree of things apt & conuenient for the same, for the expedition wherof the king thought no mans wit to meet for policie and painefull trauell, as was his almoner, to whome therefore he committed his whole trust therein, and he tooke vpon him the whole charge of all the businesse, and brought all things to god passe in a decent order, as all manner of vittells, provisions, and other necessities conuenient for so noble a voiage and armie.

All things being by him perfected, the king aduanced to his roiall enterprize, passed the seas, and marched forward in god order of battell, untill he came to the strong towne of Teruine, to the which he laid his siege, and assailed it verie stronglie conti-nualle with such vehement assaults, that within short space it was yielded vnto his maiestie, vnto the which place the emperor Maximilian repaired vnto the king with a great armie like a mightie prince, taking of the king his graces wages: which is a rare thing, and but seldom seene, an emperor to fight vnder a kings banner.

Thus after the king had obtained this puissant fort and taken the possession thereof, and set all things there in due order, for the defense and preservation thereof to his vse, he departed thence, and marched toward the cite of Torneie, and there laid his siege in like manner, to the which he gaue so fierce & sharpe assault, that they were constrained of fine force to render the towne vnto his victorious maiestie: at which time the king gaue the almoner the bishopricke of the same see, towards his paines and diligence sustained in that iournie. Now when the king had established all things agreeable to his will and pleasure, and furnished the same with noble capteines & men of warre for the safeguard of the towne, he returned againe into England, taking with him diuerse noble personages of France being prisoners, as the duke of Longue, and vicount Clarimont, with other which were taken there in a skirmish.

After whose returne, immediatlie the see of Lin-colne fell void, by the death of doctor Smith late bishop there, the which benefice his grace gaue to his almoner, late bishop of Torneie elect, who was not negligent to take possession thereof, and made all the sped he could for his consecration: the solemnization whereof ended, he found meanes that he gat the possession of all his predecessors goods into his hands.

It was not long after that doctor Wenzlyke archbishop of Poike died at Rome, being there the kings ambassador, vnto the which see the king immediatlie presented his late and new bishop of Lincolne; so that he had thre bishopricks in his hands in one yere giuen him.

Then prepared he for his translation from the see of Lincolne, vnto the see of Poike, after which solemnization done, he being then an archbishop Primas Anglia, thought himselfe sufficient to compare with Canturburie, and thereupon erected his crosse in the court, and euerie other place, as well within the predict and iurisdiction of Canturburie, as in any other place. And forsomuch as Canturburie claimeth a superiortie ouer Poike, as ouer all other bishopricks within England, and for that cause claimeth as a knowlege of an ancient obedience of Poike, to abate the aduancing of his crosse, in presence of the crosse of Canturburie; notwithstanding, the archbishop of Poike nothing minding to desist from bearing thereof, in manner as I said before, caused his crosse to be aduanced, as well in the presence of Canturburie as elsewhere. Wherefore Canturburie being moued therewith, gaue vnto Poike a certeine cheque for his presumption, by reason whereof, there ingendered some grudge betwene Poike and Canturburie; Poike intending to pro-uide some such meanes, that he would be rather superior in dignitie to Canturburie, than to be either obedient or equall to him. Wherefore he obtained to be made priest cardinal, and Legatus de latere: vnto whome the pope sent a cardinals hat with certeine bulbs for his authoritie in that behalfe. Yet you shall vnderstand, that the pope sent him this worthie hat of dignitie, as a iewel of his honor and authoritie, the which was conueied in a barlets budget, who semed to all men to be but a person of small estimation.

Wherefore Poike being aduertised of the basenes of this messenger, & of the peoples opinion, thought it meete for his honor, that this iewel should not be conueied by so simple a person, and therefore caused him to be stopped by the wate immediatlie after his arrivall in England, where he was newlie furnished in all manner of apparell, with all kind of costlie silks, which seemed decent for such an high ambassador, and that done, he was incountered vpon Blackheath, and there receiued with a great assemble of prelates, and lustie gallant gentlemen, and from thence conducted thorough London with great triumph. Then was great and speedie preparation made in Westminster abbey, for the confirmation and acceptance of this high order and dignitie, the which was executed by all the bishops and abbats about or nigh London, with their rich miters and copes, and other ornaments, which was done in so soleinne wise, as had not bene seene the like, vnlesse it had bene at the coronation of a mightie prince or king. Obtaining this dignitie, he thought himselfe meet to beare rule among the temporall power, & among the spiritual iurisdiction: wherefore, remembryng as well the taunts sustained of Canturburie, as hauing respect to the ad-uancement of his owne honor & promotion, he found the meanes with the king, that he was made lord chancellor of England, and Canturburie which was chancellor dismissed, who had continued in that come-long since before the decesse of Henrie the seventh.
Now being in possession of the chancellorship, & car-indued with the promotions of the archbishop, & cardinall De Latere, hauing power to correct Canturburric, and all other bishops and spiritual persons, to assemble his conuocation when he would assigne, he took vpon him the correction of matters in all their iurisdiccions, and visited all the spirituall houses, hauing in euerie diocesse all maner of spirituall ministers, as commissaries, scribes, apparitors, and all other officers to furnish his courts, and presented by pccentation whome he pleased into all benefices throughout all this realme.

And to the aduancing further of his legantine iurisdiction and honoz, he had masters of his faculties, masters Ceremoniarum, and such other, to the glorifying of his dignitie. Then had he his two great crosses of silver, the one of his archbishopricke, the other of his legacie, borne before him whither soeuer he went or rode, by two of the tallest priests that he could get within the realme. And to increase his gaines, he had also the bishopricke of Durham, and the abbey of saint Albons in commendation. And after, when doctor Forbischep of Winchester died, he surrendered Durham into the kings hands, and took to him Winchester. Then had he in his hand (as it were in farme) the bishopricks of Bath, Worcester, & Hereford, for so much as the incumbents of them were strangers, and made their abode continually beyond the seas in their owne countries, or else at Rome, from whence they were sent in legation to this realme vnto the king, and for their reward at their departure, king Henrie the seventh gaue them those bishopricks.

But they being strangers, thought it more meet for the assurance to suffer the cardinall to haue their benefices for a conuenient sum of monie paid them yearelie, where they remained, than either to be troubled with the charges of the same, or to be yearelie burthened with the conueiance of their revenues vnto them: so that all the spirituall livings and presentations of these bishopricks were sulkie in his disposition, to prefer whome he liked. He had also a great number daillie attending vpon him, both of noblemen & worthie gentlemen, with no small number of the tallest yeomen that he could get in all the realme, in so much that well was that nobleman and gentleman, that could preferre a tall yeoman to his seruice.

He shall vnderstand, that he had in his hall continually three bozds kept with three severall principall officers, that is to saie, a steward which was alwaies a priest; a treasurer a knight; and a comptroller an esquier; also a cofferer being a doctor; three marshals; three yeomen vishers in the hall, besides two groomes, and almoners. Then in the hall kitchin, two clerks of the kitchin; a clarke comptroller; a surueior of the dressto; a clarke of the spicerie, the which together kept also a continuall messe in the hall. Also in his hall kitchin he had of master cooks two, and of other cooks, labozers and children of the kitchin, twelue persons; foure yeomen of the scullerie, and foure yeomen of the silver scullerie; two yeomen of the pastrie, with two other pastlers vnder the yeomen.

Then in his priuie kitchin a master coke, who went daillie in velvet or in sattin, with a chaine of gold, with two other yeomen and a groom: in the scalding house, a yeoman and two groomes; in the pantrie two persons; in the butterie two yeomen, two groomes, and two pages; and in the pextrie likewise in the cellar three yeomen, and three pages; in his chandrie two; in the wasarie two; in the wardrobe of beds, the master of the wardrobe, and ten other persons; in the landrie, a yeoman, a groom, thirtie pages, two yeomen purueiois, & one groom: in the bake-house, a yeoman and two groomes; in the wood-yard a yeoman, and a groom: in the barne one; in the garden a yeoman and two groomes; porters at the gate, two yeomen, and two groomes; a yeoman of his barge; and a maister of his horse; a clarke of the stable, a yeoman of the same; the sadler; the ferrier; a yeoman of his chariot; a sumpter man; a yeoman of his stirrop; a muleter; thirtene groomes of his stable, euerie of them kept foure geldings.

In the almozie a yeoman and a groom: in his chappell he had a deane, a great divine, and a man of excellent learning; a subdeane; a repeater of the quire; a gospeller; a piffler; of singing priests ten; a maister of the children; seculars of the chappell, singing men twelue; singing children ten, with one servant to await vpon the children; in the reuererie a yeoman, and two groomes, ouer and besides diuerse retainers that came thither at principall feasts, for the furniture of his chappell, it passeth my capacitie to declare the number of costlie ornaments and rich feluels that were to be occupied in the same continually: there hath bene scene in procession, about the hall, foure and fortie verie rich coapes of one sute twelue, besides the rich crosses and candlesticks, and other ornaments to the furniture of the same.

He had two crossebearers, and two pillerbearers in his great chamber; and in his priuie chamber these persons: first the chiefe chamberleine, and vicechamberleine; of gentlemen vishers, besides one in his priuie chamber, he had twelue daillie waiters; and of gentlemen waiters in his priuie chamber he had six, and of lordes nine or ten, who had each of them two men allowed them to attend vpon them, except the earle of Darbie, who had allowed five men: then had he of gentlemen, of cupbearers, caruers, and sewers, both of the priuie chamber, and of the great chamber, with gentlemen daillie waiters there, fortie persons; of yeomen vishers six; of groomes in his chamber eight; of yeomen in his chamber five and fortie daillie: he had also almes men sometime more in number than other sometime.

There was attending on his bozrd of doctors and chapleins, besides them of his chappell, thirtene daillie: a clarke of his closet; secretaries two; and two clerks of his signet; and foure counsellors learned in the law. And for so much as it was necessarie to haue diuerse officers of the Chancerie to attend vpon him, that is to saie, the clerke of the crowne; a riding clarke; a clarke of the hamper; and a chafer of the war; then a clarke of the checke, aswell vpon the chapleins, as of the yeoman of his chamber: he had also foure footmen which were garnished in rich running coats, whensoever he rode in anie tournee: then had he an herald of armes; and a sergeant of armes; a physician; an apothecarie; foure misters; a keeper of his tents; an armorer; an instructo of his wards; two yeomen of the wardrobe of his robes; and a keeper of his chamber continually in the court: he had also in his house the surueior of Porke, and a clarke of the greene cloth.

All these were daillie attending, doome lieng and byrissing, and at meales: he kept in his great chamber a continuall bozrd for the chamberers and gentlemen officers, hauing with them a messe of the yong lordes, and another of gentlemen. Besides all these, there was neuer an officer, gentleman, or worthie person, but he was allowed in the house, some three, some two, and all other one at the least, which grew to a great number of persons. Thus farre out of the checker roll, besides other officers, seruants, retainers, and suters, that most commonlie dined in the hall. After that he was thus furnished, he was sent thence in ambassage to the emperour Charles the first, for diuerse urgent causes touching the kings maiestie, mateſtie, it was thought, that ſo noble a prince (the cardinal) was moſt meet to be ſent : wherefore being ready to take upon him the charge thereof, he was furniſhed in all degrees and purpoſes, moſt like a great prince.

For firſt he proceeded forth furniſhed like a cardinal : his gentlemen being verie mante in number, were clothed in luerie coats of crimſin veluet of the beſt, with chaines of gold about their necks, and his yeomen and meane officers in coats of fine ſcarlet, garded with blacke veluet an hand broad. Thus furniſhed, he was wiſe ſent into Flanders to the emperor then lieng in Bruges, whome he did moſt highlie intertaine, diſcharging all his charges and his mens. There was no houſe within the towne of Bruges, wherein anie gentleman of the cardinals was lodged, or had recourſe, but that the owners were commanded by the emperours officers, that they, upon paine of their liues, ſhould take no monie for anie thing that the cardinals ſeruants did take of anie kind of vittels, no although they were diſpoſed to make anie coſtly bankets.

Commanding furthermore their ſaid hoſtes, to ſee that they lacked no ſuch things as they honeſtly required for their honeſtie and pleaſure. Alſo the emperours officers euerie night went through the towne from houſe to houſe, whereas anie Engliſh gentlemen did reſaſt or lodge, and ſerued their liueries for all night, which was done in this maner. Firſt, the officers brought into the houſe a caſt of fine manchete, and of ſiluer two great pots with white wine, and ſugar to the weight of a pound : white lights and yelloſe lights of waxe : a boll of ſiluer with a goblet to drinke in, and euerie night a ſtaffetorch : this was the order of the liueries euerie night. And in the morning, when the ſame officers came to ſetch aſwaie their ſtaffe, then would they account with the hoſtes for the gentlemenſ coſts ſpent in the daie before. Thus the emperor intertaine the cardinal and all his traine for the time of his ambalaſſage there. And that done, he returned into England with great triumph.

Now of his order in going to Weſtmiſter hall daillie in the tearme. Firſt per he came out of his priuie chamber, he heard ſeruice in his cloſet, and there ſaid his ſeruice with his chapleine; then going againe to his priuie chamber, he would demand if his ſeruants were in a readineſſe, and furniſhed his chamber of preſence, and waiting chamber. Being thereof then aduertised, he came out of his priuie chamber about eight of the clocke, appareled all in red, that is to ſay, his upper garment either of fine ſcarlet, or elſe fine crimſin taſſata, but moſt comonlie of fine crimſin ſattin ingrained, his pillion of fine ſcarlet, with a necke ſet in the inner ſide with blacke veluet, and a tippet of ſables about his necke, holding in his hand an orange, whereof the ſubſtance within was taken out, and filled up againe with the part of a ſponge, wherein was vineger and other conſecrations againſt the peſtilent aires, the which he moſt comonlie held to his noſe when he came among anie preaſe, or elſe that he was peſtered with manie ſuters.

Before him was borne firſt the broad ſcale of England, and his cardinals hat, by a lord, or ſome gentleman of worſhip, right ſolemnlie : & as ſone as he was once entered into his chamber of preſence, his two great croſſes were there attending to be borne before him : then cried the gentlemen viſſers, going before him bare headed, and ſaid : On before my lords and maiſters, or before, make waie for my lords grace. Thus went he downe through the hall with a ſergeant of armes before him, bearing a great mace of ſiluer, and two gentlemen carleing two great pillars of ſiluer. And when he came at the hall doze, there was his mule, being trapped all in crimſin veluet, with a ſaddle of the ſame ſtaffe, & gilt ſtirrups. When was there attending upon him when he was mounted, his two croſſe-bearers : & his pillar-bearers in like caſe upon great horſes, trapped all in fine ſcarlet. Then marched he forward with a traine of noble men and gentlemen, hauing his ſotmen ſoure in number about him, bearing ech of them a gilt pollax in their hands.

Thus paſſed he forth untill he came to Weſtmiſter hall doze, and there lighted, and went by after this maner into the Chancerie, or into the Starre-chamber : howbeit, moſt comonlie he would go into the Chancerie, and ſaie a while at a barre made for him beneath the Chancerie on the right hand, and there commune ſometime with the iudges, and ſome time with other perſons : and that done, he would repaire into the Chancerie, and ſitting there untill eleuen of the clocke, hearing of ſutes, and determining of other matters, from thence he would diuers times go into the Starre-chamber, as occaſion ſerued. There he neither ſpared high nor low, but iudged euerie ſate according to his merits and deſerts.

He vied alſo euerie ſundaie to reſort to the court, then being for the moſt part of all the yeare at Grænewich, with his former triumphs, taking his barge at his obone ſtaffes, furniſhed with yeomen ſtanding upon the bails, and his gentlemen being within about him, and landed againe at the three cranes in the Wintrie : and from thence he rode upon his mule with his croſſe, his pillars, his hat and broad ſcale carried afore him on horſebacke through Thames ſtreet, untill he came to Willingſgate, and there toke his barge againe, and ſo was rowed to Grænewich, where he was receiued of the lords and chiefe officers of the kings houſe, as the treaſurer, comptroller and others, and ſo conueied into the kings chamber. When the court was wonderfullie furniſhed with noblemen and gentlemen : and after dinner among the lords, hauing ſome conſultation with the king or with the counſell, he would depart homeward with the like triumph.

Thus in great honour, triumph, and glorie, he reigned a long ſeaſon, ruling all things within the realme appertaining unto the king. His houſe was reſorted to with noblemen and gentlemen, feaſting and banquetting ambalaſſadors diuerſe times, and all other right noble. And when it pleaſed the king for his recreation to repaire to the cardinals houſe (as he did diuerſe times in the yeare) there wanted no preparations or furniture : bankets were ſet forth with maſkes and innumeries, in ſo gorgeous a ſort and coſtly maner, that it was an heauen to behold. There wanted no dames or damoſels meet or apt to danſe with the maſkers, or to garniſh the place for the time : then was there all kind of muſike and harmony, with fine voices both of men and children.

On a time the king came ſuddenlie thither in a maſke with a dozen maſkers all in garments like theſhepheards, made of fine cloth of gold, and crimſin ſattin pained, & caps of the ſame, with viſards of good hyſnomie, their haire & beards either of fine gold-wire ſilke, or blacke ſilke, hauing ſixtene torch-bearers, beſides their drums and other perſons with viſards, all clothed in ſattin of the ſame color. And before his entring into the hall, he came by water to the water gate without anie noiſe, where were laid diuerſe chambers and guns charged with ſhot, and at his landing they were ſhot off, which made ſuch a rumble in the aire, that it was like thunder : it made all the noblemen, gentlemen, ladies, and gentlewomen, to muſe what it ſhould meane, comming ſo ſuddenlie, they ſitting quiet at a ſolemn banquet, after this ſort.

An. Re.

First þe shall vnderstand, that the tables were set in the chamber of presence lust covered, & the lord cardinall sitting vnder the cloth of estate, there hauing all his seruice alone: and then was there set a laide with a noble man, or a gentleman and a gentlewoman throughout all the tables in the chamber on the one side, which were made and ioined as it were but one table, all with order and deuise was done by the lord Sandes then lord chamberleine to the king and by sir Henrie Gilford comptrolloz of the kings maiesties house. Then immediatlie after the great chamberleine, and the said comptrolloz, sent to loke what it should meane (as though they knew nothing of the matter) who looking out of the windowes into the Thames, returned againe and shewed him, that it seemed they were noblemen and strangers that arrived at his bridge, comming as ambassadours from some forren prince.

The cardinall knew not that the king was in the number.

With that (quothe the cardinall) I desire you, because you can speake French, to take the paines to go into the hall, there to receiue them according to their estates, and to conduct them into this chamber, where they shall see vs, and all these noble personages being met at our banquet, desiring them to sit downe with vs, and to take part of our fare. Then went he incontinent downe into the hall, whereas they receiued them with twentie new torches, and conueied them vp into the chamber, with such a noise of drums and flutes, as seldome had bene heard the like. At their entring into the chamber two and two together, they went directlie before the cardinall, where he sat and saluted him reuerentlie.

The cardinall reuerentlie saluted of the maskers.

To whom the lord chamberleine for them said: Sir, for as much as they be strangers, and can not speake English, they haue desired me to declare vnto you, that they haue vnderstanding of this your triumphant banquet, where was assembled such a number of excellent dames, they could do no lesse vnder support of your grace, but to repaire hither, to view as well their incomparable beautie, as for to accompanie them at mum-chance, and then to danse with them: and sir, they require of your grace licence to accomplish the said cause of their coming. To whom the cardinall said he was verie well content they should so do. Then went the maskers, and first saluted all the dames, and returned to the most worshipful, and there opened their great cup of gold filled with crownes and other peeces of gold, to whome they set certeine peeces of gold to cast at.

The cardinall plaiceth at dice.

Thus perusing all the ladies and gentlewomen, to some they lost, and of some they wone: and marking after this manner all the ladies, they returned to the cardinall with great reuerence, potoyzing downe all their gold so left in their cup, which was about two hundred crownes: At all (quothe the cardinall) and so cast the dice and wan them, whereat was made a great noise and ioy. Then quothe the cardinall to the lord chamberleine, I praye you (quothe he) that you would shew them, that me seemeth there should be a nobleman amongst them, who is more meet to occupie this seat and place than I am, to whome I would most gladlie surrender the same according to my dutie, if I knew him.

He suspecteth that the king is present and abareth his estate.

Then spake the lord chamberleine to them in French, and they rounding him in the eare, the lord chamberleine said to my lord cardinall: Sir (quothe he) they confesse, that among them there is such a noble personage, whome, if your grace can appoint him out from the rest, he is content to disclose himselfe, and to accept your place. With that the cardinall taking good aduicement among them, at the last (quothe he) me seemeth the gentleman with the blacke beard, should be euen he: and with that he arose out of his chaire, and offered the same to the gentleman in the blacke beard with his cap in his hand. The person to whom he offered the chaire was sir Edward Penell a comelle knight, that much more resembled the kings person in that make than any other.

The king perceiuing the cardinall so deuiled, could not so beare laughing, but pulled downe his visar and masker Penell saw, and dashed out such a pleasant countenance and there, that all the noble estates there assembled, perceiving the king to be there among them, reioiced verie much. The cardinall estons desired his highnesse to take the place of estate. To whom the king answered, that he would go first and shift his apparell, and so departed into my lord cardinals chamber, mid there new appareled him: in which time the dishes of the banquet were cleane taken vp, and the tables spred againe with new cleane perfumcd cloths, euerie man and woman sitting still, untill the king with all his maskers came aming them againe all new appareled.

Then the king took his seat vnder the cloth of estate, commanding euerie person to sit still as they did before: in came a new banquet before the king, and to all the rest throughout all the tables, wherein were serued two hundred diuerse dishes, of costlie deuises and subtilties. Thus passed they forth the night with banquetting, danling, and other triumphs, to the great comfort of the king, and pleasant regard of the nobilitie there assembled. And thus spent this cardinall his time from date to daie, and yere to yere, in such wealth, ioy, triumph, and glorie, hauing alwaies on his side the kings especiall fauour, untill fortune enuied his prosperitie, and ouerthrew all the foundations of his glorie: which as they were laid vpon sand, so they shooke and slipt awaie, whereby ensued the ruine of his estate, euen to the verie losse of his life, which (as a man of a guiltie conscience, and fearing capitall punishment due by law for his vndutifull demeanour against his soueraigne) Edward Hall saith (vpon report) he partly procured, willingly taking so great a quantitie of a strong purgation, as nature was therewith oppressed, and vnable to digest the same: so that in fine he gaue vp the ghost, and was buried in Leicester abbete: of whome to saie more I will surceasse, concluding onelie with a description which I find of him not impertinent for this place, sith wholie concerning his person.

This cardinall (as you may perceiue in this storie) was of a great stomach, for he compted himselfe so quall with princes, & by craftie suggestion gat into his hands innumerable treasure: he forced little on simonie, and was not pittifull, and stood affectionate in his owne opinion: in open presence he would lie and saie vntruth, and was double both in speech and meaning: he would promise much & performe little: he was vicious of his bodie, & gaue the clergie euill example: he hated soze the citie of London & feared it: it was told him that he should die in the waie toward London, wherefore he feared least the commons of the citie would arise in riotous maner and so slay him, yet for all that he died in the waie toward London, carlieng more with him out of the world than he brought into it; namelie a winding sheete, besides other necessities thought meet for a dead man, as christian comelinesse required. This ruine of the cardinall was not so much as once dreampd vpon, when I. Leland the famous antiquarie wrote this welwithing occasion vnto the said Wolseie (being then in the flower of his glorie, and the pearle of his pride) as hereafter followeth.

Dicere merito p. fulgum. mea.*

After the cardinall was dead, the king remained from Hampton court to Greenwich, where he with quene Katharine kept a solemne Christmas, and on the Twelfth night he sat in the hall at his estate, whereas were diuerse interludes, rich masks and disports, and after that a great banquet. Now after Christmas he came to his manour of Westminster, which before was called Poike place: so after that the cardinall was atainted in the premunire, was gone northward, he made a feoffment of the same place to the king, and the chapter of the cathedrall church of Poike by their writing confirmed the same feoffment, where the king changed the name and called it the hospitall of Westminster, and no more Poike place.

The whole cleargie of England was supposed and maintained the power legatime of the cardin-nall, therefore the kings learned counsaill said plainely that they were all in the premunire: the spirituall lords were called by p. c. into the kings Bench to answer, but before their date of appearance they in their conuocation concluded an humble submission in writing, and offered the king a hundred thousand pounds to be their good lord, & also to give them a pardon of all offences touching the premunire by act of parlement, the which offer with much labour was accepted, and their pardon promised. In this submission the cleargie called the king supreme head of the church of England, which thing they neuer confessed before, whereupon manie things followed after, as you shall heare.

When the parlement was begun the first date of January, the pardon of the spirituall persons was signed with the kings hand, and sent to the lords, which in time convenient assented to the bill, and sent it to the commons in the lower house. Now when it was read, diuers froward persons would in no wise assent to it except all men were pardoned, saying that all men which had any thing to do with the cardinall were in the same case. The wisser sort answered, that they would not compell the king to give them his pardon, & beside that it was uncharitable done of them to hurt the cleargie, and do themselves no good: therefore they aduised them to consent to the bill, and after to sue to the king for their pardon, which counsell was not followed, but they determined first to send the speaker to the king: yet they would assent to the bill.

Whereupon Thomas Audley speaker for the commons, with a convenient number of the common house, came to the kings presence, and there elo-quently declared to the king, how the commons fore lamented and bewailed their chance, to thinke or imagine themselves to be out of his gracious fauor, because that he had gracionlie given his pardon of the premunire to his spirituall subjects and not to them: therefore they most humbly besought his grace of his accustomed goodnesse and clemencie to include them in the same pardon. The king wiselie answered that he was their prince and souereigne lord, and that they ought not to restraine him of his libertie, nor to compell him to shew his mercie; for it was at his pleasure to vse the extremitie of his lawes or mitigate and pardon the same: therefore sith they denied to assent to the pardon of the spirituall persons, which pardon (he said) he might give without their assent by his great seale, he would be well aduised per he pardoned them, because he would not be noted to be compelled to it.

With this answer the speaker and the commons departed verie sorrowfull and pensive, and some light persons said that Thomas Cramwell, which was newlie come to the fauour of the king, had disclosed the secrets of the commons, which thing caused the king to be so pensive. The king like a good prince considered how sorrowfull his commons were of the answer that he made them, and thought that they were not quiet: wherefore of his owne motion he caused a pardon of the premunire to be drawne, and signed it with his hand, and sent it to the common house by Chastellier his attorneie, which bill was soon assented to. Then the commons lovinglie thanked the king, and much praised his wit, that he had denied it to them when they unthoughtlie demanded it, and had bountifullie granted it when he perceiued that they sorrowed and lamented.

While the parlement sat, on the thirtieth date of March at Westminster, there came into the common house the lord chancelor, and diuerse lords of the spirituallie and temporallie, to the number of twelue, and there the lord chancelor said: You of this two-shipfull house (I am sure) be not so ignorant, but you know well, that the king our souereigne lord hath married his brothers wife, for he was both weped and bedded with his brother prince Arthur, and therefore you may well see that he hath married his brothers wife, & this marriage be good or no manie clerkes do doubt. Wherefore the king like a ver-tuous prince willing to be satisfied in his conscience, & also for the better of his realme, hath with great deliberation consulted with profound clerkes, & hath sent my lord of London here present, to the chiefe vniuersities of all christendome, to know their opinion and iudgement in that behalfe. And although that the vniuersities of Cambridge and Oxford had bene sufficient to discuss the cause, yet because they be in his realme, and to avoid all suspicion of parcial-tie he hath sent into the realme of France, Italie, the popes dominions and Venecians, to know their iudgement in that behalfe, which haue concluded, written, and sealed their determinations according as you shall heare read: When Sir Brian Luke took out of a booke certeine writings sealed, and read them word by word as after in such translated out of Latine into the English tongue.

Determinations of diuerse vniuer-sities touching the unlawfulnessse of the kings marriage, and first the determination of the vniuersite of Orleance.

¶ It long since there were put forth to vs the college of doctors, regents of the vni-uersitie of Orleance, these two questions that folloio. The first, whether it be lawfull by the law of God for the brother to take to wife that woman whom his brother hath left: The second, if this be forbidden by the law of God, whether this prohibition of the law of God may be remitted by the pope his dispensation: The foresaid college of doctors regents, according to our custome and v-sage came manie times together, and did sit diuerse times upon the discussing of these foresaid doubts and questions, and did examine and weigh as much as we might diuerse and manie places, both of the old testament and the new, and also the interpreters and declarers both of the law of God and the canon law.

After we had weighed & considered all things erratie, with good leisure and deliberation we haue all determined and concluded, that these foresaid marriages cannot be attempted, nor enterprised, except a man do wrong, and plaine contrarie to the law of God;

God: yea and that although it be done by pardon and sufferance of the pope. And in witness of this conclusion and determination, we have caused this present publike writing to be signed by the scribe of our said vniuersitie, and to be strengthened & fortified with the seale of the same. Enacted in the chappell of our ladie, the annuntiation, or the good tidings that the had of Christes comming in Orleans, the yeare of our Lord 1529, the 5. date of Aprill.

The determination of the facultie of decrees of the vniuersitie of Paris.

Lawiers of Paris.

In the name of the Lord so be it. There was put forth before vs the deane and college of the right counsellfull facultie of decrees of the vniuersitie of Paris, this question: Whether that the pope might dispense, that the brother might marrie the wife that his brother hath left, if marriage betwene his brother now dead and his wife were once consummate: We the deane and college of the said facultie after manie disputations and reasons made of both sides vpon this matter, and after great and long turning and searching of booke, both of the law of God, and the popes law, and of the law ciuill, we counsell and saie that the pope hath no power to dispense in this foresaid case. In witness whereof we haue caused this present writing to be strengthened with the seale of our facultie and with the signe of our scribe or chiefe bedle. Deuen in the congregation or assemble at saint John Laterenense in Paris the second daie of Maie 1530.

The determination of ciuilians and canonists of the vniuersitie of Aniou.

Aniou.

Not long time since there were proposed vnto vs the rector and doctours regents in law canon and ciuill of the vniuersitie of Aniou, these two questions here following, that is to wit: Whether it is lawfull by the law of God & the law of nature for a man to marrie the wife of his brother, that is departed without children, so that the marriage was consummate: And againe, whether it is lawfull for the pope to dispense with such marriage: We the aforesaid rector and doctours haue according to our custome and vsage manie times communed together, and sitten to dispute these questions, and to find out the certaintie of them. And after that we had discussed and examined manie and diuerse places, as well of the law of God as of the law of man, which seemed to pertain to the same purpose, and after we had brought reasons for both parties, and examined them: all things faithfullie and after good conscience considered, and vpon sufficient deliberation and aduise-ment taken, we define and determine that neither by the law of God nor of nature, it is permitted for any christian man, no not euen with the authoritie of the se apostolike, or with anie dispensation granted by the pope, to marrie the wife that his brother hath left, although his brother be departed without children, after that the marriage is once finished and consummate. And for witness of the aforesaid things, we haue commanded the scribe of our said vniuersitie to signe this present publike instrument, and it to be fortified with the great seale of our vniuersitie. Enacted in the church of saint Peter in Aniou, the yeare of our Lord 1530, the 7 date of Maie.

The determination of the facultie of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Paris.

Paris.

The deane and the facultie of the holie diuinitie of the vniuersitie of Paris, to all them to whom this present writing shall come, wisheth safetie in our sauour Iesu Christ, which is the verie true salfetie. Where of late there is risen a great controuersie of great difficultie, vpon the marriage betwene the most noble Henric the eight king of England, defender of the faith, and lord of Ireland, &c. and the noble ladie Katharine queene of England, daughter to the catholike king Ferdinand, which marriage was not onelie contract betwene him and his former husband, but also consummate and finished by carnall intermedling.

This question also was proposed to vs to discusse and examine according to iustice and truth, that is to saie: Whether to marrie him that one brother dead without children hath left, being so prohibited by the law of God and nature, that it can not be lawfull by the popes dispensation, that any christian man should marrie the wife that his brother hath left: We the foresaid deane and facultie calling to our remembrance, how vertuous, and how holie a thing, and how agreeable to our profession, vnto our dutie of loue and charitie. It is for vs to shew the waie of iustice and right, of vertue and honestie, to them which desire to lead and passe ouer their life in the law of our Lord with pure and quiet conscience; could not but be readie to satisfie so honest and iust requests: wherevpon after our old wont, we came together vpon our oth in the church of S. Spaturine, and there for the same cause had a solemne masse with deuout praier to the Holie-ghost.

And also we toke an oth, euery man to deliuer and to studie vpon the foresaid question, as should be to the pleasure of God & according to conscience. And after diuerse & manie sessions or sittings, which were had and continued in the church of saint Spaturine, and also in the college called Sorbon, from the eight daie of June to the second daie of Iulie; when we had searched and examined thorough and thorough, with as much diligence as we could, and with such reuerence and religion or conscience as becommeth in such a matter, both the booke of holie scripture, and also the most approued interpreters of the same: finally the generall and synodall councils, decrees and constitutions of the sacre and holie church, which by long custome hath bene received and approbate.

We the foresaid deane and facultie, disputing vpon the foresaid question, and making answer to the same, and that after the iudgement and full consent of the most part of the said facultie, haue concluded and determined, that the foresaid marriage with the brothers wife, departing without children, be so forbidden both by the law of God & of nature, that the pope hath no power to dispense with such marriages, whether they be contract or to be contract. And for credence, belcefe, and witness of this our assertion and determination, we haue caused the seale of our facultie, with our notaries signe, to be put vnto this present writing. Dated in our generall congregation that we keepe by an oth at saint Spaturines, the yeare of our Lord 1530, the second daie of Iulie.

The determination of the vniuersitie of Burges in Berrie or Biturs.

We the deane and facultie of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Burges (because we will do according to the example of S. Paule doctour of the gentiles, which doth likewise) will begin our writing with praier for all the beloued of God, among whom you most deare readers, vnto whom we write, be called: grace, peace, and quietnesse of conscience come to you from God the father, and from our Lord Iesu Christ. While we were gathered together together all into one place (in the octaves of Whitsuntide) both in bodie and mind, and were sitting in the house of the said deane, there was a question put to us againe, which had bene proposed to us oftentimes before, being no small question, which was this: Whether the brother taking the wife of his brother now dead, and the marriage once consummate and perfect, both a thing unlawfull or no?

Donon

At the last when we had sought for the truth of the thing, and had perceiued and found it out by much labour and studie of euerie one of vs by himselfe, and by much and often turning of holie booke, euerie one of vs not corrupt, whereby we might the lesse o-beie the truth, began as the holie ghost did put in his mind, to giue euerie man one arbitrement and sentence, which was this. I haue well perceiued in ve-rie truth, without regard or respect of anie person, that those persons which be rehearsed in the 18 chapter of the Leuiticall law, be forbidden by the verie law of nature to contract matrimonte together, and that this law can in no wise be released by anie au-thoritie of anie man, by the which there is made an abominable discouering of his brothers foulnessse.
And this is the signe of our common bedell or notarie, and the seals of our foresaid facultie put vnto this present writing the 10 daie of June, in the yeare of our Lord 1530. And because the foot of our writing shall be of one forme and fashion with the head, as we began with prayer, so let vs end after the example of S. Paule that we spake of before, and saie, the grace and fauour of our Lord Iesu Christ, the charitie and loue of God and the communication of the holie ghost be with you all, Amen.

The determination of the diuines in the popes vniuersitie of Bononie.

Semin.

GOD best and mightiest taught first the old law and testament with his owne mouth, to forme and fashion according to loue and charitie the ma-ners and life of men. And secondarily the same God did take after wards manhood vpon him for to be the redemer of man, and so made the new law or new testament, not onlie to forme and fashion according to loue and charitie the life and maners of men, but also to take awaie and to declare doubts, the which did arise in manie cases, which when they be once clerelie determined, shall helpe greatly to perfect vertue and godnesse, that is to saie, to perfect loue and charitie.

Wherefore we thought it euermore, that it should be our part to follow these most holie doctrines and lawes of our father of heauen, and that we lightned by the light of God aboue & of the holie ghost, should giue our sentence and iudgement in high and doubt-full matters, after that we haue once leifurelie and sufficientlie taken aduifement vpon the cause, and haue clerelie searched out and opened the thing by many reasons and writings of holie fathers, as well for the one part as for the other, doing nothing (as here as we can) rashlie or without deliberation.
Wherefore where certeine great and noble men did instantlie desire vs, that we would with all diligence possible looke for this case that after insuech, & afterwards to giue our iudgement vpon the same, according to most equitie, right, and conscience, sic-king onlie to the truth.

All the doctozs of diuinitie of this vniuersitie, when we had euerie one by himselfe examined the matter at home in our houses, came all together into one place, and there treated vpon it manie daies with as much cunying and learning as we could, we anon looked on the case together, we examined it together, we compared all things together, we handling euerie thing by it selfe, did trie them euen as you would saie by line and rule, we brought forth all maner of reasons which we thought could be brought for the contrarie part, and afterward solved them, yea euen the reasons of the most reuerend father cardinal Caietane, yea and moreover the Deuterono-mic dispensation of stirring vp the brothers sed, and tho:tie all other manner of reasons and opinions of the contrarie part, as manie as seemed to belong to this purpose.

And this question that was asked of vs, was this: Whether it was forbidden onlie by the ordinance of the church, or else by the law of God, that a man might not marrie the wife left of his brother departed without children? And if it were commanded by both the lawes not to be done, whether the pope may dispense with anie man to make such ma-riage? The which question now that we haue examined both by our selfe secretlie, and also openlie as diligentlie and exactlie as we could possible, and discussed it after the best manner that our wits would serue: we determine, giue iudgement, and saie, and as trillie as we can we witnesse, and without anie doubt doo steadfastlie hold, that this marriage should be horrible, accursed, and to be cried out vpon, and utterlie abhominable not onlie for a christian man, but for an infidell, vnfaithfull or heathen.

And that it is prohibited vnder grieuous paines and punishments by the law of God, of nature, and of man, and that the pope, though that he almost may doe all things, vnto whome Christ did giue the keyes of the kingdome of heauen, hath no power to giue a dispensation to anie man for to contract such marriage for anie manner of cause, consideration or suggestion: and all we be readie at all times & in all places to defend & mainteine the truth of this our conclusion, In witnesse whereof we haue made this present writing, and haue fortified the same both with the seal of our vniuersitie, and also with the seal of our college of doctozs of diuinitie, and haue subscribed & signed it with our generall and accustomed subscription in the cathedrall church of Bononie, the tenth daie of June, the yeare of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the facultie of diuinitie in the vniuersitie of Padua in Italie.

They that haue written for the maintenance of the catholike faith, affirme that God (best and mightiest) did giue the precepts & commandements of the old law with his owne mouth, to be an example for vs, wherein we might see how we should order our life and maners, and this God had done before he became man: and after that he had put vpon him our manhood, & was become redemer or buier of mankind, he made the new law or testament, and of his mere liberalitie did giue it vs, not onlie for the cause aforesaid; but also to take awaie and declare all manner of doubts and questions that might arise, the which once opened and declared, that their verie true meaning is, to the intent that thereby we might be made perfectlie god, which be greatlie fruitfull vnto vs and wholesome.

And seeing that this was the mind of God in making these lawes, it hath bene our intent, and euermore shall be, as it becometh christian men, to follow these most solemnne ordinances of the most high workemaster God, & the helpe of his light, that is aboue the capacitie of nature, to offer our iudgement in all manner of doubts and hard questions. After we had once considered the thing after the best manner, and had by sufficient leifure made it clere by manie evident reasons of both parties, and by manie authorities

theologies of the fathers of the church, determining nothing (as nere as we can) rashly or without convenient deliberation. Seeing therefore that certeine great orators or ambassadoys did humbly require and praye vs, that we would vouchsafe to search out with all the diligence we could this case following, and afterwards to giue our sentence upon the same, plainlie and simplie looking onelie on the truth.

After the doctors of diuinitie of this vniuersitie came together, and after that we had euerie man examined the thing particularlie in our owne houses, and had beaten it with all learning and cunning that we were able: anon when we were together, we considered, examined, and weighed all things by themselves, and brought in all manner of reasons, which we thought might by anie meanes be made to the contrarie, and without all colour or cloke did wholie and clerie dissolue them and take them awate. And amongst all, the dispensation by the law of Deuteronomie, of stirring by the brothers seed, and all manner other reasons and determinations to the contrarie, that seemed to vs to pertaine anie thing to that purpose, we utterly confuted and dispatched them.

The question that is put vnto vs is this: Whether to marrie the wife of our brother departed without children, is forbidden onelie by the law of the church, or by the law of God also? And if it be forbidden by both these laws, whether the pope maye dispense with anie man for such matrimonie or no? Which question now that we haue discussed it, and as farre as we could, haue made it clere, both by natlie euerie man by himselfe, and after all together openlie, we saie, iudge, decree, witnesse, and for a truth affirme, that such marriage is no marriage; yea and that it is abhorred and cursed of euerie christian man, and to be abhominable as a grieuous sinne; and that it is as clere as can be forbidden vnder most cruell penalties by the lawes of nature, of God, and of man; and that the pope, vnto whome the keyes of the kingdome of heauen be committed by Christ the sonne of God, hath no power to dispense by the right of law for anie cause, suggestion, or excuse, that anie such matrimonie should be contracted.

For these things which be forbidden by the law of God, be not vnderneath his power, but aboue it; nor he is not the becar of God as concerning those things, but onelie in such things as God hath not determined himselfe in his law; but hath left them to the determination and ordinance of man. And to mainteine the truth of this our sentence and conclusion, and for the most certeine and vndoubted defense of the same, we all of one mind and accord shall at all times and in euerie place be readie. In witnesse whereof we haue made this writing, and haue authorized it with the accustomed seale of our vniuersitie and also of our college of diuines. Dated at Padua in the church of the heremites of saint Augustine the first daie of Julie, in the yeare of our Lord 1530.

The determination of the vniuersitie of Tholose.

Tholose.

There was treated in our vniuersitie of Tholose a verie hard question: Whether it be lawfull for the brother to marrie his which had bene wife to his brother now departed, & that without children: There was besides this an other thing that troubled vs verie sore; Whether, if the pope which hath the cure of Christs flocke, would by his dispensation (as men call it) suffer this, that then at the least wile it might be lawfull? The rector of the vniuersitie called to counsell all the doctors regents, that were at that time at Tholose for to shew thei minds on this question, and that not once, but twise: for he iudged that counsell giuing ought not to be hastied nor done by on head, and that we had need of time and space to do anie thing convenientlie and as it ought to be.

At the last there came together into one place all the best learned and cunningest doctors, both of holie diuinitie, and also doctors that were best learned in both lawes; yea, and finalie as manie as had anie experience in anie matter, and were able to do anie thing either by iudgement and discretion, or by eloquence or their excellent wits; and there did sweare that they would obeie the sacred and holie counsels, and would follo to the decrees of the fathers, which no man that hath anie god conscience will violat or breake. And so euerie man said his mind, & the matter was debated and reasoned diffuselie and at large for both parts.

In conclusion, we fell so fast to this point, that this was the sentence and determination that our vniuersitie, with one voice of all, did determine and conclude with most pure and clere conscience, and defiled with no manner of lenen of corruption: That it is lawfull for no man, neither by the law of God, nor by the law of nature, to take his wife that his brother hath left: and seeing that it maie not be done by the law of God nor of nature, we answered all, that the pope can lose no man from that law, nor dispense with him. And as for that thing can not be contrarie to our sentence and verid, that the brother in old time was compelled by the law of Deuteronomie to marrie the brothers wife departed without issue. For this law was but a shadow and a figure of things to come, which vanished awate as soon as euer the light and truth of the gospell appeared. And because these things be thus, we haue giuen our sentence after this forme aboue, and haue commanded the same to be signed by our notarie which is our secretarie, and to be fortified and authorized by the putting to of our authentical seale of our vniuersitie as foresaid, at Tholose the calends of first daie of October, the yeare of our Lord 1530.

After these determinations were read, there were shewed aboue an hundred books bydon by doctors of strange regions, which all agreed the kings marriage to be vnlawfull, which were not read, for the daie was spent. Then the chancelor said: Now you of this common house maie report in your countries what you haue seene and heard, & then all men shall openlie perceiue, that the king hath not attempted this matter of will and pleasure, as some strangers report, but onlie for the discharge of his conscience and suertie of the succession of his realme: this is the cause of our repaire hither to you, and now will we depart.

When these determinations were published, all wise men in the realme much abhorred that marriage: but women, and such as were more willfull than wise or learned, spake against the determination, and said that the vniuersities were corrupt and infected so to do, which is not to be thought. The king himselfe sore lamented his chance, and made no manner of mirth nor pastime as he was wont to do. He dined and resorted to the quene as he was accustomed, and diminished nothing of his estate, and much loued and cherished their daughter the lady Marie: but in no wise he would not come to his bed. When Easter began to draw nere, the parlement for that time ended, and was proroged till the last daie of March, in the next yere. In the parlement afore said was an act made, that whosoever did poison any person, should be boiled in hot water to the death: which act was made, because one Richard Rouse, in the parlement time had poisoned diuerse persons at the bishop shop of Rochester's place, which Richard, according to the same act, was boyled in Smithfield the teneber wednesdaie following, to the terrible example of all other.

When the vniuersitie aforesaid, and a great number of clearks and well learned men had determined the kings marriage to be vnlawfull, detestable, and against Gods law (as you haue heard) the king willing the quene to haue knowledge of the same, sent to his diuerse lords of the counsell, the last daie of Maie, being the wednesdaie in Whitsun weeke: the which Lords, in his chamber at Greenwich, declared to him all the determinations (as you haue heard) and asked him whether he would (for the quietnesse of the kings conscience) put the matter to foure prelates, and foure temporall lords of this realme, or abide by his appeal: The quene answered: The king my father which concluded my marriage, I am sure, was not so ignorant but he asked counsell of clearks and well learned men before he married me the second time: for if he had had any doubt in my marriage, he would not haue disturbed so great a treasure as he did, & then all the doctors in a manner agreed my marriage to be good, inasmuch that the pope himselfe, which knew best what was to be done, did both dispense and ratifie the second marriage, against whose doings I maruell that any person will speake or write.

And as to the determination of the vniuersitie, I am a woman, and lacke wit and learning to answer to them, but to God I commit the iudgement of that, whether they haue done iustlie or partiallie: for this I am sure, that neither the kings father, nor my father would haue condescended to our marriage, if it had bene declared to be vnlawfull. And where you saie that I should put the cause to eight persons of this realme for quietnesse of the kings conscience, I pray God send his grace a quiet conscience. And this shall be your answer: that I saie I am his lawfull wife, and to him lawfullie married, and by the order of holie church I was to him espoused as his true wife (although I was not so worthy) and in that point I will abide till the court of Rome, which was puaie to the beginning, haue made thereof a determination and final ending. With this answer the lords departed to the king, which was sozie to heare of his wilfull opinion, and in especiall that the more trusted in the popes law, than in keeping the precepts of God.]

Forasmuch as merchant strangers, bringing their wares into the realme, did receiue readie monie for them, and euer deliuered the same monie to other merchants by exchange, not employing it vpon the commodities of the realme, a proclamation was set forth and made, that no person should make any exchange, contrarie to the meaning of a statute ordeined in the time of king Richard the second: by reason whereof, clothes and other commodities of this realme shortly after were well sold, till they fell to exchange againe, and that this proclamation was forgotten. After Whitsuntide, the king & the quene removed to Windsor, and there continued till the fourteenth of Iulie, on the which daie the king removed to Woodstocke, and left the quene at Windsor, where she remained a while, & after removed to the Pope, and from thence to Stamford, whither the king sent to his diuerse lords, to aduise him to be conformable to the law of God, shewing sundrie reasons to persuaide him to their purpose, and one among the rest used for that present this communication, as I find it left in writing, in the behaue of the king.

Madam, the kings highnesse hath commanded vs repairing vnto you, on his highnesse behalfe to shew vnto you thus much, that his maiestie hauing heretofore sent vnto you a great number of his counsellors and learned men, to declare what great iniuries and wrongs by your procurement and solicitation were and yet be done vnto his maiestie and this his realme, in citing his highnesse in his owne person, or by his proxy to appeare at Rome, to make answer to your sute, contrarie to the determination of all lawes, as not onelie the famous vniuersities of oxenford, as Paris and Pleance, but also as the most part of the learned men here or elsewhere in that facultie affirme, and as maister deane learned in that facultie can and will testifie vnto you, on his conscience, if it shall please you to heare him, and contrarie also to his estate roiall, and to the priuileges and prerogatiues of this his graces realme.

His highnesse perceiuing your grace not to regard their aduertisements in right and iustice, but still to perseuere and continue, and rather increase your iniurious procurements and solicitations in that behalfe, is not a little græued & displeased with your continuance and prosecution of this iniurie and manifest wrong towards his maiestie, and this his graces realme. The continuance of which your vnkind dealing hath compelled his highnesse not onelie to absteine from the sight of you, but also to forbear to receiue any of your tokens, which doe nothing else but renew and refresh his displeasure, inforcing him also to an indignation, to see tokens offered and sent by him, who continueth in prosecuting of so notable an iniurie and manifest wrong towards his maiestie, & this his realme, perceiuing also what boldnesse other outward princes might take to mistreat his highnesse, when they should vnderstand how his maiestie suffereth himselfe to be wronged by his pretended subject, and so notable wrong to be done to this his realme.

And vpon this cause and ground, like as the kings highnesse these certeine moneths past, hath disceuered your grace from his presence, so he intendeth yet to continue, and hath commanded vs to shew you, that his pleasure is ye shall be at your libertie, & (as ye shall thinke most commodious) repaire to either of these three places, his manour of Woking, his manour of Stamford, or the monastrie of Wilham, and there to continue without further molesting of his highnesse with your sutes or requests to the contrary, as wherewith ye shall not preuaile; but more and more molesting and troubling his highnesse, procure his further displeasure towards you.

And though percase the pope shall desire, as perceiuing now the matter of right he will, yet the kings highnesse cannot digest in his stomach this iniurie done, not to be amended or reformed at your graces procurement, but your grace rather suing and instanting the contrarie. And this is the charge, madam, which the kings highnesse hath committed vnto vs, to be spoken vnto you on his highnesse behalfe. And to saie to you as of my selfe, concerning the iustnesse of the kings cause, as I haue heretofore said, I shall now repeat and rehearse againe vnto your grace; which is, that your grace being knowne by prince Arthur, ye be not lawfull wife to the kings highnesse our soveraigne lord in my conscience. This speech ended, others of the companie used their persuasorie talke to the quene: whose words notwithstanding did so little moue her, that the good stiffele in her first opinion, that she was his true and lawfull wife, and from the same would not by any meanes be removed.]

The priests of London being called afore the bishop that would haue had them contributaries to the payment of the hundred thousand pounds, granted to the king for his pardon of the premunice, kept such a stir in breaking into the chapter house (where the bishop sat) all at once, and striking and buffeting the bishops servants which gave them evil language, that the bishop was faine to give them his blessing, and suffer them to depart in quiet for that time. But after, upon complaint made to the lord chancellor, divers of them and of their partakers were arrested, and committed to prison, to the number of sixtene priests, and five laie men, some to the Tower, and some to the Fleet, and to other places, where they remained long after. ¶ Thomas Bilneie, bachelloe of law, was burnt at Dorwich the nineteenth of August, and the fourth of December sir Rics Griffin was beheaded at the Tower hill, and his man named John Hetwos was drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered.

The five and twentieth of Maie, betwene London and Crauesend, were taken two great fishes called whorlepoles, male and female. ¶ In this season, there was in the realme much preaching, one learned man holding against another, namelie in the matter of the kings marriage. After Christmas, the parlement began to sit againe, in the which the commons found themselves soe greued with the crueltie of ordinaries, that called inche before them ex officio. At length, a booke was drawne of all the grieues of the commons, for the cruell denieance of the cleargie, and the same deliuered to the king by the speaker, humble beseeching him in the name of all the commons, to take such dition therein, as to his high wisdom might seeme most expedient. The king answered, that he would take advise, and heare the partie accused speake. He was not so reddie to gratifie the commons in their requests, as some thought that he would have bene, if they had not tricked and refused to passe a statute, which he had sent to them touching wards and primer feasons.

After this, was the parlement proroged till the tenth of Aprill. In this parlement was an act made, that bishops should paie no more annates or monies for their bulles to the pope: for it was proued that there had bene paid for bulles of bishops, since the fourth yeare of Henrie the seventh an hundred threescore thousand pounds sterling, beside other dispensations & pardons. When the parlement was begun againe after Easter, there was a motion made to helpe the king with monie toward his charges about the building of houses, piles, and other fortifications, upon the borders fore against Scotland, both for better habitation to be had there, & also for the restraint of the Scots that used to make inuasions. There was therefore a fifteenth granted, but not enacted at this session, because that the king began a pestilence in Westminster, whereof the parlement was proroged, as ye shall heare in the next yeare.

In this yeare was an old toll demanded in Flanders of Englishmen called the toll of the hound, which is a river and a passage. The toll is twelve pence of a fardell. It had bene often demanded, but neuer paid, insomuch that king Henrie the seventh for the demand of that toll, prohibited all his subjects to keepe any mart at Antwerpe or Barrow, till it was promised that upon their returne the said toll should neuer be demanded. The king sent doctor Knight, and others to Calis, whither came the emperours commissioners, and there (upon talks) the matter was put in suspension for a time. The king having purchased of the cardinall after his attendure in the premonstratour his house at Westminster, called Bozke place, and got a confirmation of the cardinals feoffment thereof, made of the chapter of the cathedrall church of Bozke, purchased this yeare also all the medows about saint James, and there made a faire mansion and a parke for his greater commoditie & pleasure.

And because he had a great affection to the said house at Westminster, he bestowed great cost in going forward with the building thereof, and changed the name, so that it was after called the kings palace of Westminster.

The fourteenth daie of Maie, the parlement was proroged till the fourth of february next coming. After which prorogation, sir Thomas Poore, chancellor of England, after long lutes made to the king to be discharged of his office, the sixteenth of Maie he deliuered to the king at Westminster the great seale of England, and was with the kings favour discharged, which seale the king kept till monday in Whit-sunweeke, on which daie he dubbed Thomas Audleie speaker of the parlement, knight, and made him lord keeper of the great seale, and so he was called. ¶ The king being informed, that the pope and the french king should meet in the beginning of the next spring at Sparteles, he thought good for diuerse considerations, to speake with the french king in his owne person; before the pope and he should come together: whereupon it was concluded, that in October following, both the princes should meet betwene Calis and Bullongne. Wherefore the king of England sent out his letters to his nobles, prelates, and servants, commanding them to be reddie at Canturburie the first and twentieth of September, to passe the seas with him, for the accomplishment of the interuiew betwixt him and the french king.

On the first of September being sundae, the king being come to Windsor, created the lady Anne Bullongne marchionesse of Denbroke, and gave to her one thousand pounds land by the yeare; and that solemnitie finished, he rode to the college, where after that seruice was ended, a new league was concluded and sworn betwene the king, and the french king, Messire Pomorais the french ambassador being present. On the tenth of October, the king came to Douer, and on the eleuenth daie in the morning at thre of the clocke hee took shipping at Douer rode, and before ten of the same daie, he with the lady marchionesse of Denbroke landed at Calis, where he was receiued with all honour, and lodged at the Eschequer. There came to him whilst he laie in Calis, diuerse lords from the french court, and amongst other the lord great maister of France, and the archbishop of Roane, which were honorable of him receiued, and with them he took a daie and place of meeting with the king their maister.

Whereupon the one and twentieth of October, he marched out of Calis, accompanied with the dukes of Suffolke and Suffolke, the marquesses of Dorset and Cresser, the earles of Arundell, Arford, Surrey, Essex, Darbie, Rutland, Huntington, and Suffolk, with diuerse viscounts, barons, knights of the garter, and other of the nobilitie and gentlemen freshlie appareled, and richlie trimmed; and coming to the place appointed, he there met with the french king, who was come to receue him with all honoz that might be: and after salutations and embracings used in most louing maner, the king of England went with the french king to Bullongne; and by the waie was encountered by the french kings three sons, and other great lords that attended them, with welcomming the king of England; he them gentlie receiued, and so all this noble companie came to Bullongne, where the king of England and his nobles were so noble intertained, feasted, banketed, and cheared, that wonder it was to consider the great plentie of viands, spices, wines, and all other prouision necessarie for man and horse, so that there was no more but aske and haue; and no man durst take any monie, for the french king paid for all.

The king being informed, that the pope and the french king should meet in the beginning of the next spring at Sparteles, he thought good for diuerse considerations, to speake with the french king in his owne person; before the pope and he should come together: whereupon it was concluded, that in October following, both the princes should meet betwene Calis and Bullongne.

The five and twentieth of October, whilst the king laie thus in Bullongne, the French king called a chapter of the companions of his order named St. Michael, of whom the king of England was one, and to there elected the dukes of Borsfolke and Suffolke to be companions of the same order: and being brought to the chapter, they had their collars delivered to them, and were sworn to the statutes of the order, their obedience to their sovereign lord allwaie reserved. Thus the two kings laie in Bullongne, Mondaye, Tuesdaye, and Thursdaye: and on Fridaye the five and twentieth of October, they departed out of Bullongne to Calis. Without the towne of Calis about the distance of two miles, the duke of Richmond the kings bafe son, with a great companie of noble men, which had not bene at Bullongne, met them, and saluting the French king, embraced him in most honorable and courteous manner.

Thus they passed forward, and came to Fletwigham bridge, and so to Calis, where was such provision made for the receiving of them, as well for lodgings, plate, and all such other furniture of household, as also of all sorts of viands, wines, and other necessities, that it seemed wonderfull: in so much as the proportion assigned to the French lords oftentimes was so abundant, that they refused a great part thereof. The French kings traine was twelve hundred horses, or rather above. But there was lodging enough in Calis, not onlie for them, but also for manie other, so that there were above eight thousand persons lodged within the towne in that season. The French king coming thither on the Fridaye, arrived there till Tuesdaye the thirtieth of October, and then departed; the king of England accompanieng him out of the towne, till he came to enter into the French ground, and there either took leave of other with right princelie countenance, loving behaviour, and so hartie words, that all men rejoiced that saw them.

Whilst the two kings laie in Calis, the lord Anas de Pontmoyancie earle of Beaumont, great master of the French kings house, & Philip de Chabot erle of Petoblance, great admirall of France, were admitted into the order of the garter, the king calling a chapter for that purpose, of the knights of that order, at the which the French king was present, and wore a blew mantell, because he was one of the same order. Whilst the king was in the French kings dominion, he had the upper hand, and likewise had the French king in his dominion. And as the French king paid all the Englishmens charges at Bullongne: so did the king of England at Calis. There rose about the same season such fow weather, storms and rigorous winds, continuing for the more part at north and northwester, that the king staid at Calis for a convenient wind till Tuesdaye the thirtieth of November at midnight, and then taking his ship, landed at Dover the next daie about five of the clocke in the morning. And herewith upon his returne, he married princelie the ladie Anne Bullongne the same daie, being the fourteenth daie of November, and the feast daie of saint Erkenwald; which marriage was kept so secret, that verie few knew it till Easter next ensuing, when it was perceived that she was with child.

When the king should passe over the sea, he considered that the Scots would haplie attempt somewhat to the prejudice of his subjects in his absence, which liked not (he being within the realme) to rob both by sea and land. Wherefore to resist their malice, he appointed sir Arthur Warchie with three hundred men to go unto Berwicke, to defend the borders from invasions of the Scots, who shortly after by the middle marches entered the realme, and came to a place called Fowberie, and firing certeine villages in their waie, returned. The erle of Angus as then was at Berwicke as a banished man; and the said sir Arthur determined to revenge this displeasure: and thereupon with foure hundred men made a rode into Scotland, and set a village on fire. Then immediatlie assembled together eight hundred Scots, and began to approach nere to the English men, who perceiving them, caused their trumpet to blow the retreat; and the erle and twentie with him showed himselfe on an hill, even in the face of the Scots, and the trumpet blew at their backs, so that the Scots thought that there had bene two companies, which caused the Scots to flee, and the English men followed and slew a great number of them, and took manie of them prisoners.

After Christmasse sir Thomas Audleie lord keeper of the great seale was made high chancelor of England. And when the parlement began, because the office of the speaker was void, Humfreie Wiling, field of Greis inne was chosen speaker. In this parlement was an act made, that no person should appeale for any cause out of this realme to the court of Rome, but from the commissarie to the bishop, and from the bishop to the archbishop, and from the archbishop to the king; and all causes of the king to be tried in the upper house of the convocation. It was also enacted the same time, that quene Katharine should no more be called quene, but princeesse Dowager, as the widow of prince Arthur. In the season of the last summer died William Warham archbishop of Canturburie, and then was named to that sea Thomas Cranmer the kings chapleine, a man of good learning, and of a vertuous life, which latelie before had bene ambassadoe from the king to the pope.

After that the king persecuted his new wife to be with child, he caused all officers necessarie to be appointed to hir, and so on Easter even she went to hir closet openlie as quene; and then the king appointed the daie of hir coronation to be kept on Whitundaye next following: and writings were sent to all shiriffs, to certifie the names of men of fortie pounds to receive the order of knighthood, or else to make fine. The assentment of the fine was appointed to Thomas Cromwell, master of the kings new house, & counsellor to the king, a man noble received into high favour. He so used the matter, that a great summe of monie was raised to the kings use by those fines. The matter of the quenes appeale whereunto she still stucked, and by no means could be removed from it, was communed of, both in the parlement house, and also in the convocation house, where it was so handled, that manie were of opinion, that not onlie hir appeale, but also all other appeales made to Rome were void and of none effect: for that in ancient councels it had bene determined, that a cause rising in one province should be determined in the same.

This matter was opened with all the circumstances to the ladie Katharine Dowager (for so was she then called) the which persisted still in hir former opinion, and would revoke by no meanes hir appeale to the court of Rome. Whereupon the archbishop of Canturburie accompanied with the bishops of London, Winchester, Bath, Exeter, and divers other learned men in great number, rode to Dunstable, which is six miles from Amptill, where the princeesse Dowager laie, and there by one doctor Lee she was cited to appeare before the said archbishop in cause of matrimonie in the said towne of Dunstable, and at the daie of appeareance she appeared not, but made default, and so she was called peremptorie.

forie currie date fiftene daies together, and at the last, for lacke of appearance, by the assent of all the learned men there present, she was divorced from the king, and the marriage declared to be void and of none effect. Of this divorce and of the kings marriage with the ladie Anne Bullongne men spake diuerse-lie; some said the king had done wisely, and so as became him to do in discharge of his conscience. Other offer wise iudged, and spake their fancies as they thought good: but when euerie man had talked enough, then were they quiet, and all rested in good peace.

In Aprile pope Clement sent an orator to the king, requiring him to appeare personallie at the generall councell which he had appointed to be kept the yere following. But when his commission was shewed, at the earnest request of the king, there was neither place nor time specified for the keeping of that coun-cell; and so with an uncerteine answer to an uncerteine demand he departed, but not bareloaded. The king understanding that the pope, the emperor, & the French king shuld meet at Spise in Iulie following, appointed the duke of Norfolk, the lord Rochford brother to queene Anne, sir William Paulet con-trollor of his house, sir Anthoine Browne, and sir Francis Wyan knights, to go in ambassage to the French king, and both to accompanie him to Spise, and also to commune with the pope there concerning his state in the kings divorce. These worthy personages made their prouision readie; and so with the number of eight score horses they went to Douer, and passing ouer to Calis, toke their waie through France, to accomplish their ambassage as they had in commandement.

In the beginning of Aprile, the king caused open proclamations to be made, that all men that claimed to do anie service, or execute anie office at the solemne feast of the coronation by the waie of tenure, grant, or prescription, should put their grant thre weekes after Easter in the Starre chamber before Charles duke of Suffolke, for that time high steward of England, and the lord chancellor and other commissioners. The duke of Norfolk claimed to be erle marshall, and to exercise his office at that feast; the erle of Arundell claimed to be high butler, and to exercise the same; the erle of Oxford claimed to be chamberlaine; the vicount Wille claimed to be pantler; the lord Aburgauennie to be chiefe larderer; and the lord Wate claimed to be almoner, and sir Henrie What knight claimed to be trower. All these noble personages desired their offices with their fees.

Beside these, the maior of London claimed to serue the queene with a cup of gold; and a cup of assaite of the same, and that twelue citizens should attend on the cupbord, and the maior to haue the cup and cup of assaite for his labor: which petition was allowed. The five ports claimed to beare a canopic ouer the queens head the daie of the coronation with fourte guilt belles, and to haue the same for a reward, which to them was allowed. Diuerse other put in petie claimers which were not allowed, because they seemed onlie to be done at the kings coronation. All this season great purueance was made of all manner of vittells: & lords, knights & squiers were sent for out of all countries, which came to London at their daie with a great number of people.

After that the kings highnesse had addressed his gratious letters to the maior and communalie of the citie, significg to them, that his pleasure was to solemnize and celebrate the coronation of his most deare and welbeloued wife queene Anne, at Westminster the Whitsundae next ensuing, willed them to make preparation, as well to fetch hir grace from Greenwich to the Tower by water, as to see the citie adorned and garnished with pagants in places accustomed, for the honoz of hir grace. When she shuld be carried from the Tower to Westminster, there was a common counsell called, and commandement was giuen to the haberdashers (of which craft the maior sir Stephan Boccoke then was) that they should prepare a barge for the bachelors, with a waile and a foist, garnished with banners and streamers likewise, as they use to do. When the maior is presented at Westminster on the morrow after Simon and Jude. Also all other crafts were commanded to prepare barges, and to garnish them, not alonely with their banners accustomed, but also to decke them with targets by the sides of the barges, and so set by all such seemelie banners and ban-nerets as they had in their halles, or could get met to furnish their said barges, and euerie barge to haue minstrellie: according to which commandements great preparation was made for all things necessarie for such a noble triumph.

The nineteenth daie of Aprile, the maior and his brethren all in scarlet, and such as were knights had collars of S S, and the remnant hauing god chains, and the counsell of the citie with them, assembled at saint Martine hill, and at one of the clocke descended to the new staire to their barge, which was garnished with manie goodlie banners and streamers, and rich-lie couered. In which barge were shalmes, bagbu-shes, and diuerse other instruments, which contin-allie made goodlie harmonie. After that the maior and his brethren were in their barge, seeing that all the companies to the number of fiftie barges were readie to wait upon them, they gaue commandement to the companies, that no barge should rowe nearer to another than twise the length of the barge vpon a great paine. And to see the order kept, there were thre light sheries prepared, and in euerie one of them two officers to call on them to keepe their order, after which commandement giuen, they set forth in order as hereafter is described.

First before the maiors barge was a foist or waile full of ordinance, in which foist was a great bagon continuallie mouing and casting wild fire: and round about the said foist stood terrible monsters and wild men casting fire, and making hideous noises. Next after the foist a good distance came the maiors barge: on whose right hand was the bachelors barge, in the which were trumpets and diuerse other melodious instruments; the decks of the said barge and the sailyards, with the top castles were hanged with rich cloth of gold and silke: at the foreship and the sterne were two great banners rich, beaten with the armes of the king and the queene, and on the top castell also was a long streamer netolie beaten with the said armes. The sides of the barge were set full of flags and banners of the deuises of the companie of the haberdashers and merchants aduenturers, and the coards were hanged with innumerable pennelles, hauing little belles at the ends, which made a goodlie noise and a goodlie sight, wauering in the wind. On the outside of the barge were thre dozen sentillions in mettall of arms of the king and the queene, which were beate upon square bucram diuided, so that the right side had the kings colours, and the left side the queenes, which sentil-lions were fastened on the clothes of gold and siluer, hanging on the decks on the left hand.

On the left hand of the maior was another foist, in the which was a mount, and on the same stood a white falcon crowned, vpon a roate of gold inuironed with white roses and red, which was the queens deuise; about which mount sat virgins singg and plaieng sweetlie. Next after the maior, follewed his felie wifship

fellowship the haberdashers; next after them the mercers, then the grocers, and so euerie companie in his order, and last of all the maior and shiriffes officers, euerie companie hauing melodie in his barge by himselfe, and goodlie garnished with banners, and some garnished with silke, and some with arras and rich carpets, which was a goodlie sight to behold: and in this order they rowed to Greenwich, to the point next beyond Greenwich, and there they turned backward in another order, that is to wit, the maior and shiriffes officers first, and the meanest craft next, and so ascending to the uttermost crafts in order, and the maior last, as they go to Panles at Christmas, and in that order they rowed downe toward to Greenwich towne, and there cast anchor, making great melodie.

At thre of the clocke the quene appeared in rich cloth of gold, entring into hir barge accompanied with diuerse ladies and gentlewomen: and incontinent the citizens set forwarde in their order, their minstrelles continuallie playing, and the bachelors barge going on the quenes right hand, which she toke great pleasure to behold. About the quenes barge were manie noble men, as the duke of Suffolke, the marques Dowlet, the erle of Willshire hir father, the erles of Arundell, Warbie, Rutland, Worcester, Huntingdon, Suffe, Oxford, and manie bishops and noble men, euerie one in his barge, which was a goodlie sight to behold. She thus being accompanied rowed toward the tower: and in the meane wate the ships which were commanded to lie on the shore for letting of the barges, shot diuerse peales of guns, and per the was landed, there was a marvellous shot out of the tower as ever was heard there. And at hir landing there, met with hir the lord chamberlaine with the officers of armes, and brought hir to the king, which received hir with louing countenance, at the paterne by the water side, and then she turned backe againe, and thanked the maior and the citizens with manie goodlie words, and so entred into the tower. After which entrie the citizens all this while howered before the tower, making great melodie, and went not on land, for none were assigned to land but the maior, the recorder, and two aldermen. But for to speake of the people that stood on either shore to behold the sight, he that saith it not would scarce beleue it.

On Fridaye at dinner, serued the king all such as were appointed by his highnesse to be knights of the bath, which after dinner were brought to their chambers, and that night were bathed and shynen, according to the old usage of England; and the next daie in the morning the king dubbed them according to the ceremonies thereto belonging; whose names infue, the marques Dowlet, the erle of Warbie, the lord Cliford, the lord of Water, the lord Hastings, the lord Mounteagle, Sir John Howard, the lord Waur, Sir Henrie Parker, Sir William Willshire, Sir Francis Weston, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir John Hylton, Sir Thomas Dering, Sir Henrie Russell, Sir George Fitzwilliam, Sir John Lamball, Sir Thomas Jermine.

To the intent that the horses should not stide on the pavement, nor that the people should not be hurt by horses, the high streets where the quene should passe were all grauelled from the tower to temple barre, and railed on the one side, with which railed stood the crafts along by their orders from Grace church, where the merchants of the Shildard stood till the little conduit in Cheape, where the aldermen stood: and on the other side of the street stood the constables of the citie, apparelled in velvet and silke, with great flures in their hands, to cause the people to kepe come and good order. And when the streets were somewhat ordered, the maior clothed in a gowne of crimson veluet, and a rich collar of S S S, with two spemen clad in white and red damaske, rode to the tower to giue his attendance on the quene, on whom the shiriffs with their officers did wait till they came to tower hill, where they taking their leaue, rode downe the high streets, commanding the constables to kepe come and good order kept, and so went and stood by the aldermen in Cheape.

Now before the quene and hir traine should come, Cornhill and Gracious street were hanged with fine scarlet, crimson, and other grained cloths, and in some place with rich arras, tapistrie, and carpets; and the most part of the Cheape was hanged with cloth of tissue, gold, veluet, and manie rich hangings, which made a goodlie shew, and all the windowes were replenished with ladies and gentlewomen, to behold the quene and hir traine as they should passe by. The first of the quenes companie that set forward were twelue Frenchmen, which were belonging to the French ambassado: clothed in coates of blew veluet, with flures of yellow and blew veluet, and their horses trapped with close trappers of blew farfene powdered with white crosses: after them marched gentlemen, esquires and knights two and two: after them the iudges, and after them the knights of the bath in violet gownes, with hoods purpled with miniver like doctors; after them abbats, then barons; after them bishops, then earls and marqueses; then the lord chancellor of England; after him the archbishop of Doke, and the ambassado of Venice, after him the archbishop of Canturburie and the ambassado of France, after rode two esquires of honor with robes of estat rolled and worne bauldrike-wise about their necks, with caps of estat, representing the dukes of Normandie, Aquitaine: after them rode the maior of London with his mace and garter in his cote of armes, which maior bare his mace to Westminister hall.

After all these rode the lord William Howard with the marshalles robe, deputie to his brother the duke of Suffolke marshall of England, which was ambassado then in France: and on his right hand rode Charles duke of Suffolke, for that daie high constable of England, bearing the border of silver appertaining to the office of constableness, and all the lords for the most part were clothed in crimson, blew, and all the quenes servants or officers of armes in scarlet. Next before the quene rode hir chancellor bareheaded, the sargeants and officers of armes rode on both the sides of the lords. When came the quene in a litter of white cloth of gold, not covered, nor habited, which was lead by two palfries clad in white damaske downe to the ground, head and all, led by hir footmen. She had on a circlet of white cloth of tissue, and a mantell of the same furred with ermine; hir haire hanged downe, but on hir head she had a coiffe with a circlet about it full of rich stones. Over hir was borne a canopie of cloth of gold, with foure gault staves and foure silver belles. For the bearing of which canopies were appointed sixtens halghts, foure to beare it one space on foot, and three foure another space, according to their owne appointment.

After the quene rode the lord Borough hir chamberlaine, next after him William Coffin marshall of the horses, leading a spare horse with a side saddle trapped downe with cloth of tissue. After him rode seauen ladies in crimson veluet turned by with cloth of gold and of tissue; and their horses trapped with cloth of gold, after them two chariots couered with red cloth of gold. In the first chariot were two ladies, which were the old dutchesse of Suffolke, and the old marchionesse Dowlet. In the second chariot were foure ladies all in crimson beluet. Then rode seauen ladies in the same sute, their horses trappers and all. Then came the third chariot all white, with six ladies in crimson beluet; next after them came the fourth chariot all red with eight ladies also in crimson beluet: after whom followed thirtie gentlewomen all in beluet and silke in the liuerie of their ladies, on whom they gaue their attendance. After them followed the gard in cotes of goldsmiths worke.

Summe pageants with the descriptions of their devises.

Thus they rode forth till they came to Fanchurch, where was made a pageant all with children, apparelled like merchants, which welcommed him to the citie, with two proper propositions both in French and English. And from thence he rode to Gratious church corner, where was a cobbie and a marvelous cunning pageant made by the merchants of the Stillard, for there was the mount Parnassus with the founteine of Helicon, which was of white marble, and foure streames without pipe did rise an ell high, and met together in a little cup above the founteine, which founteine ran abundantly racked withenith wine till night. On the mounteine sat Apollo, and at his feet sat Calliope, and on euery side of the mounteine sat foure muses playing on several sweet instruments, and at their feet epigrams and poesies were written in golden letters, in the which euery muse according to his propriety praised the quene.

The quene from thence passed to Leaden hall, where was a goodlie pageant with a type and a heauenlie rose, and under the type was a rose of gold set on a little mounteine intrenched with red roses and white: out of the type came downe a falcon all white & sat upon the rose, and incontinent came downe an angel with great melodie, and set a close crowne of gold on the falcons head. And in the same pageant sat saint Anne with all his kinne beneath him, and under saint Cleop sat his foure children, of the which children one made a goodlie oration to the quene of the fruitfulness of saint Anne and of his generation, trusting that like fruit should come of him. Then they passed to the conduit in Cornhill, where were three graces set in a throne; afore whom was the spring of grace continually running wine. Afores the founteine sat a poet declaring the properties of euery grace: and that done euery lady by his selfe according to his propriety, gaue to the quene a several gift of grace.

An oration made to the quene by one of the children in the pageant.

The conduit in Cheape runneth wine white and claret.

That done, they passed by the great conduit in cheape, which was newlie painted with armes of deuities out of the which conduit by a goodlie founteine set at the one end ran continually wine both white and claret all that afternone, and so he rode to the Standard which was richlie painted with images of kings and quenes, and hanged with banners of armes, and in the top was marvellous sweet harmonie both of song and instrument. Then they went forward to the crosse, which was newlie gild, till they came where the aldermen stood, and their master Walter the recorder came to him with low reuerence, making a proper and briefe proposition, and gaue to him in the name of the citie a thousand marks in a purse of gold, which the thankfullie accepted with manie goodlie words, and so rode to the little conduit, where was a rich pageant full of melodie and song.

In this pageant was Pallas, Juno and Venus, and before them stood Mercurie, which in the name of the three goddesses gaue to him a ball of gold divided in three, signifying three gifts which the three goddesses gaue to him, that is to wit, sage, wisdom, riches, and felicitie. As he entered into Paules gate there was a pretie pageant, in which sat three ladies richlie clothed, and in a circle on their head was written

Regina Anna prosperi prodece regina. Et labe in the middes had a tablet, in the which was written Veni amica coronaberis, and under the tablet sat an angel with a close crosone, and the lady sitting on the right hand had a tablet of silver in which was written, Domine dirige gressus meos, & the third lady had a tablet of gold with letters azure written, Confido in Domino, & under their feet was written in legible letters:

Regina Anna novum regis de sanguine natum Cum paries populus aurea seclatus.

And these ladies cast downe wafers, on the which the two verses were written. From thence they passed to the east end of Paules churchyard against the schoule, where stood on a scaffold two hundred children well apparelled, which said to him diuerse goodlie verses of poets translated into English, to the honour of the king and him, which he highlie commended. And when they came to Ludgate, the gate was newlie garnished with gold & silke. And on the leads of saint Martin church stood a goodlie quere of singing men and children, which song new balads made in praise of him. After that they were passed Ludgate, they proceeded toward Fleetstreet, where the conduit was newlie painted, and all the armes and angels refreshed, & the chime melodiously sounding. Upon the conduit was made a towre with foure turrets, and in euery turret stood one of the cardinal virtues with their tokens and properties, which had several speeches, promising the quene neuer to leave him, but to be alding and comforting him: and in the middell of the towre closest was such several solemn instruments, that it seemed to be an heauenlie noise, and was much regarded and praised: and beside this the said conduit ran wine claret and red all that afternone.

So they with all his companie and the mayor rode forth to Temple barre, which was newlie painted and repaired, where stood also diuerse singing men and children, till they came to Westminster hall, which was richlie hanged with cloth of arras, and new-glazed. And in the middell of the hall they were taken out of his litter, & so led up to the higher desk under the cloth of estate, on whose left hand was a cupbord of ten stages marvellous rich and beautiful to behold: and within a little season was brought to the quene with a solemn service in great standing spice plates, a boid of spice and subtilties with porras and other wines, which she sent downe to his ladies, and when the ladies had dined, she gaue parties thanks to the lords and ladies, with the mayor and other that had given their attendance on him, and so withdrew he. He with a few ladies to the Whitehall and so to her chamber, and there he dined, and after went into his barge to creek to the king to his manour of Westminster, where he rested that night.

On Sunday the ninth day of october he met him with his chace, and all the aldermen and their wives in scarlet, and the countess of the citie took their barge at the end by seauen of the cloche and came to Westminster, where they were welcomed & brought into the hall by mayor, sheriffs, and others of the kings house, and so gaue their attendances till the quene should come forth. Between eight and nine she came into the hall and stood under the cloth of estate, and merchants in the kings chapel, and the monks of Westminster all in rich copes, and manie bishops and abbots in copes, and nuns in white went into the middell of the hall, and there they stood. Then was there a rare cloth spread from the quenes standing in the hall through the palace and sanduarie, which was called on both sides to the high altar of Westminster. After that the rare cloth was cast, the officers of armes appointed the order accustomed.

First went gentlemen, then esquires, then knights, then the aldermen of the citie in their cloaks of scarlet, after them the judges in their mantels of scarlet and coffes. Then followed the knights of the bath being no lords; euerie man hauing a white lace on his left sleeve, then followed barons and vicounts in their payement robes of scarlet. After them came earls, marquesses and dukes in their robes of estate of crimsin veluet furred with ermine powdered according to their degrees. After them came the lord chancellor in a robe of scarlet open before, bordered with lettise; after him came the kings chapel and the monks solemnlie singing with procession, then came abbats and bishops mitred, then sargeants and officers of armes, then after them went the mayor of London with his mace and garter in his cote of armes, then went the marquess Dorset in a robe of estate which bare the scepter of gold, and the earle of Arundell which bare the rod of suozie with the dove both together.

Then went alone the earle of Driford high chamberleine of England which bare the crowne, after him went the duke of Suffolke in his robe of estate also for that daie being high steward of England, hauing a long white rod in his hand, and the lord William Howard with the rod of the marshalship, and euerie knight of the garter had on his collar of the order. Then proceeded forth the quene in a circot and robe of purple veluet furred with ermine in hir bere coiffe and circlet as she had the saturdaye, and ouer hir was borne the canopie by foure of the fine ports, all crimsin with points of blue and red hanging on their sleeves, and the bishops of London and Winchester bare by the laps of the quenes robe. The quenes traine which was verie long was borne by the old dukes of Suffolke; after hir folowed ladies being lords wives, which had circots of scarlet with narrow sleeves, the best all lettise with bars of borders according to their degrees, and ouer that they had mantels of scarlet furred, and euerie mantell had lettise about the necke like a neckercher like wile powdered, so that by the powderings their degree was knowen. Then folowed ladies being knights wives in gownes of scarlet, with narrow sleeves without traines, onlie edged with lettise, and likewise had all the quenes gentlewomen.

When she was thus brought to the high place made in the middell of the church, betwene the quere and the high altar, she was set in a rich chaire. And after that she had rested a while, she descended downe to the high altar and there prostrate hir selfe while the archbishop of Canturburie said certeine collect: then she rose, and the bishop annointed hir on the head and on the breast, and then she was led by againe, where after diuerse orisons said, the archbishop set the crowne of saint Edward on hir head, and then deliuered hir the scepter of gold in hir right hand, and the rod of suozie with the dove in the left hand, and then all the quere song Te Deum, &c. Which done, the bishop toke off the crowne of saint Edward being beaute and set on the crowne made for hir. Then went she to saint Edwards thizine and there offered, after which offering done she withdrew to hir into a little place made for the nones on the one side of the quere.

Now in the meane season euerie duchess had put on their bonets a coronall of gold wrought with flowers, and euerie marquess put on a demie coronall of gold, euerie countesse a plaine circlet of gold without flowers, and euerie king of armes put on a crowne of copar and gilt, all which were worne till night. When the quene had a little repored hir, the companie returned in the same order that they set forth, and the quene went crowned and so did the la-des also: said. His right hand was sustented by the earle of Wiltshire his father, and his left hand by the lord Talbot deputie for the earle of Shrewsburie and lord Forinfall his father. Now when she was out of the sanctuarie and appeared within the palace, the trumpets played marvellous freshtie, then she was brought to Westminster hall, & so to hir withdrawing chamber: during which time the lords, judges, maiors and aldermen put off their robes, mantels and clokes, and toke their hoods from their necks and cast them about their shoulders, and the lords sat onlie in their circots, and the judges and aldermen in their gownes. And all the lords that serued that daie serued in their circots and their hoods about their shoulders: also diuerse officers of the kings house being no lords had circots and hoods of scarlet edged with minener, as the treasurer, controulor, & master of the seiwel house, but their circots were not gilt.

While the quene was in hir chamber, euerie lord and other, that ought to do seruice at coronations, to prepare them according to their dutie, as the duke of Suffolke high steward of England which was rich, lie apparelled, his doublet and iacket set with orient pearle, his gowne of crimsin veluet embroidered, his courser trapped with a cloth trapper head and all to the ground of crimsin veluet, set full of letters of gold of goldsmiths worke, hauing a long white rod in his hand; on his left hand rode the lord William, deputie for his brother as earle marshall with the marshals rod, whose gowne was crimsin veluet, and his horse trapper purple veluet cut on white sattin imbrodered with white lions. The earle of Driford was high chamberleine, the earle of Essex caruer, the earle of Suffolke sewer, the earle of Arundell chafe butler, on whom twelue citizens of London did giue their attendance at the cupbord. The earle of Warbie cupbearer, the vicount Lille pantler, the lord of Aburgatine chafe larder, the lord Haze almoner for him and his coparteners, and the maiors of Driford kept the buttrie bar, and Thomas What was chiefe eurer for sir Henrie What his father.

When all things were redie, the quene vnder hir canopie came to the hall, and washed and sat downe in the middell of the table vnder the cloth of estate. On the right side of the chaire stood the countesse of Driford widow, and on the left side stood the countesse of Worcester all the dinner season, which diuerse times in the dinner time did hold a fine cloth before the quenes face when she list to spee or do otherwise at hir pleasure. At the tables end sat the archbishop of Canturburie on the right hand of the quene, and in the middell betwene the archbishop and the countesse of Driford stood the earle of Driford with a white stasse all dinner time, and at the quenes feet vnder the table sat two gentlewomen all dinner time. When all these things were thus ordered, in came the duke of Suffolke and the lord William Howard on horsebacke, and the sargeants of armes before them, and after them the sewer, and then the knights of the bath bringing in the first course which was eightene dishes, besides subtilties and ships made of wax marvellous gorgeous to behold, all which time of seruice the trumpets standing in the window at the nether end of the hall played melodiously.

When hir grace was serued of two dishes, then the archbishops seruice was set downe, whose sewer came equall with the third dish of the quenes seruice on his left hand. After that the quene and the archbishop was serued, the barons of the ports began the table on the right hand next the wall, next them at the table sat the masters and clerks of the Chancerie, and beneath them at the table other doctors and gentlemen. The table next the wall on the

the left hand by the cupbord, was begun by the maior and aldermen, the chamberleine and the counsell of the citie of London, and beneath them sat substantiall merchants, and so downeward other worshipfull persons. At the table on the right hand in the middell of the hall sat the lord chancellor, and other tempoall lords on the right side of the table in their circots: and on the left side of the same table sat bishops and abbats in their parlement robes: beneath them sat the iudges, sargeants, & the kings counsell, beneath them the knights of the bath. At the table on the left hand, in the middle part, sat dutchesses, marquesses, countesses, baronesses, in their robes, and other ladies in circots, and gentlewomen in gowones. All which ladies and gentlewomen sat on the left side of the table along, and none on the right side.

The maior of London & service.

When all were thus set, they were incontinent served, and so quickly that it was marvell: for the seruitors gaue such good attendance, that meat or drinke nor any thing else needed not to be called for, which in so great a multitude was maruell. As touching the fare, there could be deuised no more costlier dishes nor subtilties. The maior of London was served with thre and thirtie dishes at two courses, and so were all his brethren, and such as sat at his table. The quene had at hir second course foure and twentie dishes, and thirtie at the thirde course: & betwene the two last courses, the kings of armes cried larges, in thre parts of the hall: and after stood in their place, which was in the bekins at the kings bench. And on the right hand out of the cloister of S. Stephens, was made a little closet, in which the king with diuerse ambassadores stood to behold the seruices. The duke of Suffolke and the lord William rode often times about the hall, chering the lords, ladies, and the maior, and his brethren. After they all had dined, they had wafers and ipocras, and then they washed, and were commanded to rise, and to stand still in their places, before the table or on the formes till the quene had washed.

The duke of Suffolke and Dorset rode about the hall.

When she had taken wafers and ipocras, the table was taken up, and the earle of Kentland brought by the surnap, and laid it at the boys end, which immediately was draine, and cast by master Kede, marshall of the hall: and the quene washed, and after the archbishop, and when the surnap was draine off, she arose and stood in the middell of the palace hall: to whom the earle of Suffolke in a goodlie spice plate brought a viall of spice and comets. After him the maior of London brought a standing cup of gold, set in a cup of assaie of gold, and after that she had dronke, she gaue the maior the cup, with the cup of assaie, because there was no letar, according to the claime of the citie, thanking him and all his brethren, for their paine. When the vnder hir canopy departed to hir chamber, and at the entrie of hir chamber, she gaue the canopy with bells and all, to the barons of the ports, according to their claime, with great thanks. When the maior of London bearing his cup in his hand, with his brethren, went through the hall to their barge, and so did all other noble men and gentlemen, for it was sir of the clocke. On mondaie were the iusts at the tilt, before the kings gate, where the maior and his brethren had a goodlie standing: but there were verie few speares broken, by reason the horses would not cope. On wednesdaie, the king sent for the maior and his brethren to Westminster, and there he himselfe gaue to them hartie thanks, with manie goodlie words.

On Wednesday daie after, the ladie Marie the French quene died in Suffolke, who was the late wife to Lewis the twelue, & after married to Charles duke of Suffolke, & was buried at S. Edmundsburie. The king kept his progresse about London, because of the quene. The seuerith of September being Sunday, betwene thre & four of the clocke in the afternone, the quene was deliuered of a faire young ladie, on which daie the duke of Suffolke came home to the christening, which was appointed on the Wednesday next following, and was accordinglie accomplished on the same daie, with all such solempne ceremonies as were thought conuenient. The godfather at the font, was the lord archbishop of Canturburie, the godmothers, the old dutches of Suffolke, & the old marchionesse Dorset widow, and at the confirmation the ladie marchionesse of Excester was godmother: the child was named Elizabeth.

Upon the daie of the christening, the maior sir Stephan Deacocke, in a gowne of crimson velvet, with his collar of S.S. and all the aldermen in scarlet, with collars and chaines, and all the counsell of the citie with them, took their barge after dinner, at one of the clocke, and the citizens had another barge, and so rowed to Greenwich, where were manie lords, knights, and gentlemen assembled. All the walles betwene the kings palace & the friers were hanged with arras, and all the waie drawed with greene rushes: the friers church was also hanged with arras.

The font was of silver, and stood in the middell of the church, thre steps high, which was couered with a fine cloth, and diuerse gentlemen with aprens and towels about their necks gaue attendance about it, that no filth should come in the font, over it being a square canopy of crimson sattin, fringed with gold, about it was a raille couered with red saie: betwene the quier and the bodie of the church was a close place with a pan of fire, to make the child reade in. When all these things were ordered, the child was brought to the hall, and then euery man set forward: first the citizens two and two, then gentlemen, squires and chapeins, next after them the aldermen and the maior alone: next the maior the kings counsell, the kings chappell in copes: then barons, bishops, earles, then came the earle of Essex, bearing the couered bakins gilt, after him the marquesse of Excester with the taper of virgin wax, next him the marquesse Dorset bearing the salt.

Behind him the ladie Marie of Suffolke, bearing the crêsome which was verie rich of pearle and stone, the old dutches of Suffolke bare the child in a mantell of purple velvet, with a long traine furred with ermine. The duke of Suffolke with his marshall rod went on the right hand of the said dutches, and the duke of Suffolke on the left hand, and before them went the officers of armes. The countesse of Kent bare the long traine of the childs mantell, and betwene the countesse of Kent and the child went the earle of Wilshire on the right hand, and the earle of Darbie on the left hand, supporting the said traine: in the middell ouer the said child was borne a canopy, by the lord Rochford, the lord Husie, the lord William Howard, and by the lord Thomas Howard the elder, after the child followed manie ladies and gentlewomen. When the child was come to the church doore, the bishop of London met it with diuerse bishops and abbats mitred.

When the ceremonies and christening were ended, Garter cheefe king of armes cried aloud, God of his infinite goodnesse send prosperous life & long to the high and mightie princeesse of England Elizabeth: & then the trumpets blew. When the archbishop of Canturburie gaue to the princeesse a standing cup of gold: the dutches of Suffolke gaue to hir a standing cup of gold, fretted with pearle: the marchionesse of Dorset gaue thre gilt bolles, pounced with a couer: and the marchionesse of Excester gaue thre standing bolles grauen, all gilt with a couer. to so souerelgne a degre: for that he was both furnished with doctrine and good learning, and furnished plentifully with good apparatils and richnesse. And for the cardinals, they were so much the more forward to passe the election in his person, forasmuch as for the greatnesse of his age, being already upon the threescore and tenth year, and supposed to beare a weake and unquond complexion, which opinion he nourished with art, they hoped he would not sit long in the seat; whereby the dignitie of the place and preeminence might fall to one of them, whose eyes looked for the glorie which their hearts wished, being interdicted from God and godhinesse, as altogether addicted to the wanton desires of temporall delites, that they might passe their daies in delicacies, as one noted trulle of all that bitterous generation, saith thus:

Elizabeth
Barton.

About this season, the craftie practises of one Elizabeth Barton, named the holie matron of Kent, came to light and were discovered: so that she and her adherents in November following were brought to the Starchamber, where before the kings council confessed their feined hypocritie and dissembled holinesse, traitorous purposes and intents. The names of those her adherents, which were presented with her before the lords in the Starchamber, were as followeth: Richard Waffer priest, parson of Aldington in Kent; Edward Wocking doctor in divinitie, a monke of Canturburie; Richard Dering, monke also of Canturburie; Edward Twaites gentleman; Thomas Laurence, register to the archdeacon of Canturburie; Henrie Gold parson of Aldermarie, bachelor of divinitie; Hugh Rich frier observant; Richard Kibbie; and Thomas Gold gentleman. They were adjudged upon their confession aforesaid, to stand at Pauls crosse in the sermon time, where they with their owne hands should severallie deliver ed of them to the preacher that should be appointed, a bill, declaring their subtil, craftie, and superstitious doings. Which thing they did the Sunday next following, standing upon a stage at the crosse erected for that purpose. But for their treasons committed, the order was repited till the parliament next following, in the which they were attainted, and suffered (as after ye shall heare.)

move warre.

In this meane time, the Scots were not quiet, but still robbed the kings subiects both by sea and land: whereupon the king caused them to be requited, not onelie by the borderers and other to them associate, which entring by the marches, burnt manie of their strong piles, but also he set forth certeine ships which entered into their streames, and fetched out manie of those prizes, which they had taken out of their hancens and crækes, maner all their heads. Yet was there no warre proclaimed, but still commillions sat and communed of agrement, and amends to be made on either part. Now in the end when the Scots had much demanded, and little or nothing granted, they for that time being wearie of warre, desired peace, which was concluded to indure both the kings lives. And so the twentieth daie of Maie in the yeare following, it was openlie proclaimed, to the comfort of all them that delighted in peace and godlie quietnesse.

A curse procured from the pope.

At the suit of the ladic Katharine Dowager, a curse was sent from the pope, which cursed both the king and the realme. This curse was set up in the towne of Dunkirke in Flanders (for the bringing thereof durst no nearer approach) where it was taken down by one William Wake a member of parliament. Whom first the king showed that the ladic Katharine Dowager was a good woman, and the curse of the pope, all the order of the court was by him: for the sake of which he had sent to him the curse, and at Woking he kept it, and according to the curse he had in commandment, which curse was a sort of hereticall sermon, which he preached in a domineat manner, for he was like a goodly man, which he used to come to see him, not as a doctor, but as a man of the world. Such as came to him, he would receive, and would none of the curse, so that the curse was in the little number of servants about him, and in the little number of his household. At that time the parliament began, wherein the forenamed Elizabeth Barton and other her companions were attainted of treason, for sundrie practised devises and tales by them advanced, put in the, and following to the bitter reproach, perill, and destruction of the kings person, his honour, fame, and dignitie: for they had of a devilish intent put in the heads of manie of the kings subiects, that to the said Elizabeth Barton was given knowledge by revelation from God and his saints, that if the king proceeded to the divorce, and married another, he should not be king of this realme one moneth after, and in the reputation of God not one daie nor houre.

This Elizabeth first through sickness, being sometimes brought as it were into a trance, whereby her visage and countenance became marvellouslie altered at those times when she was so vexed, at length by the insinuating, practisement, and information of the forenamed Richard Waffer parson of Aldington, she learned to counterfeit such manner of trances (after she came to perfect health) as in her sickness by force of the disease she had bene acquainted with: so that she practised, used, and shewed unto the people diverse marvellous and sundrie alterations of the sensible parts of her bodie, craftie uttering in her said feigned and false trances, diverse and manie counterfeit, detestable, and holie words, tending to the rebuke of sin, and reproving of such men in opinion as therein began to rise.

And to bring the people the more in believe with her hypocritical doings, she was counselled to saie in those her trances, that she should never be perfectlie whole, till she had visited an image of our ladic, at a place called Court at Street, within the parish of Aldington aforesaid. Whither was she brought, and by the meanes of the said Richard Waffer, and Edward Wocking, that was now made of counsell in the matter, there assembled about two thousand persons at the daie appointed of her thither coming, to see the miracle. At which daie, being brought before all that assemble and multitude of people, she falselie feigned and shewed unto the people in the chappell of our ladic there in Court at Street, manie alterations of her face, and other outward sensible parts of her bodie, and in those trances she uttered wondrous words, as she was before subtille and craftie induced, and taught by the said Edward Wocking and Richard Waffer.

miracle.

And amongst other things she uttered, that it was the pleasure of God, that the said Wocking should be her ghostlie father, and that she should be a religious woman. And within a while, after such feigned and counterfeit trances, she appeared to the people to be suddenly relieved from her sickness and afflictions, by the intercession and meane of the image of our ladic, being in the same chappell. By reason of which hypocritical dissimulation, the said Elizabeth was brought into a marvellous fame, credit, and good opinion of a great multitude of the people of this realme. And to increase the same, by counsell of the said Edward Wocking, she became a nun.

in the pyloie of saint Sepulchres at Canturburie, to whome the said Edward Boeking had committie his resort, not without suspition of incontinencie, pretending to be his ghostlie father by Gods appointment. And by conspiracie betwene him and him, the still continued in practising his dissembled traies, alleging that in the same he had revelations from almightie God and his saints, and amongst other, that which (as before we haue mentioned) touched the kings marriage, as ye haue heard.

This matter proceeded so farre, that there was a booke written by his complices, and namelie by Thomas Laurence, register to the archbishop of Canturburie, of his feigned and counterfeited miracles, reuelations, and hypocriticall holinesse. All things were handled so craftilie, that not one lie the simple, but also the wise and learned sort were deceived by the same, insomuch that William Warham the late archbishop of Canturburie, and John Fisher bishop of Rochester, and diuerse others, being informed thereof, gaue credit thereto. All which matters and manie other had bene traitorilie practised and imagined amongst the parties manie yerres, chieflie to interrupt the diuorcie and to destroe the king, and to depriue him from the crowne and dignitie roiall of this realme, as in the act of their attainder made more at large it maie appeare, and likewise in the chronicles of maister Edward Hall. Therefore to conclude with him and his adherents, on the one and twentieth of Aprill next following, the with diuerse of them before condemned, was slawen to Thorne, and there executed, as iustlie they had deserued; where and when she made this confession following, even at the present time that she suffered, in the hearing of the people.

The words of Elizabeth Barton, otherwise called the holie maid of Kent at the houre of hir death in manner of a confession.

After am I come to die, and I haue not bene the onelie cause of mine owne death, which most iustlie I haue deserued, but also I am the cause of the death of all these persons which at this time here suffer: and yet to say the truth, I am not so much to be blamed, considering that it was wel known vnto these learned men, that I was a poore wench, without learning, and therefore they might haue easilie perceiued, that the things that were done by me, could not proceed in any such sort, but their capacities and learning could right well iudge from whence they proceeded, and that they were altogether feined: but bicause the things which I feined were profitable vnto them, therefore they much praised me, and bare me in hand that it was the holie ghost, and not I that did them, and then I being pufft vp with their praises, fell into a certeine pride and foolish fantasie with my selfe, and thought I might feine what I would, which thing hath brought me to this case, and for the which now I crie God and the kings highnes most hartilie mercie, and desire all you good people to praye to God to haue mercie on me, and on all them that suffer here with me.

In this parlement also was made the act of succession, for the establishing of the crowne, to the which euerie person being of lawfull age should be sworne. On mondaie the thre and twentieth of March in the parlement time, were solemnlie receiued into London ambassadours from James the first king of Scots, the bishop of Aberdine, the abbat of Lincolns, and Adam Otterborne the kings attourneie, with diuerse gentlemen on them attendant, which were brought to the tailors hall, and there lodged. And on the daie of the Annunciation, they were brought to the kings palace at Westminster, where they shewed their commission and message, for the which the king appointed them dates to counsell. During the parlement time, euerie fundae at Pauls crosse preached a bishop, declaring the pope not to be supreme head of the church.

The thirtieth of March was the parlement prorogued, and there euerie lord, knight, and burges, and all other were sworne to the act of succession, and subscribed their hands to a parchment fixed to the same. The parlement was prorogued till the third of November next. After this were commissioners sent into all parts of the realme, to take the oth of all men and women to the act of succession. Doctor John Fisher, and sir Thomas More knight, and doctor Nicholas Wilson parson of saint Thomas apostles in London, expresse denied at Lambeth before the archbishop of Canturburie, to receiue that oth. The two first stood in their opinion to the verie death (as after ye shall heare) but doctor Wilson was better aduised at length, and so dissembling the matter escaped out of further danger.

In this yere it chanced that two merchant strangers fell in loue with a harlot, which was called Wolfes wife, and this harlot had often hanted the strangers chambers. And so on a time the said harlot appointed these strangers to come to Westminster, and she had prepared for them a bote, in the which bote was but one man to row which was a strong theefe, and in the end of the bote laie Wolfe his husband, couered with a leather that botemen vse to couer their cushions with, and so these strangers sat them down mistrusting nothing. Now when this boteman had brought them as farre as a place called the turning tree, suddenlie stepped by the said Wolfe, and with his dagger thrust the one of them through: the other cried out to save his life, and offered great sums of monie to the boteman and him to saue his life. But no proffers would be heard, nor mercie would they extend, but as cruell murderers without pitie slue the other also, and bound them face to face, and so threw them into the Thames in the foresaid place, where they were long after before they were found. But immediatlie the harlot Wolfes wife went to the strangers chambers, and toke from thence so much as she could come by. And at the last she and her husband (as they deserued) were apprehended, arraigned, and hanged at the aforesaid turning tree.

On the ninth of Julie was the lord Dacres of the north arraigned at Westminster of high treason, where the duke of Norfolk late as iudge, and high steward of England. The said lord Dacres being brought to the barre, with the are of the Solwer before him, after his indictment read, so impudently the same, answering euerie part and matter therein contained, and so plainlie and diuallie confuted his accusers, which were there readie to anouch their accusations, that to their great shames, and his high honor, he was found that day by his peres not guilty, whereof the commons not a little reioised, as by their shout and crie made at those words, not guilty, they shallic testified.

The two and twentieth of Julie was John Frith burned in Smithfield, for the opinion of the sacrament: and with him the same time, and at the same stake, suffered also one Andrew Hewet, a young man, by his occupation a tailor. The eleventh of August were all the places of the obseruant friers suppressed, as Greenwich, Canturburie, Richmond, Newark, and Petworth, and in their places were set Augustine friers, and the obseruant friers were placed in the houses of the grate friers. ¶ The one and twentieth of September, doctor Tailor master of the rolles, was discharged of that office, and Thomas Cromwell swore in his place the nineteenth of October. Whereover the third of November, the parlement began againe, in the which was concluded the act of supremacy, which authorized the kings highnes to be supreme head of the church of England, and the authoritie of the poye abolished out of the realme. ¶ In the same parlement also was given to the king, the first fruits and tenths of all spirituall dignities and promotions. This yeare came the great admerall of France into England, ambassadour from the French king, and was honorablie receiued.

In this time died the earle of Hildare, prisoner in the Tower, and his sonne Thomas Fitzgaret began to rebel, and toke all the kings ordinance, and sent to the emperour, requiring him to take his part: also he chose the bishop of Dublin, and robbed all such as would not obeye him. In the beginning of this yeare, the duke of Suffolke and the bishop of Ely went to Calis, and thither came the admerall of France. On the two & twentieth of Aprill the prior of the Charterhouse at London, the prior of Beual, the prior of Chesham, Reinalds a brother of Slon, & John bicar of Thistleworth, were arreigned and condemned of treason: and thereupon dratone, hanged and quartered at Tyburne the fourth of Maie: their heads and quarters were set ouer the bridge & gates of the citie, one quarter excepted, which was set vp at the Charterhouse at London. ¶ On the eight of Maie, the king commanded that all belonging to the court should poll their heads, & to giue example, caused his owne head to be polled, and his beard from thenceforth was cut round, but not shauen, which fashion the courtiers imbraced, and would (no doubt) haue put in practice, though they had not bene there, vnto bound by precept: for the people imitate the prince, as the poet long ago well noted, saying:

Regis ad exemplum totus componitur orbis.

On the nineteenth of June were three monkes of the Charterhouse hanged, dratoned, and quartered at Tyburne, and their heads and quarters set vp about London, for denieng the king to be supreme head of the church: their names were, Ermele, Middleton, and Pudgate. Also the one and twentieth of the same moneth, and for the same cause, doctor John Fisher bishop of Rocheſter was beheaded for denieng of the supremacy, and his head set vpon London bridge, but his bodie buried within Barling churchyard. This bishop was of manie force lauded, for he was reported to be a man of great learning, and of a verie good life. The pope had elected him a cardinall, and sent his hat as far as Calis, but his head was off before his hat was on: so that they met not. On the first of Iulie was sir Thomas More beheaded for the like crime, that is to wit, for denieng the king to be supreme head. And then the bodie of doctor Fisher was taken vp, and buried with sir Thomas Mores in the Tower. This man was both learned and wise, and giuen much to a certaine pleasure in merie taunts and teasking in most of his communication, which manner he forgot not at the verie houre of his death.

¶ I cannot tell (saith master Hall) whether I should call him a foolish wise man, or a wise foolish man, for vndoubtedly he beside his learning, had a great wit, but it was so mingled with taunting and mocking, that it seemed to them that best knew him, that he thought nothing to be well spoken except he had mistred some mocke in the communication. Inasmuch as at his coming to the Tower, one of the officers demanded his upper garment for his fee, meaning his gowne: and he answered, he should haue it, and toke him his cap, saying it was the uppermost garment that he had. At the wise euen going to his death at the Tower gate, a poore woman called vnto him, and besought him to declare what he had done with euidences of his in the time that he was in office (which after he was apprehended she could not come by) and that he would intreat the might haue them againe, or else she was undone. He answered, good woman, haue patience a little while, for the king is so good vnto me, that euen with in this halfe houre he will discharge me of all businesse, and helpe thee himselfe.

Also when he went vnto the staires on the scaffold, he desired one of the shirifes officers to giue him his hand to helpe him vp, and said: When I come downe againe, let me shift for my selfe as well as I can. Also the hangman kneeled downe to him, asking him forgiveness of his death (as the maner is) to whom he said, I forgive thee, but I promise thee thou shalt neuer haue honestie by striking off my head, my necke is so short. Also euen when he should laie downe his head on the blocke, he hauing a great graie beard, stroked out his beard, and said to the hangman, I praye you let me laie my beard ouer the blocke, least thou should cut it. Thus with a mocke he ended his life.

God had in most bountifull sort powred his blessings vpon this man, induing him with eloquence, wisdom and knowledge: but the grace of God withdrawing from him, he had the right vse of none, no not of reason as it should be rightlie vied. God had extraordinary blessed his children, and named his three daughters, to whom he had giuen an admirable dexteritie in the science of songs and arts, as John Leland our reuerend antiquarie noteth in a proper and learned epigramme, saying:

*Desine facundus nimium laudare disertum Natas Hortensiam maxima Roma tuam Candida tres Charites nam Mori cura posuit Obscurant multis nomina vestra modis.
Non illis studium Malesia vellera dextra Carpere, non facili ducere fila manus Sed iuuat eloqui crebro monumenta Latini Persare, et doctus pingere verba notis, Nec minus aethores Græcas enothere, Homerum Et quæſi dicendi gloria prima manet.
Et nec Aristotelis dicam quo persare libris Scrutentur, sophia mystica dona dea.
Turpe virum posthac erit ignominie Minerva Artes, grex adeo quas mulieribus amet.*

And yet was not the will of God for the infusing of spirituall graces, so linked to that of temporall, as because the one was granted; therefore the other must not be denied. For the blessings of God which be outward, are common to the wicked with the good:

god: the sun shineth upon all, the raine is kept from none: nate, God with a sparing hand reacheth out those things to the faithfull, which with full gripes he filleth out and powreth into the laps and bosoms of infidels and epicures: insomuch that the prophet David noting no lesse, with a kind of indignation opened his mouth saying: I was grieved at the wicked, I do also see the vngodlie in such prosperitie, these flourish in the world, these haue riches in possession, and I said: When haue I cleansed my heart in vaine, and washed my hands in innocencie: yea, and I had almost said euen as they; but lo, then should I haue condemned the generation of Gods children. But the end of these men, being set in slippery places, are cast downe and destroyed, yea suddenly do they come and come to a fearefull end: euen like as a dreame when one awaketh, so doth God make their image to vanish out of the citie.

And albeit the fall of this sir Thomas More was reprobicfull, issuing from a treasonable offense: yet as in pagans manie times there is somwhat which may teach christians lessons for their learning to their shame: so in this papist was one praise-worthy propercie among the rest most eminent, which I will note to the rebuke of protestants. The reuerend father doctor Clier bishop of London, in a sermon at Pauls crosse by him made in a solemne audience assembled at the parlement time 1534, teaching diuerse points of doctrine, and the duties of sundrie degrees, said, that it was commendable for noble men and gentlemen, and a great furtherance to the loue of religion, to be deuout: he thought an example of sir Thomas More, a man for his zeale (saith the bishop) to be honored, but for his religion to be abhorred.

This knight would diuerse times put on a surplexe, and helpe the priest in proper person to saie seruice: insomuch that vpon a time being at Chelise, and busie about that exercise, the duke of Suffolke then liuing, came to the said sir Thomas, then lord chancelor of England, about speciall affaires: and being informed that sir Thomas was at the church; thither went the duke, expecting the end of seruice. In the end, the duke and the lord chancelor met, and after mutuall greeting the duke said thus: What! is my lord chancelor become a parish clark? What will the kings maiestie saie to this geare, when he shall vnderstand that the lord chancelor of England, a speciall pære of the realme, and in highest rone of honor in the land next the prince is become a parish clark? Now trulie (saith sir Thomas) I thinke, and verelie beleue, that his highnesse will be so farr to misdeme or mislike me herein, that when he shall heare of the care which I haue to serue both his maiestie and mine, he will accept and take me for a faithfull seruant. And thus much of him.]

This yere in the time that the king went his progresses to Glocester, and to other places westward, the king of Scots was installed knight of the garter at Winsoze by his procurator the lord Erskin: and in October following, Stephen Gardiner (which after the cardinals death was made bishop of Winchester) was sent ambassador into France, where he remained thre yeres after. In August the lord Thomas Fitzgerard, sonne to the earle of Kildare, was taken in Ireland, and sent to the tower of London.

In the moneth of October, doctor Lee and other were sent to visit the abbeies, priories, and nunries in England, who set all those religious persons at libertie that would forsake their habit, and all that were vnder the age of foure and twentie yeres, and the residue were closed vp that would remaine. Further, they took order that no men should haue access to the houses of women, nor women to the houses of men, except it should be to heare their seruice. The abbat or prior of the house, where ante of the brethren was willing to depart, was appointed to giue to euerie of them a priests gowne for his habit, and forty shillings in monie, the nuns to haue such apparell as secular women wore, and to go whither they liked best. The eleuenth of November was a great procession at London for iote of the French kings recouerte of health from a dangerous sickness. In December a sorcie was taken of all chanteries, and the names of them that had the gift of them.

The princeesse Dowager lieth at Kimbalton, fell into hir last sickness, thereof the king being aduertised, appointed the emperors ambassador that was legier here with him named Eustachius Caputius, to go to visit hir, and to do his commendations to hir, and toll hir to be of god comfort. The ambassador with all diligence did his dutie therein, comforting hir the best he might: but the withi in daies after, perceiving hir selfe to warde be weak and feeble, and to faile death appoything at hand, caused one of hir gentlewomen to write a letter to the king, commendng to him hir daughter and his, beseeching him to stand god father vnto hir: and further desired him to haue some consideration of hir gentlewomen that had serued hir, and to sae them bestowed in marriage. Further, that it would please him to appoint that hir seruants might haue their due wages, and a yeres wages beside. This in effect was all that she requested, and so immediatlie herevpon she departed this life the eight of Ianuarie at Kimbalton aforesaid, and was buried at Peterborough. The nine and twentieth of Ianuarie quene Anne was deliuered of a child before hir time, which was bozne dead.

On the fourth of February the parlement began, in the which (amongst other things) enacted, all religious houses of the value of thre hundred marks and vnder, were giuen to the king, with all the lands and goods to them belonging. The number of these houses were thre hundred seauentie and six; the value of their lands pearlie aboue two and thirtie thousand pounds; their mouable goods one hundred thousand; the religious persons put out of the same houses, amounted to the number of about 10000. This yere was William Tindall burnt at a towne betwixt Burels and Paclin called Willeford. This Tindall, otherwile called Wichins, was bozne in the marches of Wales, and hauing a desire to translate and publih to his countrie diuerse books of the bible in English, and doubting to come in trouble for the same, if he should remaine here in England, got him ouer into the parties of beyond the sea, where he translated not onelie the new testament into the English tong, but also the five bookes of Moses, Joshua, Iudicum, Ruth, the bookes of the kings, and Paralipomenon, Ieremias, or the first of Ezechias, and the prophet Jonas.

Beside these translations, he made certeine treatises, and published the same, which were brought ouer into England, and read with great desire of diuerse, and of many soze despised and abhorred, so that proclamations were procured forth for the condemnation and prohibiting of his books (as before you haue heard.) Finally, he was apprehended at Antwerpe by meanes of one Phillips an Englishman, and then scholer at Louaine. After he had remained in prison a long time, and was almost forgotten, the lord Cromwell wrote for his deliuerance; but then in all hast, because he would not recant ante part of his doctrine, he was burned (as before you haue heard.) On Maie date were solempne iusts kept at Crænwich, and suddenlie from the iusts the king departed, not hauing aboue six persons with him, and in the evening came to Westminster. Of this sudden departing many mused, but most chiefe the queene.
¶ On the next morrow, the lord Rochford brother to the queene, and Henrie Norris were brought to the tower of London prisoners. Also the same date about fife of the clocke in the after none, queene Anne of Ballongne was brought to the tower of London, by sir Thomas Audleie lord chancelor, the duke of Norfolk, Thomas Cromwell secretarie, and sir William Kingston constable of the tower, and when he came to the tower gate, entering in he fell on hir knees before the said lord, beseeching God to helpe hir, as she was not guiltie of that whereof she was accused, and then desired the said lords to beseech the kings grace to be good vnto hir, and so they left hir there prisoner. On the fiftenth of Maie queene Anne was arreigned in the tower of London on a scaffold for that purpose, made in the kings hall, before the duke of Norfolk, who sat vnder the cloth of estate as high steward of England, with the lord chancelor on his right hand, the duke of Suffolke on his left hand, with marquesses and lords, &c. and the earle of Surrie sat before the duke of Norfolk his father, as earle marshall of England. The kings commission being read, the constable of the tower, and the lieutenant brought the queene to the barre, where was made a chaire for hir to sit downe in, and there hir indictment was read, wherevnto she made so wise and discret answers, that she seemed fullie to clere hir selfe of all matters laid to hir charge: but being tried by hir peeres, whereof the duke of Suffolke was chiefe, she was by them found guiltie, and had iudgement pronounced by the duke of Norfolk.

Immediatlie the lord Rochford the queenes brother was likewise arreigned and condemned: the lord maior of London, his brethren the aldermen, the wardens and foure persons moe of euerye the twelue principall companies being present. The seauen-teenth of Maie, the lord Rochford brother to the queene, Henrie Norris, Marke Smeton, William Brierton, and Francis Weston, all of the kings private chamber, about matters touching the queene were beheaded on the tower hill: the lord Roch-fords bodie with the head was buried in the chappell of the tower, the other foure in the churchyard there.
On the nineteenth of Maie queene Anne was on a scaffold (made for that purpose) vpon the greene with in the tower of London, beheaded with the sword of Calis, by the hands of the hangman of that towne: hir bodie with the head was buried in the quere of the chappell in the tower.]

The words of queene Anne at hir death.

Good christian people, I am come hither to die, for according to the law, and by the law I am iudged to die, and therefore I will speake nothing against it. I am come hither to accuse no man, nor to speake anie thing of that whereof I am accused & condemned to die, but I praise God saue the king and send him long to reigne ouer you, for a gentler, nor a more mercifull prince was there neuer, and to me he was euer a good, a gentle, and a souereigne lord. And if anie person will meddle of my cause, I require them to iudge the best. And thus I take my leaue of the world, and of you all, and I hartilie desire you all to praye for me. Oh Lord haue mercie on me, to God I commend my soule, Iesu receiue my soule: di-uerse times repeating those words, till that hir head was stricken off with the sword.

Now because I might rather saie much than sufficientlie enough in praise of this noble queene, as well for hir singular wit and other excellent qualities of mind, as also for hir fauouring of learned men, zeale of religion, and liberaltie in distributing almes in reliefe of the poore, I will refer the reader into master Fox his volume of Acts and Monuments, where he commendeth hir mild nature in taking admonition, proueth hir marriage lawfull, defendeth hir succession, ouerthroweth the sinister iudgements, opinions and objections of backbiters against that ver-tuous queene, sheweth hir faith and trust in Christ at hir death, and finally how the protestants of Ger-manie forsooke king Henrie for the death of so good a princesse. ¶ Anglorum praelia saith, that this good queene was forwarned of hir death in a dreame, wherein Morpheus the god of sleepe (in the likeness of hir grandfather) appeared vnto hir, and after a long narration of the vanities of this world (how cruell reigneth in the courts of princes, maligning the fortunate estate of the vertuous, how king Henrie the eight and his issue should be the bitter ouerthrow and expulsion of poperie out of England, and that the go-uernment of queene Elizabeth should be established in tranquillitie & peace) he saith vnto hir in conclusion by waie of prophesie, as our poet hath recorded:

Fortis animo, tristis si nuntius adsum, Insuperata tua velox necis aduenit hora, Intra triginta spacium moriere diem: Hoc magnus mortis solamen habeto futura, Elizabetha suis praeclare filia gestu Nomen ad astra feret patris, matrisque, suumque.]

Immediatlie after hir death, in the moche before Whitsuntide, the king married the ladie Jane Sei-mer, daughter to sir John Seimer knight, which at Whitsuntide was openlie shewed as queene. And on the tuesday in Whitsunweke, hir brother sir Edw.
Seimer was created vicount Beauchampe, and sir Walter Hungerford, lord Hungerford. The eight of June began the parlement, during the which the lord Thomas Howard, without the kings assent, asked the ladie Margaret Douglas daughter to the queene of Scots, and neece to the king, for which act he was atteinted of treason, and an act made for like offenders, and so he died in the tower, and she remained long there as prisoner. In the time of this parlement the bishops and all the cleargie of the realme held a solempne conuocation at Pauls church in London, where after much disputation and debating of matters, they published a booke of religion, intituled Articles deuised by the kings highnesse, &c. In this booke is speciallie mentioned but three sacraments.
Also before this booke certeine intunitions were gi-uen forth, wherby a number of their holie daies were abrogated, & speciallie those that fell in harvest time.
¶ The nine & twentieth of June, the king held a great tusting and triumph at Westminster, where were ordained two lighters made like ships to fight vpon the water, one of the which brake in the midst, wherby one Gates a gentleman, & servant to sp. Kincnet was drowned in his harnesse. In the other a gun brake hir chamber, & maimed two of the mariners.

master of the tols, was made lord keeper of the privie seal, and the ninth of Julie the lord Fitzwarren was created erle of Bath, and the moztow after the said lord Cromwell was created lord Cromwell. The eighteenth of Julie he was made knight, and vicar generall under the king over the spirituality, and sat diuerse times in the conuocation amongst the bishops as head ouer them. The two and twentieth of Julie, Henrie duke of Richmond and Summerset, earle of Northampton, base sonne to the king, begot of the ladie Taillebois then called Elizabeth Blunt, departed this life at saint James, and was buried at Westford in Dorsethe, of whome you shall find more in the treatise of the dukes of this land.

In September, Thomas Cromwell lord priuie seale and vicegerent, sent abroad vnder the kings spirituall priuie seale certeine intuncons, commanding that the persons and curats should teach their parishioners the Pater noster, the Ave & Creed, with the ten comandements, and articles of the faith in English. These articles and intuncons being established by authoritie of parlement, and now to the people deliuered, bred a great mistaking in the hearts of the common people, which had bene ever brought up and trained in contrarie doctrine. And here with diuerse of the cleargie as monks, priests, and others, took occasion herby to speake euill of the late proceedings of the king, touching matters of religion, affirming that if speedie remedie were not in time prouided, the faith would shortly be utterly destroyed, and all prayer and diuine seruice quite abolished and taken awate.

Spanis sinister reports, slanderous tales, and feigned fables were blowne abroad, and put into the peoples eares, and diuerse of the nobilitie did also what they coult to stir the commons to rebellion, faithfullie promising both aid and succour against the king. The people thus prouoked to mischief, and deceived through ouer light credence, incontinentlie as it were to mainteine that religion, which had so manie yeares continued, and bene esteemed, they distellie and scuttie conspired together, and in a part of Lincolnshire they first assembled, and shortly after joined into an armie, being (as it was supposed) of men apt for the warres, in number about twentie thousand. Against these rebels with all the hast that might be, the king in his proper person vpon intelligence therof had marched towards them, being furnished with a warlike armie, perfectly appointed of all things that to such a companie should apperteine.

The rebels hearing that his person was present with his power to come thus against them, began to feare what would follow of their doings: and such nobles and gentlemen as at the first fauoured their cause, fell from them and withdrew, so that they being destitute of capitaines, at length put certeine petitions in writing, which they exhibited to the king, professing that they neuer intended hurt towards his roial person. The king receiued their petitions, which consisted in choise of counsellors, suppression of religious houses, maintenance of the seruice of almighty God, the statute of vses, the release of the fifteenth, and receiuing of the first fruits, with such other matters as nothing appertained to them: wherevpon he made them answer in pithie sentence, reproouing them of their presumptuous follie and rebellious attempt, to meddle in anie such matters and weightie affaires, the direction whereof onelie belonged to him, and to such noble men and counsellors as his pleasure should be to elect and choise to haue the ordering of the same.

Wherefore he aduised them to remember their rash and inconsiderate doings, and that now in anie wise they should resort home to their houses, and no more to assemble contrarie to his lawes and their owne allegiances; and also to cause the prouokers of this mischief to be deliuered to the hands of his lieutenant, and further to submit themselves wholly to such punishment as he and his nobles should thinke their worthie to receiue: for otherwise he would not suffer that inturie at their hands to go vnreueged. After the Lincolnshire men had receiued the kings answer thus made, to their petitions, each mistrusting other, who should be noted the greatest meddler, suddenly they began to shrink, and got them home to their houses without longer abode.

Here with the duke of Suffolke the kings lieutenant was appointed to go with the armie, to see the countrie set in quiet, accompanied with the lord admiral, sir Francis Walsan, and sir John Russell that were joined with him also in commission for the ordering of things there within the countie of Lincoln. The duke entred into the citie of Lincoln the seuenteenth of October. On the nineteenth all the inhabitants of Louth (according to order giuen by the duke) came to Lincoln, and there in the castell made their submission, holding up their hands, and crying for the kings mercie. And her with were chosen forth Nicholas Pelton, capteine Cobler, & thirtene more, which were commanded to ward, and all the residue were new sworn to the king, renouncing their former oath receiued in time of their rebellion, and then departed home to their houses in the kings peace. After this were proclamations made abroad in the countrie in euery market towne by the heralds of armes, Summerset and Walsan, that the capitaines and souldiers of the dukes armie should not take anie mans goods, cattels, or vittels, except they paid or agreed with the owners of the same.

And further commandement was giuen, that all inhabitants and dwellers within the townes and villages about, should repaire to the citie of Lincoln, with all maner of vittels as well for men as horses, where they should receiue payment at reasonable prices for the same. After this, there was likewise proclamation made for the apprehending of all such lewd persons, as had sowne anie false rumors abroad in the countrie (the chiefe occasion of this rebellion) bruting that the king pretended to haue the gold in the hands of his subjects brought into the tower to be touched, and all their cattell unmarked, the chalices, goods, and ornaments of parish churches, fines for christenings, weddings, and buriings, licences to eat white meat, bread, pig, goose or capon, with manie other slanderous, false, and detestable tales and lies, forged of diuelish purpose to incourage the people to rebellion. If therefore anie man could apprehend such as had bene the setters forth and sowers of such seditious reports, they that brought them in, should be so rewarded, as they should thinke their labour well bestowed.

Moreouer, if there were anie assemblies made in anie part of the realme without the kings licence, by anie barulie persons, and would not depart to their houses vpon warning by his graces proclamations, they should not looke for further mercie at the kings hand, but to be prosecuted with fire and sword to the uttermost. To conclude, by the wise and sage direction taken in appeasing the countrie by that noble duke, all things were quieted in those parties. Diuerse of the principall offenders were sent vnto London. He that took vpon him as chiefe capteine of the rout, was the same that called himselfe capteine Cobler: but he was indeed a monk named doctor Pakarell, which afterwards with diuerse others was executed.

But now in the meane time, whilst the duke was

The Lincolnshiremen had receiued the kings answer thus made, to their petitions, each mistrusting other, who should be noted the greatest meddler, suddenly they began to shrink, and got them home to their houses without longer abode.

was sent forwards into Lincolnshire, within five daies after the king was trulie informed, that there was a new sir begun in the north parts by the people there, which had assembled themselves into an huge armie of warlike men & well appointed, both with capitaines; horses, armor, and artillerie, to the number of forty thousand men, which had incamped themselves in Yorkshire. These men declared by their proclamations solemnly made, that this their rising and commotion should extend no further, but onlie to the maintenance and defense of the faith of Christ, and deliuerance of holie church, sore decayed and oppressed, and also for the furtherance as well of priuate as publicke matters in the realme, touching the wealth of all the kings poore subjects.

They named this their seditious voyage, an holie and blessed pilgrimage: they had also certaine banners in the field, in which was painted Christ hanging on the crosse on the one side, and a chalice with a painted cake in it on the other side, with diuers other banners of like hypocrisie and feigned holinesse. The souldiers had also imbrodered on the sleeves of their cotes in stead of a badge; the similitude of the five wounds of our saviour, and in the middell thereof was written the name of our Lord. Thus had the rebels host of fashion with false and counterfeit signes of holinesse set out themselves, onlie to deceiue the simple people in that their wicked and rebellious enterprise against their liege lord and naturall prince, whome by the law of nations and by Gods commandments they were bound in conscience to obey, and so farre to be from lifting up the least finger of their hand, as rather to put life and goods in hazard for his sake, to testifie their allegiance.

The speciall diligence and loiall dutie which was found at that present in the worthy countess George earle of Shrewsburie, is not to be forgotten, who immediatlie after he understood how the northerne men were thus by in armes, considering how much it imported to stop them of their passage before they should aduance too far forwards, where by they might both increase in power, and put all other parts of the realme in hazard, through feare or hope to incline to their wicked purposes, he sent abroad with all speed possible to raise such power of his seruants, tenants, and friends, as by any means he might make, and withall dispatched one of his seruants to the king, both to aduertise him what he had done, and also to purchase his pardon, for making such leuie of power, before he had receiued his maiesties commission so to do.

I haue heard by relation of men of good credit that were there present: that when such knights and gentlemen as were of his counsell, and other of his especiall friends were come vnto him, he put forth this question to them; Whether his fact in raising a power of armed men without the kings commission (although he had done it to resist the rebels) were treason or not? Wherevnto when answer was made by some that were knowne to haue skill in the laws of the realme, how that by no means it could be intended treason, sith his intent was good, and no euill thereby meant, but contrarie the aduancement of the kings seruice dutifullie sought: For are soles (quoth the earle) I know it in substance to be treason, and I would thinke my selfe in an hard case, if I thought I had not my pardon comming.

Such a reuerend regard had this noble earle vnto his bounden allegiance towards his prince, that whatsoeuer seemed but as it were to sound in any behalfe to the breach thereof, it so troubled his loiall mind, that he could not be satisfied, till as it were in confessing his fault: where according to the truth there was none at all. He had signified his assured delitie in crauing pardon, where otherwise he might haue looked for thanks, which indeed he receiued with his pardon, according to his petition, and a commission to proceed as he had begun. Moreover, whereas there were diuerse speeches amongst the souldiers in the armie, uttered by some not altogether hapilie well disposed, that the said earle had so good liking of the northerne mens cause, that when it came to the point of triall, he would surelie ioin with them against that part, which he yet pretended to maintain.

To put that matter out of doubt, he caused the multitude of his souldiers to come before him, and there declared to them, that he understood what lewd talke had bene raised of his meaning amongst them in the campe, as if he had fauoured the part of the rebels: But (saith he) whatsoeuer their colourable pretence may be, true it is, that traitors they are in this their wicked attempt. And whereas my ancestors haue bene ever true to the crowne, I meane not to staine my blood now in joining with such a sort of traitors, but to live and die in defense of the crowne, if it stand but vpon a stake: and therefore those that will take my part in this quarrell, I haue to thanke them, and if there be any that be otherwise minded, I would wish them hence. And herewith he caused his chapelaine to minister an oth to him, which he receiued to the effect aforesaid, in the presence of them all.

And verelie this was thought to be done not without great cause that moued him thereto: for whereas the more part of his souldiers consisted of the countrie people, who with forged tales and wicked surmises were easilie led to beleue whatsoeuer was reported in fauor of the rebels, and dissuade of such as were then chiefe counsellors to the king, against whome they pretended to rise (although there was no reasonable occasion leading them thereto) it was greatlie to be suspected, least they might through some traitorous practise haue bene induced to forget their dutifull allegiance to their souereigne, and disobedient obedience to their leaders, inasmuch that the captiues of the rebels were perswaded (and some of them reported no lesse) that they might haue fought with the duke of Norfolk, and the earle of Shrewsburie, on this hither side of the riuer of Dun, euen with their owne men, not needing to haue brought a man of their armie with them.

Therefore it was thought, that the oth which the earle of Shrewsburie in that sort receiued before all his people there openlie in field, serued to great purpose; to put out of his souldiers wauering heads all such lewd expectation that he would turne to the enemies, staing thereby their fickle minds; sith they were now assured, that he being their chiefe captain meant no dissimulation. A matter trulie of no small importance, considering the fauor which the commons bare towards him, and the opinion they had conceiued of his high prowesse; so that which waie he inclined, it was thought verelie the game were likelie to go. But now after the king was aduertised of that perilous commotion of the northerne men, he appointed not onlie the said earle of Shrewsburie to raise a power to resist them: but also ordained the duke of Norfolk his lieutenant general, with the marquisse of Exeter, and the said earle of Shrewsburie, the earles of Huntington and Rutland, accompanied with a mightie power to go against them.

These lords raising such retinues of souldiers and men of warre as were to them assigned, made forward to the place where the armie of the rebels was then incamped, which was beyond the towne of Doncaster, in the high waie towards York. But

and the said earle of Shrewesburie, with the earles of Huntingdon; and Rutland, and such other that were next adjoining to those parties, with their powers assembled out of the shires of Salop, Stafford, Leiceſter, Rutland, Nottingham, and Derby, came to a place in Nottingham ſhire called Withlow, and there taking the muſters of their people, ſtreightwaies paſſed forth to Doncaſter, and appointed certaine bands of their men, to lie in places where any fords or paſſages late over the river of Dun, that runneth by the northſide of Doncaſter, to ſtaie the enemies if they ſhould attempt to come over. Shortly after came the dukes of Suffolke, and finallye the markeſſe of Greſſeyr with a ſmall companie of ſtreſſerme men, well and perfectly appointed.

When these capitaines and sage counsellors being here assembled, understood the manner of the notherne men, their number, and readinesse to battell, they first practised with great policie, to haue pacified the matter without bloodshedding: but the notherne men were so bent to mainteine their wilfull enterpryse, that there was no hope to take by the matter without battell: the refoze a daie was set, on the which they should trie the quarrell betwixt them with dint of sword. But for the chance, The night before the daie assigned for this bloodie and vnnaturall battell, to haue being fought betwixt men of one nation, and subiects to one king; there fell a raine not great to speake of, but yet as it were by miracle, the ruine of Dun rose suddenlie on such a height, that felddome had beinge scene there the like hugeness of water: so that the daie when the houre of battell should come, it was not possible for the one armie to come at the other, and so the appointment made betwixt both the armies for trial of the matter by force of arms, was by Gods god providence disappointed, and manie an innocent mans life preferred, that should haue died, if their purposes had taken place.

After this by the great wisdome and policie of the nobles and capteins, a communication was had, and an agreement made vpon the kings pardon, obtained for all the capteins and chiefe dmers in this insurrection, and promise made that they should be gentlie heard, to declare such things as they found themselves grieued with: and that vpon their articles presented to the king, their reasonable petitions should be granted, as by him & his counsell it should be thought expedient, whereby all troubles might be quieted, and ech thing brought to a good conclusion. Wherewith euerie man departed, and those which before came as hot as fire to fight, letted of their desperate purpose, by Gods mercifull providence, returned now peaceable to their houses without any more businesse.

At the selfe same time that these northerne men were lodged nere to Doncaster, and the kings party er ready to stop them of their passage (as before ye have heard) there was an other armie ready to have marched southwards through Lancashire: but by the faithfull diligence of the earle of Derby; who with the forces of Lancashire and Cheshire was appointed to resist them, they were likewise kept backe and byought to quiet; notwithstanding they were a verie great number assembled together of the commons out of Cumberland, Westmerland, and of the north parts of Lancashire. The earle of Suffol was sent downe by the king, to soine in assistance with the earle of Derby; who causing diuerse of the chiefe procurers of that rebellion in those parties to be apprehended and arraigned, they being found guiltie had iudgement, and were executed, as the abbats of Malleie, Sauleie, and others.

In time of this rebellion, a priest that by a butcher dwelling within five miles of Colindale, had been procured to preach in fauor of the rebels, and the butcher (as well for procuring the priest thereto, as for words spoken as he sold his meat in Wiñdsoꝛ) were hanged: the priest on a tree at the foot of Wiñdsoꝛ bridge, and the butcher on a paire of new gallows set vp before the russell gate, at the end of the same bridge. The words which the butcher spake were these. When one had him lesse for the carcase of a shepe than he thought he could make of it: Paie by Gods soule (said he) I had rather the godd fellowes of the north had it, and a score more of the best I haue, than I would so sell it. His priest and butcher being accused on a mondate in the morning whilst the kings armie was in the field, and the king himselfe lying at Wiñdsoꝛ, they confessed their faultes vpon their examinations, and by the law martiall they were adiudged to death, and suffered as before is mentioned. This yeare in December, the Thames was frozen ouer: inasmuch that the king and quene rode thorough London to Grænewich.

In Christmas the king by his messengers and heralds sent downe into the north his generall pardons to all the offenders; and shortly after Aske that had bene the principall procurer, & as it were chiefe captaine of the northerne rebels, came to London and now was both pardoned and receiued into fauor, receiuing of the kings bounteous liberalitie, apparell, and diuerse other rewards, whereof he was most vntwofoldie: for there liued not (as Hall saith) a better wretch, as well in person as conditions and deeds, speciallie towards the kings maiestie, as after appeared. ¶ Sir Rafe Cuers kept Scarborough castell in the north, being six weeks besieged by the rebels, twentie daies whereof he and all his companie (which were his onelie friends, seruants, and tenants, and serued for god will to him) were forced to susteine themselves with bread and water, and yet he kept the same to the end of that rebellion; and so deliuered it to king Henrie, who sent him sone after to serue in the borders against Scotland, where in great credit he continued his seruice, keeping the Scots without doing hurt to England, and with such obedience of them, as within twentie miles of the borders of Scotland fore against him, there was not a Scot but at his commandement; and so continued, till he was killed in the yeare 1545.]

The twelue of Nouember, Sir Thomas Betoman priest bare a faggot at Paules crosse, for singing masse with god ale. On the thirde of Februarie, Thomas Fitzgaret sonne and heire to the earle of Sal-dare was beheaded, and sixe of his vnckles were draiue, hanged, and quartered at Tiborne for treason. In the same moneth Nicholas Pusgrauce, Thomas Ilbie, with others, began a new rebellion at Larkie Stephan in Westmerland, who hauing got together eight thousand men, besieged the citie of Carlisle, from whence they were beaten with the only power of the citie: and in returning from thence, the duke of Northfolke, who then was lieutenant of the north, encountered with them, toke the capitaine, and according to the law martiall assigned sentence, and foure of them, whome he hanged on Carlisle walls, but Pusgrauce escaped.

In the same moneth of Februarie began a new commotion, by the procurement of sir Francis Walsgod, who being intitled to that mischievous enterprise by certaine wicked persons, forgot his dutie to his prince, although he had bene a man (as Hall saith) that vndoubtedlie loved God, and reuerenced his prince with a right obedient and loving feate : but such are men when God leaueeth them, and that they will take in hand things which Gods most holie word vtterlie forbiddeth. This last rebellion began in Strerington, Piskering, Aelfg, and Scarb:stow; but

The said sir Francis & one Halam, having raised a great compaignie of rebels, meant to have taken the towne of Hull, there to have fortified themselves, and to have assembled more power; but by the wisdom of sir Rafe Ellerker, & the mayo of the towne of Hull, the said Halam, & thescole other of the rebels with out anie slaughter were taken, which Halam was afterwards hanged in chaires, and two other with him, at the said towne of Hull. Robert Dac-

Spoeoner, about the latter end of this twentieth and eight yeare, the lord Darcie, Aste, sir Robert Constable, sir John Bulmer and his wife, sir Thomas Perrie brother to the erle of Northumberland, sir Stephan Hamilton, Nicholas Tempest elquier, William Lomleie, began effionies to conspire, although euerie of them before had receiued their pardons: and now were they all taken and brought to the Tower of London as prisoners. This yeare Robert Dackington a mercer of London, a man both rich, wise, and of good credit, dwelling at the signe of the leg in Chrapside, on a morning going (as his custom was) about foure of the clocke to heare masse, in the church then called S. Thomas of Acres, & now the spencers chappell, as he crossed ouer the street from his house to the church, was suddenlie murdered with a gun, the cracke whereof was heard of the neighbors, and of a great number of labozers that stood at Soper lane end, and saw the said Dackington go forth of his house: but there was such a thicke mist that morning, as the like had not bene sene, by couert whereof the murderer found thist the moze easilie to escape.

Spaite were suspected, but none found in fault, albeit forsomuch as he was one that would speake his mind frelie, and was at the same time one of the burgessees of the parlement for the citie of London, and had talked somewhat against the couetousnesse and crueltie practised by the cleargie, it was mistrusted least by some of them he came thus to his end. At length the murderer in deed was condemned at Banburie in Northfolke, to die for a felonie which he afterwards committed: and when he came to the gallows on which he suffered, he confessed that he did this murder, and till that time he was neuer had in anie suspicion thereof. ¶ The nine and twentieth of March, were twelue of the Lincolneshire rebels draiue to Ttburne, and there hanged and quartered, five of them were priests, the residue laic men. One of the priests was doctoꝝ Spakarell, and an other was the vicar of Louth.

The inuention of casting pipes.

Anno reg. 29.

About this season the maner of casting pipes of lead for the conuenance of water vnder the ground, without occupieng of soulder to the same, was inuented by Robert Brocke clearke, then one of the kings chapleins, an inuention right necessarie for the sauing of expences: for two men and a boie will do that in one daie, which before could not be done by manie men in manie daies. Robert Coper goldsmith was the first that made the instruments, and put this inuention in practise. ¶ In the berie beginning of this yeare, certeine commissioners being sent into Summerstethire to take vp corne, the people began to make an insurrection: but by the wisdom and diligence of young master Paulet & others the same was suppressed, and the beginners thereof, to the number of thescole, were apprehended & condemned, and fourtene of them were hanged and quartered, one of the number being a woman, the residue were saued by the kings mercifull pardon.

In June the lord Darcie & the lord Huseie were arreigned at Westminster before the marquisse of Crester then high steward, where they were found guiltie, and had iudgement, as in cases of high treason. Shortly after also were arreigned sir Robert Constable, sir Thomas Perrie, sir Francis Wigod, sir Stephan Hamilton, sir John Bulmer, and his wife, or rather (as some report) his paramour: also William Lomleie, Nicholas Tempest, William Thurst abbat of Founteins, Adam Subbarie abbat of Teruene, William Wololprie of Wirlington, also the abbat of Kluers, and Robert Aste. They were all found guiltie of high treason, and all put to death. Sir Robert Constable was hanged in chains ouer Beuerleie gate at Hull, and Robert Aste was also hanged in chains on a towre at Porke, and Margarete siter John Bulmers paramour burnt in Smithfield in London. The other suffered at Ttburne.

In the latter end of June, was the lord Darcie beheaded at the Tower hill, and shortly after the lord Huseie was likewise beheaded at Lincoln. This yeare at saint Georges feast, was the lord Cromwell made knight of the garter. In October on saint Edwards euent, which falleth on the twelfth of that moneth, at Hampton court the quene was deliuered of hir sonne named Edward, for whose birth great sole was made thorough the realme, with thanksgiuing to almighty God, who had sent such a young prince to succed his father in the crowne of this realme (as afterwards he did) by the name of king Edward the first. His godfathers at the fontaine were the archbishop of Canturburie & the duke of Northfolke, the ladie Marie was his godmother, and at the bishopping, the duke of Suffolke was his godfather. On the eighteenth of October he was made prince of Wales, duke of Cornewall, and erle of Chester.

But as sole is often mired with sorow, so at that time it came to passe by the death of his mother, that noble and vertuous ladie quene Jane, which departed out of this life the fourteenth daie of this moneth of October, to the great grieve of the whole realme: but namely the king hir husband toke it most grievouslie of all other, who remouing to Westminster, there kept himselfe close a great while after. The eight of November, the corps of the quene was caried to Windsoꝝ, with great solemnitie, and there buried in the midst of the quire in the castell church. There was also a solempne hearse made for hir in Paules church, and funerall equeles celebrated, as well as in all other churches within the citie of London. Thus was the king left againe a widower, and so continued the space of two yeares together. Upon the death of which quene Jane, and the birth of prince Edward hir son this dischord following was made:

Phoenix Iana iacet nato Phænice, dolendum Secula Phænices nulla tulisse duas.

The king held his Christmas at Crénetsch, with as well he as all the court ware mourning apparell, till the morrow after Candlemas daie, & then he and all other changed. This yeare Edward Selmer count Beauchampe the quenes brother was created earle of Hertford, & sir William Fitzwilliams lord high admerall was created earle of Southampton, & master Paulet was made vicechanceloꝝ, sir John Russell comptrollor of the kings house, master Henedge, master Long, master Bineuet of the kings priuie chamber, knights; master Coffin, master Astar, & master Selmer the quenes brother, knights. On Allhalloves euent, the lord Thomas Howard brother to the duke of Northfolke, died prisoner in the Tower of London, and was buried at Ttburne, and then the ladie Margarete Douglas was pardoned, and and released out of the Tower. The foure and twentith of Februarye, being sūdate, the rod of Borleie in Kent, called the rod of grace, made with diuerse vices, to moue the eies and lips, was shewed at Pauls crosse by the preacher, which was the bishop of Worcester, and there it was broken and plucked in peeces.

The five and twentieth of Februarye, sir Thon Allen priest, and also an Irish gentleman of the Carets were hanged & quartered at Tiburne. The second of March, the image of the rood, called saint Sancio, at Bermonseie abbey in Southwiche, was taken downe by the kings commandement. The one and twentieth of March, Henrie Barham customer of Plimmouth, and Thomas Cwell, were hanged and quartered at Tiburne. In Maie a frier obseruant called frier Forrest was apprehended, for that he was knowne in secret confessions to haue declared to manie of the kings liege people, that the king was not supream head of the church, where he had by his oth neuer thelesse affirmed him so to be. Whereupon in his examination, that point being laid to his charge, he answered that he toke his oth with his outward man, but his inward man neuer consented thereunto. But being further accused of diuerse he-reticall and damnable opinions that he held & maintained contrarie to the scripture, at length being not able to defend the same, he submitted himselfe to the punishment of the church.

Now upon this his submission, hauing more libertie than before he had to talke with whome he would, and other hauing libertie to talke with him, he was incensed by some such as had conference with him, that when his formall abjuratiō was sent him to read and peruse, he utterly refused it, and obstinate stood in all his heresies and treasons. Whereupon he was condemned, & afterwards on a paire of new gallowes prepared for him in Smithfield, he was hanged by the middle and armeholes all quick, and vnder the gallowes was made a fire wherewith he was consumed and burnt to death. There were diuerse of the counsell present at his death ready to haue granted him pardon, if anie sparke of repentance would haue appeared in him. There was also a pulpit prepared, in which that renowned preacher Hugh Latimer, then bishop of Worcester, by manifest scriptures confuted the friers errors, and with manie godlie exhortations moued him to repentance, but he would neither heare nor speake.

A little before the execution, an huge and great image was brought to the gallowes. This image was fetched out of Wales, which the Welshmen had in great reuerence: and it was named Daruell Gatheren. They had a prophesie in Wales, that this image should set a whole forest on fire, which prophesie was now thought to take effect, for he set this frier Forrest on fire, and consumed him to nothing. The friar when he saw the fire come, caught hold on the ladder, which he would not let go, but in that fort vi-patientlie toke his death, so as if one might iudge him by his outward man, he appeared (saith Hall) to haue small knowledge of God, and lesse trust in him at his ending: otherwile he would haue bene persuaded to patience, and a christian farewell to the world. Upon the gallowes that he died on, was set up in great letters these verses here following:

David Daruell Gatheren, As saith the Welshmen, Fetched outlawes out of hell:
Now is he come with speare and shield, In harness to burne in Smithfield, For in Wales he maie not dwell.

And Forrest the frier, That obdurate lier,
That wilfullie shall be dead:
In his contumacie,
The gospell dooth denie,
The king to be supreme head.]

In Iulie was Edmund Cuninghie attainted of treason, for counterfeiting the kings signe ma-nuell, and in August was Edward Cliford for the same cause attainted, and both put to execution as traitors at Tiburne. In September by the speciall motion of the Lord Cromwell, all the notable images, vnto the which were made anie especiall pilgriimages and offerings, were utterly taken awaie, as the images of Wallingham, Ipswich, Worcester, the ladie of Wilton, with manie other, and likewise the shynes of counterfeit saints, as that of Thomas Becket, and others. And euen forthwith, by meanes of the said Cromwell, all the orders of friers and nuns, with their cloisters and houses, were suppressed and put downe. As for the images of our ladie of Wallingham, and Ipswich, were brought by to London, with all the iewels that hong about them, and diuerse other images both in England & Wales, whereunto anie common pilgrimage was vsed, for auoiding of idolatrie, all which were burnt at Chelise by the lord priuie seale.

On the first of September being sūdate, one Gratnell hangman of London and two other were hanged at the wexfling place by Clearken well, for robbing a booth in Bartholomew faire, at which execution were aboute twentie thousand people, as Edward Hall himselfe (then a present beholder) iudged.
This moneth of September, Thomas Cromwell lord priuie seale, vicegerent to the kings highnesse, sent forth instructions to all bishops & curats through the realme, charging them to see that in euery parish church, the bible of the largest volume, printed in Englisch, were placed for all men to read on: and that a booke of register were also provided and kept in euery parish church, wherein shall be written eue-rie wedding, chistening, and burieng, within the same parish for euer.

Saint Augustines abbey at Canturburie was suppressed, and the shyne & gods taken to the kings treasurie, as also the shyne of Thomas Becket in the priorie of Chypps church was likewise taken to the kings vse, and his bones, scull and all, which was there found, with a pece broken out by the wound of his death, were all burnt in the same church by the lord Cromwell. The monks there were commanded to change their habits, &c. The one and twentieth of October, the church of Thomas Becket in London called the hospitall of saint Thomas of Acres was suppressed. Nicholas Gibson groser, for this yeare thiraffe of London, builded a free schole at Ratchiffe, nere vnto London, appointing to the same, for the instruction of thre score poore mens chyldren, a schole-maister and vsher, with a stipend of ten pounds by the pere to the maister, and six pounds thirtene shillings four pence to the vsher. He also builded there cer-teine almes houses for fouretene poore and aged persons, who quarterlie receiue six shillings eight pence a pece for euer.]

In this season sute was made to the king by the emperour, to take to wife the duchesse of Spillan: but thortlie after that sute brake off, because (as was thought) the emperours counsell ment by a cautell to haue brought the king in mind to sue for a licence of the pope. When the duke of Cleue began to sue to bert, a priest, was accused of heresie, for holding opinion against the bodilie presence in the sacrament of the altar. He appealed to the kings maiestie, who fauourable consented to heare him at a daie appointed, against which daie, in the kings palace at Westminster, within the kings hall, there was set up a throne or seat of state for the king, with scaffolds for all the lords, and a stage for Nicholson to stand upon.

This Nicholson was esteemed to be a man well learned, but that daie he uttered no such knowledge (saith Hall) as was thought to be in a man of that estimation. Diuerse arguments were ministred to him by the bishops, but namelie the king pressed him so, and in the end offered him pardon if he would renounce his opinion: but he would not consent thereto, and therefore he was there condemned, and had indgement, and so shortly after he was drawne into Smithfield, and there burnt to ashes. The third of Nouember, Henrie Courtneie marques of Exce-ster and earle of Denonshire, Henrie Pole lord Pontacate, and sir Edward Neuill brother to the lord Aborgauennie, were sent to the tower, being accused by sir Gessreie Pole, brother to the lord Pontacate, of high treason. They were indicted for deul-sing to mainteine, promote, & aduance one Reginald Pole, late deane of Excester, enemie to the king beyond the sea, & to depriue the king. The marques, and the lord Pontacate were arraigned the last of December at Westminster befoze the lord Audleie that was chancellor, and for that present time high steward of England, and there they found him giltie.

The third daie after were arraigned sir Edward Neuill, sir Gessreie Pole, two priests called Cross and Collins, & one Holland a mariner, & all attain-ted. The sixteenth of Nouember, was the blacke friers in London suppressed, the next daie the wyse friers, the grate friers, and the monks of the Charterhouse, and so all the other immediatlie. The foure and twentieth of Nouember, the bishop of Rochester preached at Paules crosse, & there shewed the bloud of Hales, and affirmed the same to be no bloud, but homic clarified, and coloured with sackron, as it had bene euidentlie proued befoze the king and his councell. Also foure anabaptists, three men, and one woman, all Dutch, bare sagots at Paules crosse the same daie. The nineteenth of Nouember, a man and a woman Dutch anabaptists, were burnt in Smithfield.]

The ninth of Januarie, the lord marques, and the lord Pontacate, with sir Edward Neuill lost their heads on the Tower hill. The two priests and Holland were drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered. Sir Gessreie Pole had his pardon. On Alwednesday, John Johns, John Potter, & William Spanering, were hanged in the princes lieries (because they were the princes seruants) on the southside of Paules churchyard, for killing Roger Cholmelcie esquier in that place, of malice prepened. The third of March, sir Nicholas Carew of Bedington in the countie of Surrie knight of the garter, and maister of the kings house, conden-ned befoze of treason, was beheaded on the Tower hill, where he made a godlie confession, both of his fault, and superstitious faith, giuing God thanks, for that his hap was to be prisoner in the Tower, where he first sauored the pleasant tast of Gods holie word, meaning the bible in English, which there he read by the exhortation of one Thomas Philips then keeper of that prison, and sometime a citizen and point-marker of London, who had bene in some trouble for religion, and examined befoze doctor Stokellie bishop of London, and sir Thomas More, but through his wise demeanour and mild answers, he escaped their hands.

The ninth of March, the king created sir William Paulet knight treasurer of his house, lord saint John, and sir John Russell comptroller of his household, lord Russell. Also either then or shortly after, was sir William Par created lord Par. The new abbie of white monks at the Tower hill, and the Spinories, hiris without Algate, were suppressed on the last of March. The same time the king caused all the hauens to be fenced with bulwarks, and blockehouses, and riding to Dover, he took order to haue bulwarks made alongst the sea coasts, and sent commission to haue generall musters made through the realme. Whereouer on Easter daie there were three score sail discovered that late in the冬nices, and for that it was neither knowne what they were, nor what they intended to do, all the able men in Kent rose and mustered in armour the same daie. The eight and twentieth of Aprill began a parlement at Westminster, in the which Margaret countesse of Salisbury, Gertrude wife to the marques of Exce-ster, Reginald Pole cardinall, brother unto the lord Pontacate, sir Adrian Fokew, & Thomas Dingleie knight of saint Johns, and diuerse other were atteinted of high treason, which Fokew and Dingleie the tenth of Iulie were beheaded.

In this parlement the act of the six articles was established. Of some it was named the bloodie statute, as it proued indeed to manie. And even shortly after the making thereof, when the first inquest for inquirie of the offenders of the same statute sat in London at the mercers chappell, those that were of that inquest were so chosen for the purpose, as there was not one amongst them that wished not to haue the said statute put in execution to the bitter-most, inasmuch that they were not contented onlie to inquire of those that offended in the six articles contained in that statute, but also they desired to inquiere of certeine branches (as they took the matter) belonging to the same, as of those that came seldom to heare masse, that held not by their hands at the sacring time, who took no holie bread nor holie water, who used to read the bible in churches, or in communication seemed to despise priests, or images in the churches, &c. To conclude, they inquired of dis-gentle of them that had so offended in anie of those articles or the branches, that they indicted & presented to the number of five hundred persons and above, so that if the king had not granted his pardon, for that he was informed by the lord Audleie then lord chancellor that they were indicted of malice, a great manie of them which already were in prison, had died for it in Smithfield, in frieng a saggot.
But although the king at that present granted his gratious pardon, and forgane all those offenses: yet afterwards, during the time that this statute stood in force, which was for the space of eight years insuing, they brought manie an honest and simple person to death. For such was the rigor of that law, that if two witnesses, true or false, had accused anie, and ad-uouched that they had spoken against the sacrament, there was no waite but death; for it boted him not to confesse that his faith was contrarie, or that he said not as the accusers reported, for the witnesses (for the most part) were beleued.

The king being informed that the pope by instigation of cardinall Pole, had moued and stirred di-uers great princes and potentars of christendome to inuaide the realme of England; without all delate rode himselfe toward the sea coasts, and sent diuerse of his nobles and counsellors to sarueie all the ports and places of danger on the coast, where anie meet and conuenient landing place might be doubted, as well in the borders of England, as also of Wales: in a great preparation was made for the receiuing of hir. The twelue of October the nunnerie of Walswell, & southwith the priorie of S. Marie oueries in Southwoke, and S. Bartholomeus in Smithfield, were suppressed, & all their lands & goods taken to the kings vse. The fouretenth of Nouember, Hugh Feringdon abbat of Reding, and two priests, the one called King, and the other Union, atainted of high treason for denieng the supremacie of the king ouer the church of England, were hanged, and quartered at Reding. The same daie was Richard Whiting abbat of Glasseburie likewise hanged and quartered on Tolwe hill beside his monastirie, for the same matter and other treasons whereof he had bene convicted. The first of December was John Bech abbat of Colchester put to death for the like offense. In December were appointed to wait on the kings person fiftie gentlemen called pensioners, of spares, vnto whome was assigned the sum of fiftie pounds peece a peece, for the maintenance of themselves and two horses, or one horse and a gelding of service.

The eleuenth daie of December at the turne pkie on this side Graueling, was the ladie Anne of Cleue receiued by the lord deputie of the towne of Calis, and with the speares and horsemen belonging to the retinue there. When she came within little more than a mile of the towne of Calis, she was met by the erle of Southampton high admerall of England, who had in his companie thirtie gentlemen of the kings household, as sir Francis Bryan, sir Thomas Seimer, and others, beside a great number of gentlemen of his owne retinue clad in blue velvet, and crimson satin, and his peomen in damaske of the same colours. The mariners of his ship were apparelled in satin of Bridges, cotes & slops of the same colour. The lord admerall brought hir into Calis by Lanterne gate. There was such a peale of ordinance shot off at hir entrie, as was marvellous to the hearers. The mase presented hir with an hundred markes in gold, the merchants of the Staple with an hundred souveraignes of gold in a rich purse. She was lodged in the kings place called the Chexker, and there she laie fiftene daies for want of prosperous wind.

During which time, goodlie iusts and coslie banquets were made to hir, for hir solace and recreation. And on S. Johns daie in Christmasse, she with fiftie saile toke passage about none, and landed at Dele in the Dolomes about fise of the clocke, where sir Thomas Henie lord Warden of the ports receiued hir. She taried there a certeine space in a castell newlie built, and thither came the duke of Suffolke, and the dutches of Suffolke, and the bishop of Chichester with a great number of knights and esquires, and ladies of Kent and other, which welcomed hir grace, and brought hir that night vnto Dover castell, where she rested till mondaie, on which date (notwithstanding it was verie foule and stormie weather) she passed towards Canturburie, and on Waram doleone met hir the archbishop of Canturburie, with the bishops of Elie, S. Asse, S. Daues, and Dover, and so brought hir to S. Augustins without Canturburie, where she laie that night. The next daie she came to Sittingburne, and laie there that night. As she passed towards Rochester on Petweares even, on Ketnam doleone met hir the duke of Suffolke, and the lord Maces of the south, and the lord Pontioe, with a great companie of knights and esquires of Suffolke and Suffolke, with the barons of the eschequer which brought hir to Rochester, where she laie in the palace all Petweares daie. On which daie, the king (longing to see hir) accompanied with no more but eight persons of his priue chamber, both he and they all apparelled in marble cotes, piallie comming to Rochester, suddenlie came to hir presence, whereof at the first she was somewhat affonied, but after he had spoken to hir and welcomed hir, she with louing countenance and gracions behaviour him receiued, and welcomed him on hir knees, whom he gentlie toke vp and kissed, and all that after none communed and deuised with hir, supped that night with hir, and the next daie he departed to Greene-wich, and she came forward to Dartford.

On the morrow the thirde daie of Januarie being saturday, in a faire plaine of Blackheath, more nere to the foot of Shooters hill, than the ascendent of the same, called Blackheath hill, was pitched a pavilion of rich cloth of gold, and diuerse other tents and pavilions, in which were made fiers and perfumes for hir and such ladies as were appointed to receiue hir: and from the tents to the parke gate of Greene-wich, all the bushes and firs were cut downe, and a large open waie made for the shew of all persons. And first next to the parke pale on the east side stood the merchants of the Stillard, and on the west side stood the merchants of Genoa, Florence and Venice, and the Spaniards in cotes of beluet. Then on both sides the waie stood the merchants of the citie of London, and the aldermen, with the counsellors of the said citie, to the number of a hundred and threescore which were mingled with the esquires; then the fiftie gentlemen pensioners: and all these were apparelled in beluet and chaines of gold, trulle accounted to the number of twelue hundred & above, beside them that came with the king and hir, which were sir hundred in beluet cotes and chaines of gold. Behind the gentlemen stood the seruicemen in good order well horsed and apparelled, that who so ever had well viewed them, might haue said, that they for tall and comelie personages, and cleane of lim and boile, were able to giue the greatest prince in christendome a most full breakfast, if he had bene the kings enemie.

About twelue of the clocke, hir grace with all the companie which were of hir owne nation, to the number of an hundred horse, accompanied with the dukes of Suffolke and Suffolke, the archbishop of Canturburie, and other bishops, lords, and knights, which had receiued and conueied hir, came downe Shooters hill towards the tents, and a good space from the tents met hir the earle of Rutland appointed lord chamberlaine to hir grace, sir Thomas Denise hir chancellor, and all hir counsellors and officers, amongst whom doctor Daie (appointed to be hir almoner) made to hir an eloquent oration in Latine, presenting to hir on the kings behalfe all the officers and seruants: which oration was answered vnto by the duke hir brothers secretarie, there being present: which done the ladie Margaret Dowglas, daughter to the quene of Scots, the ladie mar- quesse Dowset, daughter to the French quene, being nextes to the king, and the dutches of Richmond the countesses of Rutland and Hereford, with diuers other ladies and gentlewomen, to the number of threescore and fise, saluted and welcomed hir grace, who alighted out of hir chariot in the which she had rid all hir long tourneie, and with courteous demeanour loning countenance, gaue to them hartie thanks, and kissed them all, and after all hir counsellors and officers kissed hir hand: which done, she with all the ladies entered the tents, and there warmed them a space.

When the king knew that she was arrived in hir tent, he with all diligence set out through the parke. And first issued the kings trumpets, then the kings officers swome of his priuie chamber, after them followed barons, the yongest first, and sir William Wollis lord maior of London rode with the lord Par-that was the yongest baron. Then followed the bishops, and immediatlie after them the earles, and then the duke of Bauiere, and countie Palatine of the Rhine, with the liuierie of the Tolson or golden sleece about his necke.

Then came the ambassadours of the French king and emperour, next to whome followed the lord pri-uie seale lord Cromwell, and the lord chancellour, then Carter king at armes, and the other officers and sargeants of armes gaue their attendance on each side the lord. The lord marquesse Dorset bare the sword of estate, and after him a good distance followed the kings highnesse, mounted on a goodlie courser. To speake of the rich and gorgeous apparell that was there to be seene that daie, I haue thought it not greatlie necessarie, with each man may well thinke it was right sumptuous, and as the time then serued, verie faire and collie, as they that are desirous to vnderstand the same may read in maister Halles chronicle more at large, which in this part I haue thought good to abridge.

After the king followed the lord chamberleine, then came sir Anthonie Browne maister of his horses, a goodlie gentleman, and of personage verie semlicie, richlie mounted, & leading the kings horse of estate by a long reine of gold. Then followed his pages of honour riding on great couriers, and lastlie followed sir Anthonie Wingfield capteine of the gard, and then the gard well habited, and in their rich cotes. In this order rode the king till he came to the last end of the ranke of the pensioners, & there e-uerie person that came with him placed himselfe on the one side or the other, the king standing in the middle.

When hir grace vnderstood that the king was come, she came forth of hir tent, and at the doore ther-of, being set on a faire and beautifull horse richlie traped, she rode forth towards the king, who perceiuing hir to approach, came forward somewhat beyond the croffe on Blackheath, and there staid till she came nether, & then putting off his cap, he made forward to hir, and with most loning countenance and princelie behauiour saluted, welcomed, and imbraced hir, to the great reioysing of the beholders: and she likewise not forgetting hir dutie, with most amiable aspect and womanlie behauiour receiued him with manie apt words and thanks, as was most to purpose. Whilste they were thus talking together, the fifte pensioners with the gard departed to furnish the hall at Greenwich. After the king had talked with hir a small while, he put hir on his right hand, and so with their footmen they rode together, and with their companies being thus met, returned in this manner through the ranks of the knights and squires (which stood still all this while and remoued not.)

First hir trumpets set forward, being twelue in number, beside two kettledrums on horsebacke; then followed the kings trumpeters, then the kings coun-cellors, then the gentlemen of the priuie chamber, after them the gentlemen of hir graces countie in rotes of beluet, and all on great horses. When the maior of London with the yongest baron, then all the barons: next them the bishops, then the earles, with whom rode the earles of Duerstein and Wal-dec hir countmen, then the dukes of Suffolke and Suffolke, and the archbishop of Canturburie, and duke Phillip of Banier: next followed the ambassadors, then the lord priuie seale, and the lord chancellor, then the lord marquesse Dorset that bare the sword: next followed the king himselfe equalle riding with the ladie Anne, and behind him rode sir Anthonie Browne with the kings horse of estate, as yee haue heard, and behind him rode sir John Dobleie maister of his horses, leading hir spare horse trapped in rich tissue downe to the ground: after them folloved hensmen and pages of honor.

Then followed the ladie Margaret Douglas, the ladie marquesse Dorset, the dutches of Richmond and Suffolke, the countesses of Rutland and Hertford, and other countesses. Then came hir chariot in which she had rid all hir iournie, well carued and gilt with the armes of hir countie curiously wrought & couered with cloth of gold, all the horses were trapped with blacke veluet, and on them rode pages of honor, in which chariot rode two ancient ladies of hir countie: next after the chariot, followed sir ladies and gentlewomen of hir countie verie beautifull and richlie apparellled, and with them rode sir ladies of England. Then folloved an other chariot, gilt and furnished, then ten English ladies, and next them an other chariot couered with blacke cloth, and therein rode foure gentlewomen that were hir chamberers. Then folloved all the remnant of the ladies, gentlewomen and damosels in great number: and last of all came an other chariot all blacke, with three launders appertaining to hir grace; next after folloved an horlitter of cloth of gold and crimsin veluet upon veluet paled, with horses trap accordinglie, which the king had sent to hir. Then fol-loved the seruingmen of hir traine, all clothed in blacke, mounted on great horses, euerie one in due place and decent order, so that it was verie magnificall and more than princelie brauerie that then was exhibited to the beholders eyes, as the poet saith:

Cernitur hic plusquam regia pompa comes.

In this order they rode through the ranks and through the parke, till they came at the late friers wall, where all men alighted except the king, the two maisters of the horse, and the hensmen, which rode to the hall doore, & the ladies rode to the court gate, & as they passed, they might behold on the wharfe, how the citizens of London were rowing vp and downe on the Thames right before them, euerie craft with his barge garnished with banners, flags, streamers, pencels, and targets, painted and beaten with the kings armes, some with hir armes, and some with the armes of their craft and myserie.

There was also a barge called the bachellores barke, richlie decked, on the which waited a foist that shot great peeces of artillerie, and in euerie barge was great store of instruments of diuerse sorts, and men and children singing and plaing altogether, as the king and the ladie Anne passed by on the wharfe.
When the king and she were within the bitter court, they alighted from their horses, and the king loning-lie imbraced hir, kissed hir, & bad hir welcome to hir stone, leading hir by the left arme through the hall, which was furnished beneath the harch with the gard and above the harch with the fifte pensioners, with their battell ares; and so the king brought hir vp to hir priuie chamber, where he left hir for that time.
As soon as the king and she were entered the court, a great peale of artillerie was shot off from the tower of Greenwich, and there about.

come with in the parke (as before ye haue heard) then all the horsemen on Blackheath brake their arais, and had licence to depart to London or otherwhere to their lodgings.

On the tuesday following, being the daie of the Epiphanie, the marriage was solemnized betwixt the king and the said ladie. She was fetched from hir chamber by the lords, so that the going betwene the earle of Duerstaine, and the grand master Holcon-der, which had the conduct and order to see the mariage performed, she passed through the kings chamber & all the lords before hir, till she came into the galle-rie, where the king was readie, stateng for hir, to whom she made three low obeisances and courtesies.
Then the archbishop of Canturburie received them, and married them together, and the earle of Duer-staine did giue hir. When the marriage was celebrate they went hand in hand into the kings closet, and there hearing masse, offered their tapers, and after masse was ended, they had wine and spices. And that done, the king departed to his chamber, and all the ladies waited on hir to hir chamber, the duke of Norfolke going on hir right hand, and the duke of Suffolke on hir left.

After nine of the clocke, the king having shifted his apparell, came to his closet, & the likewise in hir she went openlie in procession, and offered and dined together. After they had supped together, there were banquets and masks, and diuerse disports thewed, till time came, that it pleased the king and hir to take rest. On the saturday after were kept solenne tusts, which greatly contented the strangers. This daie she was apparelled after the English manner, with a French hood, which became hir exceedingly well.

When the earle of Duerstaine and the other lords and ladies which had giuen their attendance on hir grace all that iourneie, had bene highly feasted and interteined of the king and other of the nobles, they toke leaue, and had great gifts giuen to them; both in monie and plate, and so returned toward their countrie, leaving behind them the erle of Wal-decke, and diuerse gentlemen and damoels to re-maine with hir, till she were better acquainted in the realme.

panies of the citie, all in barges gorgeondie garnished with baners, penons, and targets, richlie coue-red, and furnished with instruments, sweetlie sounding, gaue their attendance: and by the waie, all the ships shot off, and likewise from the towre, a great peale of ordinance went off lustilie. The twelue of Februarie, the duke of Norfolke was sent in am-bassage to the French king, of whome he was well interteined, and in the end of the same moneth he returned againe into England.

parish church.

After Christmas, the priorie church of S. Marie Ma-garet in Southwiche was purchased of the king by the inhabitants of the Bowe, D. Gardener bishop of Winchester putting to his helping hand: they made thereof a parish church, and the little church of Marie Magdalen toining to the same priorie, was made all one church, and saint Margarets in Southwiche a parish, was admitted to the same parish.

The thirde saturday in Lent, one doctor Barnes preached at Paules crosse, and in his sermon inuicighed against the bishop of Winchester, for doctrine by him preached in the same place, the first saturday of that Lent, intrcating of iustificatiou. Among other taunts that Barnes offered against the bishop, this was one, that if he & the bishop were both at home, he knew that great sums of monie would not save his life, where but for the bishop, there was no great feare, but by all intreatance would serue. The bishop offended herewith, complained of Barnes to the king, and had him examined, & at length by the kings commandement he came to the bishops house, where the matter was so handled at this time, that Barnes with two other preachers, the one named Hierome, and the other Garret (of whom hereafter more shall be said) were appointed to preach at S. Maries spittle by London in the Easter weeke. In that sermon which Barnes made before all the people, he asked the bishop forgiveness, for speaking so inuicentlie of him in his former sermon, and requited the bishop (if he did forgive him) in token thereof to hold by his hand, which like as it was long before he did, so (as manie thought afterward) it was but a signed forgiveness.

The twelue of April began a parlement, and sir Nicholas Hare was restored to the office of speaker, who together with sir Humfrey Woluene knight, and William Conneftie esquier, the three and twentieth of Februarie last past, had bin called before the lords into the Star chamber, for being of counsell with sir John Shelton knight, in making a fraudulent will of his lands, to the hinderance of the kings prerogatiue, and contrarie to the statute of Anno 27, for the which offense they were all at that time dismissed of their offices and seruices to the king, and the two knights were immediatlie sent to the towre, and the daies after Conneftie was committed thither also. They remained there in ward about ten daies, and were then deliuered. Sir Humfrey Woluene was the kings sargeant at law, sir Nicholas Hare was one of the kings counsellors, and speaker of the parlement, who being then depeyued, was now againe thereto restored. William Conneftie was attorneye of the dutchie of Lancaster. In this par-lement, were freely granted without contradictions, four score six hundred and a hundred of good lands, and twelue peice of good, toward the kings great charges of making Bulwikes.

The eighteenth of April at Westminster was Thomas lord Cromwell created earle of Essex, and ordained great chamberleine of England; which office the earles of Oxford were wont ener to enioie; also Gregorie his sonne was made lord Cromwell.
The foure and twentieth of April, Thomas lord Audley, & chancellor of England, with sir Anthoine Woluene, master of the kings houses, were made knights of the right honourable order of the garter.
On that daie, was a great triumph of iusting at Westminster, which iusts had bene proclaimed in France, Flanders, Scotland, and Spaine, for all commers that would, against the challengers of England; which were, sir John Audley, sir Thomas Selmer, sir Thomas Pointings, sir George Carew knights, Anthoine Kingston, and Richard Cromwell esquires, which said challengers came into the lists that daie richlie apparelled, and their horses trapped all in white beluet, with certeine knights and gentlemen riding afoze them, apparelled all in white beluet,

belnet, and white farlenet, and all their seruants in white dublets, and hozen cut after the Burgonion fashion: and there came to iust against them the said daie, of defendants for the fir, the earle of Surrie being the for most, lord William Howard, lord Clinton, and lord Cromwell, sonne and heire to Thomas Cromwell earle of Essex, and chamberleine of England, with other, which were richly apparelled.

And that day, sir John Dobleie was overthorne in the field, by mischance of his horse, by one master Brome defendant, neuertheless he brake diuerse speares balliantly after that. And after the said iusts were done, the said challengers rode to Durham place, where they kept open household, and feasted the king and quene, with hir ladies, and all the court. The second of Maie, Anthonte Kingston & Richard Cromwell were made knights at the said place. The third of Maie, the said challengers did tourne on horsebacke with swords, & against them came nine and twentie defendants; sir John Dobleie, and the earle of Surrie running first, who in the first course lost both their gantlets: and that daie, sir Richard Cromwell overthrew master Palmer in the field off his horse, to the great honor of the challengers. On the fift of Maie, the said challengers fought on foot at the barriers, and against them came thirtie defendants, which fought balliantly: but sir Richard Cromwell overthrew that daie at the barriers master Calpeper in the field.

The said challengers brake by their household, after they had kept open hospitalitie, and feasted the king, quene, and all the lords, beside all the knights and burgeses of the common house in time of the parlement, and the maiors, aldermen, and all their wives to their no small honor, though great expence. In the parlement which began the eighteenth of April last past, the religion of saint Johns in England, commonlie called the order of knights of the Hospites, was dissolved: & on the ascension day, being the fift of Maie, sir William Weston knight, prior of saint Johns departed this life for thought (as was reported) which he took to the heart, after he heard of that dissolution of his order. & For the king took all the lands that belonged to that order into his hands, to the augmentation of his crowne, and gaue vnto euery of the challengers above written for a reward of their balliantnesse, a hundred marks, and a house to dwell in of yearelye revenues out of the said lands for ever.]

The same moneth were sent to the Tower doctor Samson, bishop of Chichester, and doctor Wilson, for releasing certeine traitorous persons: and for the same offense was one Richard Farmer, a grocer of London, a rich and welthe man, and of good estimation in the citie, committed to the Marshalsee, & after at Westminster hall arraigned, and atteinted in the premunire; so that he lost all his goods. & The ninth daie of Iulie, Thomas lord Cromwell, late made earle of Essex (as before you haue heard) being in the counsell chamber, was suddenlie apprehended & committed to the Tower of London: the which manie lamented, but more reioiced, and spectallie such as either had bene religious men, or fauoured religious persons, for they banketed & triumphed together that night, manie wishing that that daie had bene seven yeares before; & some fearing that he should escape, although he were imprisoned, could not be merie.

Other who knew nothing but truth by him, both lamented him, and heartilie praised for him. But this is true, that of certeine of the cleargie he was detestable hated, and spectallie such as had borne swinge and by his means were put from it: for in deed he was a man that in all his doings seemed not to fauor anie kind of poperie, nor could not abide the smutting pride of some prelates, which bridonblelie (whatsoeuer else was the cause of his death) did shorten his life, and procured the end that he was brought vnto: which was, that the nineteenth daie of the said moneth he was atteinted by parlement, and neuer came to his answer: which law manie reported that he caused first to be made, howbeit the plaine truth thereof I know not. The articles for which he died appeare in the records, where his attainder is written, which are too long here to be rehearsed; but to conclude he was there atteinted of heresse and high treason, and the eight & twentieth of Iulie was brought to the scaffold on the Tower hill, where he said these words following.

The words of the lord Cromwell spoken at his death.

I Am come hither to die, and not to purge my selfe, as may happen some thinke that I will, for if I should so do, I were a verie bozetch and a miser. I am by the law condemned to die, and thanke my Lord God, that hath appointed me this death for mine offense. For since the time that I came to yeares of discretion I haue liued a sinner, and offended my Lord God, for the which I aske him hartlie forgiveness. And it is not knowne to manie of you, that I haue bene a great trauelier in the world, and being but of a bale degree, was called to high estate. And since the time I came therevnto, I haue offended my prince, for the which I aske him hartlie forgiveness, and beseech you all to praie to God with me, that he will forgive me. O Father forgive me, O Sonne forgive me, O Holie ghost forgive me, O three persons and one God forgive me. And now I praie you that be here, to beare me record, I die in the catholike faith, not doubting in anie article of my faith, no nor doubting in anie sacrament of the church. Manie haue slandered me, and reported that I haue bene a bearer of such as haue mainteined euill opinions, which is untrue: but I confesse, that like as God by his holie spirit doth instruct vs in the truth, so the diuell is ready to seduce vs, and I haue bene seduced: but beare me witness, that I die in the catholike faith of the holie church, and I hartlie desire you to praie for the kings grace, that he may long liue with you in health and prosperitie, & after him that his sonne prince Edward, that goodlie tyme may long reigne ouer you. And once againe I desire you to praie for me, that so long as life remaineth in this flesh, I wauer nothing in my faith.

Then made he his praier, which was long, but not so long as goodlie and learned, and after committed his soule to the hands of God, and so patientlie suffered the stroke of the ax, by a ragged and butcherlike miser, which ill fauouredlie performed the office. This man being borne in Putneie, a village in Surreie by the Thames side, foure miles distant from London, was sonne to a Smith, after whose deceasse, his mother was married to a Shereman. But notwithstanding the basenesse of his birth and lacke lacke of maintenance was at the beginning (as it happeneth to manie others) a great let and hindrance for vertue to shew hir selfe: yet through a singular excellencie of wit, joined with an industrious diligence of mind, and helpe of knowledge, gathered by painefull trauell, and marking the courses of states and governments as well of his native countrie at home, as in foren parties abroad, he grew to such a sufficient ripenesse of understanding and skill, in ordering of weightie affaires, that he was thought apt and fit for anie come or office where to he should be admitted.

Thomas Cromwell in most authority under the king.

Which being perceived of cardinall Wolseie, then archbishop of Yorke, he toke him into his service, and making him his solicitor, imploied him about businesse oftentimes of most importance, wherein he acquitted himselfe with such dexterity, as answered alwaies the credit committed to him. After the cardinals fall; he was advanced to the kings service, behaving himselfe so aduisedly in matters which he toke in hand, that within a small time he rose to high authoritie, and was admitted to be of the priue counsell, bearing most rule of all other under the king, as partlie ye haue heard: so that by him it well appeared, that the excellencie of hericall vertues, which aduance men to fame and honoz, resteth not onelie in birth and blood, as a priuilege appropriate and alonely annexed vnto noble houses, but remaineth at the disposition of almightie God the giuer: disposer of all gifts, who raiseth the poore manie times from the basest degree, and setteth him vp with princes, according to the saying of Ecclesiastes:

Qui iacuit tetro quandoque in carcere vincit, Paria suis meritis regia sceptru tulit.

Nevertheless, concerning the lord Cromwell earle of Essex, if we shall consider his comming vp to such high degree of honoz as he attained vnto, we maie doubt whether there be cause moze to maruell at his good fortune, or at his worthie and industrious demeanoz. But sith in the booke of Acts and Ponuiments ye maie find a sufficient discourse hereof, we need not to spend moze time about it, saue onelie as master Fox hath trulie noted, such was his actiuitie and forward ripenesse of nature, so readie and pregnant of wit, so discreet and well aduised in iudgement, so eloquent of tong, so faithfull and diligent in service, of such an incomparable memoize, so bold of stomach and hardie, and could do so well with his pen, that being conuerfant in the sight of men, he could not long continue vnhelped, nor yet vnprovidded of fauoz and helpe of friends, to set him forward in place and office.

Thankesfull he was and liberall, not forgetting benefits received, as by his great courtesie shewed to Friscovald the Italian it well appeared: a fauourer of the poore in their suites, and readie to relieue them that were in danger to be oppressed by their mightie aduersaries: a fauourer of the gospel, and an enuie to the pride of prelates, verie stout, and not able well to put vp injuries, which wane him shewd enemies that ceased not (as was thought) to seeke his curethow, till at length they had brought to passe that they wished. Carefull he was for his seruants, and readie to do them good, so that fearing the thing which came to passe, he provided well for the moze part of them, notwithstanding his fall. And thus much for the lord Cromwell. The moztow after Midsummer daie, the king caused the queene to remoue to Richmond, supposing it to be moze for hir health, and moze for hir pleasure.

The marriage betwixt the king and the ladie Anne of Cleue aduanced unlawful.

The first of Iulie, certeine lords came downe into the nether house, & expresselie declared causes, for the which the kings marriage was not to be taken lawfull: & in conclusion, the matter was by the conuocation clarelie determined, that the king might lawfullie marrie where he would, and so might she. And thus were they clarelie binorsed, and by the parliament it was enacted, that the should be taken no moze for queene, but called the ladie Anne of Cleue. In this yeare, the lord Leonard Greie, brother vnto Thomas marquisse Dorset, being the kings lieutenant in Ireland, was reuoked home, and upon his comming to London was sent to the Tower. In Iulie the priue of Salernit, and the lord d'Alouola came into England to see the king, & after they were departed, Don Frederiks, marquisse of Padoua, brother to the duke of Ferrara, the prince of Spaccedonie, the marquisse of Terra Noua, & monsieur de Flagic, with other, came from the emperors court into England to see the king, the which on Marie Magdalens daie came to the court at Westminster, and after they had bene highlie feasted, and noble intertained, they were richly rewarded as the other, and so departed.

The eight and twentieth of Iulie (as ye haue heard before) the lord Cromwell was beheaded, and likewise with him the lord Hungerford of Hertsford, who at the houre of his death seemed vnquiet, as manie iudged him rather in a frensie than otherwise: he suffered for buggerie. The thirteenth of Iulie were drawne on hurdels from the Tower to Smithfield, Robert Baris doctor of diuinitie, Thomas Garard, and William Jeron bachelors in diuinitie; Jeron was vicar of Stepnie, and Garard was person of Honio tane: also Dowell, Fetherston, and Abell priests. The first three were drawne to a stake, there before set vp, and then burned. The other three were drawne to the galloies, and hanged, beheaded and quartered. The three first (as is found in their atteindoz) were executed for diuerse heresies, but none alledged, whereat (saith Hall) I haue much maruelled, that their heresies were so manie, and not one alledged as a speciall cause of their death. And verelie at their deaths they asked the shiriffs what was their offense for which they were condemned: Who answered, they could not tell: but most men said it was for preaching against the doctrine of Stephan Gardiner bishop of Winchester, who chiefe (as the same Hall saith) procured their deaths. The last three, to wit, Dowell, Fetherston, and Abell, suffered for treason, as in their atteindoz was speciall mention made, to wit, for denieng the kings supremacie, and affirming his marriage with the ladie Katharin Dowager to be good.

The fourth of August, Thomas Empton some time a monke of Westminster, which had bene in prison for treason in Petogate now for the space of three yeares and moze, came before the iudices of gaole deliuerie at Petogate, and for that he would not aske the kings pardon, nor be swoone to be true to him, his monks garment was plucked from his backe, and he repriued, till the king were informed of his malicious obstinacie: and this was the last monke that was scene in his clothing in England till queene Maries daies. The fourth of August were drawne from the Tower of London to Tiburne, Giles Heron gentleman, Clement Philpot gentleman, late of Calis, and servant to the lord Lile, Darbie Genning, Edmund Bindholme priest, chapleine to the said lord Lile, William Horne late a late brother of the Charterhouse of London, and an other offendo: which six persons were there hanged and quartered, and had bene atteind of treason by parliament. The same daie also was one Charles Carew gentleman hanged for robbing of the ladie Carew.

The eight of August was the last Katharine Howard neere to the duke of Norfolk, and daughter ter to the lord Edmund Howard shewed openlie as quene at Hampton court. The eleuenth of September a stranger was hanged in a poyse field, named James Minatian, who had slaine his maister, one Capon a Florentine in a garden, for his harlot.

In the latter end of this summer, was universallie through the most parts of this realme great death by a strange kind of hot agues and aures, and some pestilence, in which season was such a drought, that wells and small rivers were cleane dreyed up, so that much cattell died for lacke of water, and the Thames was so shallow, & the fresh water of so small strength that the salt water flowed above London brydge, till the raine had increased the fresh waters.

On the two and twentieth of September, Rafe Egerton, servant to the lord Audley, lord chancellor, and one Thomas Harman servant to one maister Flightwood, were drawne, hanged, and quartered, the one for counterfeiting and antebating of the kings seale in a signet, wherewith he sealed licences for denizens, under the name of the clearkes of the chancery: and the other, that is to saie Harman, for writing them. One Tuckfield, being of their faction, robbed the lord Audleys chappell and fled, who being afterward apprehended at Calis, which towne he would have betrayed, he slue himselfe with a dagger. In the end of this yeare, the French king made a strong castell at Ard, and also a brydge over into the English pale, which brydge the crew of Calis did beat downe, and the Frenchmen built it up againe, but the Englishmen beat it downe againe.
After this, the king sent about fiftene hundred workmen to fortifie the towne of Guisnes, and sent with them five hundred men of warre to gard them.

It was reported in France, that a mightie armie was come over forth of England with great ordnance: which bryte caused the French king to send to the frontiers of Picardie the duke of Andoverne, and other capitaines with all speed to defend the same. The king of England hearing thereof, sent the earles of Surrie, and Southampton, and the lord Russell, high admerall into the marches of Calis, to set order there, and after them he likewise sent two hundred light horsemen of the borders of Scotland, whom the Frenchmen called Stradiots. The lords having set order in things, thortly returned. A boie, one Richard Perkins, not past fiftene yeares of age, was burnt in Smithfield, for speaking against the sacrament, and contrarie to the statute of the six articles. The bishop of London was thought in great fault, for procuring that terrible execution, seeing the yong fellow was but an ignorant foole without learning, and gladlie recanted that wherewith he was charged.

About the latter end of this yeare, doctor Samson bishop of Chichester, and doctor Willson, which had bene committed to the tower (as before ye have heard) were now pardoned of the king, and set againe at libertie. In the beginning of this yeare, five priests in Yorkshire began a new rebellion, with the assent of one Leigh, a gentleman, and nine tempozall men, all which persons were apprehended, and in divers places put to execution. The said Leigh and two other, the one named Waterfall a clothier, & the other Thornton a peoman, on the seuententh of Maie, were drawne through London to Tiburne, and there executed. And sir John Hewill knight, and ten other persons, died for the same cause at Dozke.
The same date, Margarete countesse of Salisburie, that had remained a long time prisoner in the tower, was beheaded there within the tower. She was the last of the right line and name of Plantagenet. The ninth of June for example sake, two of the kings gard, the one named Dampozt, and the other Chapman, were hanged at Greenwich by the kiers wall, for robberies which they had committed.

¶ On the tenth of June, sir Edmund Raneet knight, of Dorsetshire, was arraigned before the kings iustices (sitting in the great hall at Grene-wich) maister Coge, comptroller of the kings house, hold, maister Southwell, sir Anthonie Browne, sir Anthonie Winkesfield, maister Wristleie, and Comund Beckham, cofferer of the kings household, for striking of one maister Clers of Dorsetshire, servant with the earle of Surrie, within the kings house in the tenis court. There was first chosen to go upon the said Edmund, a quest of gentlemen, and a quest of peomen, to inquire of the said stripe, by the which inquests he was found gilty, and had iudgement to lose his right hand. Whereupon was called to do the execution, first the sergeant surgion with his instruments appertaining to his office: the sergeant of the woodyard with the mallet, and a blocke whereupon the hand should lie: the maister cooke for the king, with the knife: the sergeant of the larder, to set the knife right on the joint: the sergeant ferrer, with the searing irons to seare the veines: the sergeant of the poultrie, with a cocke, which cocke should have his head smitten off upon the same blocke, and with the same knife: the peoman of the chanterie, with seare cloths: the peoman of the skullerie, with a pan of fire to heate the irons, a chafer of water to cole the ends of the irons, and two formes for all officers to set their stufte on: the sergeant of the cellar, with wine, ale, and here: the peoman of the peltrie in the sergeants tread, who was absent, with bason, cewe, and towels.

Thus euerie man in his office readie to do the execution, there was called forth sir William Pickering knight marshall, to bring in the said Edmund Raneet: and when he was brought to the bar, the chiefe iustice declared to him his trespass, and the said Raneet confessing himselfe to be gilty, humbly submitted him to the kings mercie: for this offense he was not onlie indged to lose his hand, but also his bodie to remaine in prison, and his lands and goods at the kings pleasure. Then the said sir Edmund Raneet desired that the king of his benigne grace would pardon him of his right hand, and take the left, for (quoth he) if my right hand be spared, I maie hereafter do such good service to his grace, as shall please him to appoint. Of this submission and request the iustices forthwith informed the king, who of his goodnesse, considering the gentle heart of the said Edmund, and the good report of the lords, granted him his pardon, that he should lose neither hand, lands, nor goods, but should go free at libertie.

The lord Leonard Greie being indicted of cer-teine points of treason by him committed, as was alleged against him, during the season that he was the kings lieutenant in Ireland, to wit, for delivring his nephew Girald Fitzgerard brother unto Thomas Fitzgerard before executed, and also for that he caused certeine Irishmen to invade the lands of the kings friends, whome he favoured not: on the five and twentieth of June he was arraigned at Westminster in the kings bench, and appointed to be tried by knights, because he was a lord by name, and no lord of the parlement; but he discharged the turie, and confessed the indictment, wherupon he had iudgement, and on the eight and twentieth of June being saint Peters euen, he was beheaded at tower hill, where he ended his life verie quietlie and godlie.

This noble man as he was come of high linage, so was he a right valiant and hardie personage, having in his time done his prince and countrie good service, both in Ireland, France, and other places,

res, greatlie to his commendation, although now his hap was thus to lose his head, as conuicted by law, and his renowne (ouercast with a cloud of disgrace) banished, as future chances befell, to the abolishing of the present hono^r which sometime he intoid. Whobest, his estimation he might haue preserved unblemished, had provident circumspection undertaken the direction of his doings, and that he had bozne his eyes in his forehead, to foresee all afterclaps, which a wise man will in no case neglect:

Nam sapiens in fronte oculos habet, omnia spectans, Omnia prudenti cum ratione videns.

The same daie that he suffered, there was erected at saint Thomas Waterings thre gentlemen, John Pantell, John Frotods, and george Roidon: they died for a murther committed in Suffer (as their indictment imported) in companie of Thomas Fines lord Dacres of the south. The truth whereof was thus. The said lord Dacres, through the lewd persuation of some of them, as hath bene reported, meaning to hunt in the parke of Nicholas Delham esquire at Laughton, in the same countie of Suffer, being accompanied with the said Pantell, Frotods, and Roidon, John Cheinie and Thomas Illete gentlemen, Richard Middleton and John Goldwell yeomen, passed from his house of Hurkmonseur, the last of Aprill in the night season, toward the same parke, where they intended to hunt; and coming unto a place called Pikehaie in the parish of Wilinglesie, they found one John Busbyg, James Watbyg, and Richard Sumner standing together; and as it fell out through quarrelling, there ensued a fraie betwixt the said lord Dacres and his companie on the one partie, and the said John and James Busbyg and Richard Sumner on the other: insomuch that the said John Busbyg received such hurt, that he died thereof the second of Maie next ensuing.

Whereupon, as well the said lord Dacres as those that were there with him, and diuerse other likewise that were appointed to go an other waie to meet them at the said parke, were indicted of murther: and the seauen and twentieth of June the lord Dacres himselfe was arraigned before the lord Audleie of Walden then lord chancelor, sitting that daie as high steward of England, with other p^{er}ces of the realme about him, who then and there condemned the said lord Dacres to die for that transgression. And afterward the nine and twentieth of June being saint Peters daie, at eleuen of the clocke in the forenone, the shriffs of London, accordinglie as they were appointed, were readie at the towler to haue received the said prisoner, and him to haue lead to execution on the towler hill. But as the prisoner should come forth of the towler, one Heire a gentleman of the lord chancelors house came, and in the kings name commanded to fraie the execution till two of the clocke in the afternone, which caused manie to thinke that the king would haue granted his pardon. But neuerthelesse, at thre of the clocke in the same afternone, he was brought forth of the towler, and delivered to the shriffs, who lead him on foot betwixt them unto Tiburne, where he died. His bodie was buried in the church of saint Sepulchers. He was not pass foure and twentieth yeres of age, when he came through this great mishap to his end, for whome manie fore lamented, and likewise for the other thre gentlemen, Pantell, Frotods, and Roidon. But for the sad young lord, being a right towardlie gentleman, and such a one, as manie had conceiued great hope of better p^{ro}fe, no small mone and lamentation was made; the more indeed, for that it was thought he was induced to attempt such follie, which occasioned his death, by some light brads that were then about him.

The true report of the cause whereupon the murther of John Busbyg ensued.

The first of Iulie a Welchman a minstrell was hanged and quartered for singing of songs, which were interpreted to be propheties against the king. This summer the king took his progresse to Porke, and passed through Lincolnshire, where was made to him an humble submission by the temporalitie, and confessing their faults, they humbly thanked him for his pardon, which he had granted them. The towne of Stanford gaue to him twentie pounds, the cite of Lincoln fortie pounds, Boston fiftie pounds, that part of the shire which is called Lindsey gaue thre hundred pounds, and Kesteven and the church of Lincoln presented him with fiftie pounds. At his entering into Dorsetshire, he was met with two hundred gentlemen of the same shire, in coies of beluet, and foure thousand tall yeomen and serving men well horsed, which on their knees made their submission, by the mouth of sir Robert Botwes, and gaue to the king nine hundred pounds. On Barnetdale the archbishop of Porke, with thre hundred priests and more met the king, and making a like submission, gaue to him six hundred pounds. The like submission was made by the maiors of Porke, Bewcastle, and Hull, and ech of them gaue to the king an hundred pounds.

After he had bene at Porke twelue daies, he came to Hull, where he deuised certeine fortifications. This done, he passed over the water of Humber, and so through Lincolnshire, returned toward the south parts, and at Alhallowen tide came to Hampton court. About the same time, the king had knowledge that the queene lived dissolute, in using the vnlawfull companie of one Francis Diram, with whom she had bene so familiar before hir maraige with the king; not meaning to forgo his companie now in time of hir marriage; without regard had either to the feare of God, or the king hir husband, the last summer being in progresse with the king at Domfret, the seuen and twentieth of August, he retained the said Francis Diram in hir seruice, to the intent she might vse his companie in such vnlawfull sort the more frelie: and not satisfied with him, she also vied the vnlawfull companie of Thomas Culpeper esquire, one of the gentlemen of the kings priue chamber, as well at Domfret as of old on the nine and twentieth and last of August as of old said, and on the first of September, as at diuerse other times and places before and after. Whereupon, the thirtieth of Nouember, sir Thomas Wriothesle knight the kings secretarie, came to Hampton court unto the said queene, and called all hir ladies, gentlewomen, and seruants into hir great chamber, & there openlie in p^{re}sence of them all, declared hir offenses committed in abusing of hir bodie before hir maraige, & therewith he discharged hir household. The morrow after she was conuicted to Sion, the ladie Watnton and certeine gentlewomen and some of hir seruants being appointed to wait upon hir there, till the kings pleasure might be further knowne. Culpeper, Diram, and others were had to the towler. Diram in his examination being charged with the familiaritie which had bene betwixt them, before she was married to the king, confessed that he and the said queene had made a precontract together, and that he concealed it for hir preferment in marriage to the king, after he understood the king began to cast a li king towards hir.

The first of December, Culpeper and Diram were arraigned at the Guildhall in London, before the lord maior sitting there in iudgement as cheefe iudge, hauing the lord chancelor upon his right hand, and the duke of Norfolke upon his left hand, the duke of Suffolke the lord priue seale, the earles of Suffer and Hereford, with diuerse other of the council.

counsell sitting there as Iudges in commission that daie: the prisoners in the end confessed the indictment, and had Iudgement to die, as in cases of treason.

The tenth of December, the said Culpeper and Diram were drawn from the tower unto Tyburne and there Culpeper had his head stricken off, and Diram was hanged, dismembred and headed. Culpeper's bodie was buried in S. Sepulchers church, but both their heads were set on London bridge. The two and twentieth of December were arraigned in the kings bench at Westminster, the ladie Margaret Howard, wife to the lord William Howard, Katharine Willene, & Alice Kestwold gentlewomen, Joane Bulmer, wife to Anthony Bulmer gentleman, Anne Howard, wife to Henrie Howard esquier, and brother to the late queene, Mailein Willene widow, Margaret Benet, wife to John Benet gentleman, Edward Algraue gentleman, William Ashbie gentleman; all these were condemned of misprision of treason, for concealing the queenes misdeemeanour. And the same daie in the afternone, the lord William Howard, and Dampport a gentleman were likewise arraigned, and condemned of the same offense, and as well these as the other were adjudged to lose their goods, & the profits of their lands during life, and to remaine in perpetuall prison.

The firste of Januarie the parlement began at Westminster, in the which the lords and commons exhibited certeine petitions to the king. First, that he would not vex himselfe with the queenes offense, and that he and the ladie Rochford might be attainted by parlement: and to avoid protracting of time, they besought him to give his roiall assent thereto, under his great seale, without stateng for the end of the parlement. Also, that Diram and Culpeper be soe attainted by the common law, might also be attainted by parlement, & that Agnes duchess of Norfolk, and Katharine countesse of Widdewater his daughter, which for concealing the said offense, were committed to the towre, and indicted of misprision, & the lord William Howard arraigned of the same, might likewise be attainted. Also, that who soever had spoken or done anie thing in detestation of his naughtie life, should be pardoned.

To these petitions the king granted, thanking the commons, for that it appeared they took his grieffe to be theirs: whereupon the queene and the ladie Rochford were attainted by both the houses. On the tenth of Februarie, the queene was conveyed from Sion to the towre by water, the duke of Suffolke, the lord priue seale, and the lord great chamberleine, having the conduction of hir. The next daie after being Saturday, and the eleventh of Februarie, the king did send his roiall assent by his great seale, and then all the lords were in their robes, and the common house called by, & there the act was read, and his assent declared. And so on the thirteenth daie, those two ladies were beheaded on the greene within the towre with an ax, where they confessed their offenses, and died repentant.

Before this, on the three and twentieth daie of Januarie was the king proclaimed king of Ireland, as it was enacted both by authoritie of the parlement here, and also of an other parlement holden at Dublin in Ireland, there begun the thirteenth of June last past, before sir Anthony Saintleger knight, and the kings deputie there, where as till that time the kings of England were onlie intituled lords of Ireland. In the beginning of March died sir Arthur Plantagenet vicount Lisle, bassard sonne to Edward the fourth, in the towre of London unattainted, when he should haue bene deliuered and set at libertie.

The occasion of his trouble for the which he was committed to the towre, rose upon suspicion that he should be priue to a practise, which some of his men (as Hilpot and Hindholme executed the last yeare as before ye haue heard) had consented unto, for the betraying of Calis to the French, whilste he was the kings lieutenant there. But after that by due trial it was knowne that he was nothing guiltie to the matter, the king appointed sir Thomas Wriotheslie his maiesties secretarie, to goe unto him, and to deliver to him a ring, with a rich diamond for a token from him, & to will him to be of good cheere. For although in that so weightie a matter, he would not haue done lesse to him if he had bene his owne son; yet now upon through trial had, sith it was manifestlie proued that he was void of all offense, he was soeie that he had bene occasioned so farre to trie his truth: and therefore willed him to be of god cheere and comfort, for he should find that he would make accompt of him as of his most true and faithfull kinsman, and not onelie restore him to his former libertie, but otherwise forth he readie to pleasure him in what he could. After secretarie set forth this message with such effectuall words, as he was an eloquent and well spoken man, that the lord Lisle took such immoderate ioy thereof, that his hart being oppressed therewith, he died the night following through too much reioicing. After his decesse, the twelue of the same moneth of March, sir John Aubeleie sonne and heire to the said lord Lises wife, was at Westminster created vicount Lisle. The seuenteenth of March one Margaret Danie a yong woman, being a seruant, was boyled in Smithfield for poisoning of hir mistres with whome she dwelt, and diuerse other persons.

In the Lent season, whilste the parlement yet continued, one George Ferrers gentleman, seruant to the king, being elected a burgesse for the towne of Blimmothe in the countie of Denonshire, in going to the parlement house, was arrested in London by a procelle out of the kings bench, at the sute of one White, for the sum of two hundred markes or thereabouts, wherein he was late afoze condemned, as a suertie for the debt of one Melbon of Salisburie: which arrest being signified to sir Thomas Spolls knight, then speaker of the parlement, and to the knights and burgesse there, order was taken, that the sargeant of the parlement, called S. John, should forthwith repaire to the counter in Bedstreet (whither the said Ferrers was caried) and there demand deliuerie of the prisoner.

The sargeant (as he had in charge) went to the counter, and declared to the clerks there what he had in commandement. But they and other officers of the citie were so farre from obeleng the said commandement, as after manie stout words they forcibly resisted the said sargeant, whereof ensued a fraie within the counter gates, betwene the said Ferrers and the said officers, not without hurt of either part: so that the said sargeant was driven to defend himselfe with his mace of armes, & had the crostone thereof broken by bearing off a stroke, and his man stricken downe. During this brawl, the shiriffes of London, called Rotoland Wyll, and Henrie Snelkiffe came thither, to whome the sargeant complained of this iniurie, and required of them the deliuerie of the said burgesse, as afoze. But they hearing with their officers, made little accompt either of his complaint or of his message, reiecting the same contemptuously, with much proud language, so as the sargeant was forced to returne without the prisoner, whereas if they had obeyed authoritie, and shewed the seruice necessarilie required in their office and person, they might by their discretion haue appeased all the houle, for wisdomes assuageth the outrage & unrestrainable furiosnes of war, as the poet saith: Instrumenta feri vincit sapientia belli.

The sargeant thus hardlie intreated, made returne to the parlement houle, and finding the speaker, and all the burgeses set in their places, declared unto them the whole case as it fell, who took the same in so ill part, that they altogether (of whom there were not a few, as well of the kings private counsell, as also of his private chamber) would sit no longer without their burges, but rose up whole, and repaired to the upper houle, where the whole case was declared by the mouth of the speaker, before sir Thomas Audley knight then lord chancelor of England, and all the lordes and iudges there assembled, who iudging the contempt to be verie great, referred the punishment thereof to the order of the common houle. They returning to their places againe, upon new debate of the case, took order, that their sargeant should estowies repaite to the shiriffe of London, and require deliverte of the said burgesse, without anie writ or warrant had for the same, but onelie as afoze.

And yet the lord chancelor offered there to grant a writ, which they of the common houle refused, being in a clere opinion, that all commandements and other acts of proceeding from the nether houle, were to be done and executed by their sargeant without writ, onelie by shew of his mace, which was his warrant. But before the sargeants returne into London, the shiriffes having intelligence how heinouslie the matter was taken, became somewhat more mild, so as upon the said second demand, they delivured the prisoner without anie deniall. But the sargeant having then further in commandement from those of the nether houle, charged the said shiriffes to appear personallie on the morrow, by eight of the clocke before the speaker in the nether houle, and to bring thither the clerks of the counter, and such officers as were parties to the said affraie, and in like manner to take into his custodie the said White, which wittinglie procured the said arrest, in contempt of the privilege of the parlement.

Which commandement being done by the said sargeant accordingly, on the morrow the two shiriffes, with one of the clerks of the counter (which was the chiefe occasion of the said affraie) together with the said White, appeared in the common houle, where the speaker charging them with their contempt and misdeemeanor aforesaid, they were compelled to make immediat answer, without being admitted to anie counsell. Albeit, sir Roger Cholmeleite, then recorder of London, and other of the counsell of the citie there present, offered to speake in the cause, which were all put to silence, and none suffered to speake, but the parties themselves: whereupon in conclusion, the said shiriffes and the same White, were committed to the Tower of London, and the said clerke (which was the occasion of the affraie) to a place there called litle ease, and the officer of London which did the arrest, called Tailor, with foure other officers to be dwgate, where they remained from the eight & twentieth untill the thirtieth of March, and then they were delivured, not without humble sute made by the mayor of London & other their friends.

And for somuch as the said Ferrers being in execution upon a condemnation of debt, and set at large by privilege of parlement, was not by law to be brought againe into execution, and so the partie with out remedie for his debt, as well against him as his principall debtor; after long debate of the same by the space of nine or ten daies together, at last they resolved upon an act of parlement to be made, and to reuise the execution of the said debt against the said Whelden which was principall debtor, and to discharge the said Ferrers. But before this came to passe, the common houle was divided upon the question: howbeit in conclusion, the act passed for the said Ferrers, twine by fourteene voices.

The king then being advertised of all this proceeding, called immediatlie before him the lord chancelor of England and his iudges, with the speaker of the parlement, and other of the grauest persons of the nether houle, to whom he declared his opinion to this effect. First commending their wisdomes in maintaining the privileges of their houle (which he would not haue to be infringed in anie point) he alleged that he being head of the parlement, and attending in his owne person upon the businesse thereof, ought in reason to haue privilege for him and all his servants attending there upon him. So that if the said Ferrers had bene no burgesse, but onlie his servant, yet in respect thereof he was to haue the privilege as well as anie other.

For I understand (quoth he) that you not onelie for your owne persons, but also for your necessarie servants, even to your cookes and householders, inioine the said privilege; in somuch as my lord chancelor here present hath informed vs, that he being speaker of the parlement, the cooke of the Temple was arrested in London, and in execution upon a statute of the staple. And for somuch as the said cooke, during all the parlement, served the speaker in that office, he was taken out of execution, by the privilege of the parlement. And further we be informed by our iudges, that we at no time stand so highlie in our estate roiall, as in the time of parlement, wherein we as head, and you as members, are conioined and knit together into one bodie politike, so as whatsoeuer offense or iniurie (during that time) is offered to the meaneest member of the houle, is to be iudged as done against our person, and the whole court of parlement. Which prerogative of the court is so great (as our learned counsell informeth vs) as all ads and proceses comming out of anie other inferior courts must for the time cease and giue place to the highest.

And touching the partie, it was a great presumption in him, knowing our servant to be one of this houle, and being warned thereof before, would nevertheless prosecute this matter out of time, and thereupon was well worthy to haue lost his debt (which I would not wish) and therefore do commend your equitie, that hauing lost the same by law, haue restored him to the same against him who was his debtor. And if it be well considered, what a charge hath it bene to vs and you all, not onelie in expence of our substance, but also in losse of time, which should haue bene imploied about the affaires of our realme, to sit here twelue or one whole fortnight about this one private case, he may thinke himselfe better used than his desert. And this may be a good example to other to learne good manners, & not to attempt anie thing against the privilege of this court, but to take their time better. This is mine opinion, and if I erre, I must referre my selfe to the iudgement of our iustices here present, and other learned in our lawes.

Whereupon sir Edm. Montacute lord chiefe iustice, verie grauelie told his opinion, confirming by diuers reasons all that the king had said, which was asserted unto by all the residue, none speaking to the contrary. The act in deed passed not the higher houle, for the lordes had not time to consider of it, by reason of the dissolution of the parlement, the feast of Easter then approaching. Because this case hath bene diuerslie reported, and is commonlie alleged as a precedent for the privilege of the parlement; I haue endeavored my selfe to learne the truth thereof, and so set it it forth with the whole circumstance at large according to their instructions, who ought best both to know and remember it.

This yeare in Spaine the king took a lode of mo-nie of all such as were valued at fiftie pounds and upward in the subsidie booke. The lord pryncesse the bishop of Winchester, sir John Baker, and sir Thomas Wriothesley were commissioners about this lode in London, where they so handled the matter, that of some head citizens they obtained a thousand markes in prest to the kings use. They that laid forth anie summe in this wise, had pryncesse scales for the repayment thereof within two yeares next insu-ing. Divers of the Irish nobilitie came this yeare into England, and made their submission to the king as in the Irish chronicle it is more particularie touched. Also wars fell out betwixt England and Scotland, the causes whereof (as appereth by a declaration set forth by the king of England at this present) in effect were these. First there were divers of the English rebels, such as had moued the commotion in the north and Lancashire, that fled into Scotland, and were there maintained: and although request had bene made that they might be deliuered, yet it would not be granted.

Moreover, where the king of Scots had promised to repaire unto Forke the last yeare, and there to meet his uncle the king of England, whereupon the king of England to his great charges had made preparation for their meeting there; the same was not onelic disappointed, but also at the kings being at Forke, in lieu thereof an inuasion was made by the Scots, as it were in contempt and despite of the king of England, who notwithstanding imputing the default of meeting to the aduise of his nephues councell, and the inuasion to the lewdnesse of his subiects, was contented to giue courteous audience vnto such ambassadozs as the same king of Scots sent into England, which came to the king at Christmas last, and with manie sweet and pleasant wordes excused that which was done amisse, & sought to persuade kindnesse and perfect amitie in time to come. And for the better accomplishment thereof, they offered to send commissioners to the borders, there to determine the debate betwixt them of the confines, if it would please the king likewise to send commissioners for his part, which to doe he graciously condescended, desirous to make triall of his nephue in some correspondence of deeds, to the faire and pleasant messages in wordes which he had receined from him.

Whereupon commissioners were sent from either king, the which met and talked. But where the Englishmen chalenged a peece of ground, vndoubtedly stirred by the Scots, being for the same shewed such euidence as more substantiall, or more autentike can not be brought forth for anie ground within the realme; the same was neuertheless by the Scots denied and reiected, onelic for that it was made (as they alleged) by Englishmen, and yet was it so ancient, as it could not be counterfeited now, and the value of the ground so little, and of so small weight, as no man would attempt to falsifie a writing for such a matter. But yet this deniall notwithstanding, the English commissioners departed from the Scottish commissioners as friends, taking order, as hath bene accustomed, for good rule vpon the borders in the meane time to be obserued.

After their departure, the lord Sparwell warden of the west marches in Scotland, made proclamation in deed for good rule to be kept: but neuertheless added therewith, that the borderers of Scotland shuld withdraue their goods from the borders of England, and incontinentlie after the Scottish borderers, on the fourth of Iulie entered into England suddenlie, & spoiled the kings subjects, contrarie to the league, and euen after the plaine maner of warre. Where-vpon the king of England greatlie maruelling, was driuen to furnish his borders with a garrison for defense of the same, as mistrusting a further mis-chiefe intended by the enemie, whose treacherie & loose dealing became a whetstone to the kings wrath, and set him in a heat of indignation, as the poet saith:

Iam Scotus Henrici instam irritauerat iram Fœdificagus.

Then was James Leirmouth master of the Sco-tish kings household sent into England with letters deuised in the best maner, offering a good redress of all attempts: and yet neuertheless at the entrie of the said Leirmouth into England, a great number of Scots then not looked for, made a rode into England, to the great annoiance of the English borders, which dealing, though it much moued the king of England to take displeasure against the Scots, yet he gaue gentle audience to Leirmouth at his com-ming into him, and by his faire wordes and promises was partlie pacified. But in the meane time, the deeds of the Scottish borderers were as extreme as might be. And in a rode made by sir Robert Wolues for reuenge thereof, the same sir Robert, and manie other with him, were taken prisoners, and could not be deliuered, nor admitted to pake their fine and ransome, as hath bene euer accustomed betwixt them on the borders.

And where at the same time, an assurance was made on both sides for a season, at the sute of the said Leirmouth, the Scots ceased not to make sundrie inuasions into England, in such wise, as the king no longer trusting to their faire wordes, but weleing their deeds, put an armie in a readinesse for defense of his subjects, as the due meane to attaine such a peace, as for the safetie of his people and dominions, he thought it stood with his honour to procure.
After which preparation made, and knowledge thereof had, the king of Scots made new sute to haue the matter taken vp by treatie. Wherevpon the king caused the armie to staie about Forke, and appointed the duke of Suffolke his lieutenant generall, the lord pryncesse, the bishop of Durham, & sir Anthoine Wolue master of his hostes, to treat & conclude with the ambassadozs of Scotland some friendlie peace, vpon reasonable and indifferent condicions, as should be thought requisite, for the a-uoiding of warres, than by sundrie inuasions of the Scots made open and manifest. But after they had viewed ech others commissions, and began to propone articles, the Scottish commissioners to protract time, at the first seemed to like such articles as the English commissioners had preposed, and made semblance as if there were no doubt, but that in case their king & ours might meet, all matters shuld be quietlie compounded and ended: and so taking it as for a thing sure and certeine, they onlie desired sir daies to obtaine answer from their master, and our armie for that time to staie: wherevnto the English commissioners accorded.

After those six daies was sent a commission out of Scotland, to conclude a meeting precise, at such a place as they knew well could not in the winter season be obserued nor kept. Wherewith when the English commissioners seemed nothing content, the Scottish commissioners shewed forth instructions, wherein libertie was giuen to them to exceed their commission in the appointing of a place, & to consent to anie other by the English commissioners thought meet and conuenient. But when the English commissioners refused to deale with men wanting sufficient commission to warrant their doings, the Scot-with commissioners required other five daies respite, to send for a larger commission, which being granted, at the end of those five daies, they brought forth a commission made in god forme, and without exception of restraint of place: but therewith they shewed instructions containing a like restraint, as in the former commission was expressed. And thus delaying forth the matter by trifling, upon purpose onlie to win time, they hoped thereby through the winter coming on, that the English armie should not be able much to annoie their countrey for that yeare. And so their talke brake by without any conclusion of agreement at all; and forthwith was the armie set forward, a good part whereof had lien all this time of the treatie in Poyke, and in the countreies thereabouts.

The English armie entirely into Scotland.

When the whole power was assembled, the duke of Norfolk then lieutenant general, accompanied with the earles of Shrewsburie, Derby, Cumberland, Surreie, Hertford, Angus, Rosland, and the lords of the north parts, and sir Anthoine Browne master of the hounses, sir John Cage controller of the kings hounse, and others, having with them twentie thousand men well and warlike appointed, entered Scotland the one and twentieth of October, and tarried there eight daies, without having any battell offered unto them, in which space they burnt these townes and villages, Darton, Kamrige, Stine, Cradin, Shilles lang Conem, Newton, Skittwell, Newthorne, Smellem spittle, the two Herdens, Slederiche, and the two Worlawes, Floris, and the Faire croft, Conem spittle, Norborough, Helleie and the abbete, long Spyonstow, Kiden, and Hadenston. For they had determined with fire and sword to take utter reuenge, crying out, as the poet saith;

*Vindice ferro opus esse, opus esse & vindice flamma,

Now while the duke was at Farnton, the fourth daie after his coming into Scotland, there came to speake with him halfe a mile from the campe, the bishop of Orkenele, and James Letrmouth sent from the king of Scots to intreat of peace, but they agreed not. Finally, after the Englishmen had lien so long within Scotland as they might recover victols, at length for necessitie they returned to Berwick. In all which iourneie the standard of the earle of Southampton, late lord pynie seale (which died at Newcastell before their entring into Scotland) was borne in the foreward, because he was appointed capitaine of the same.

The earle of Southampton: tons standard.

The king of Scots, hearing that the English armie was returned, raised a power of fiftene thousand men forth of all parts of his realme, under the guiding of the lord Sparwell (or rather of Oliver Sinclair, as the Scots affirme) boasting to carrie as long in England, as the duke of Norfolk had tarried in Scotland. And so on fridaie being saint Katharins euen, they passed ouer the water of Clike, and burnt certeine houses of the Greues on the berie border. Thomas bassard Dacres, with Jacke of Pulgrau sent word to sir Thomas Wharton lord Warden for the king upon the west marches, to come forward to succour them. But in the meane while the Scots entring verie fierclie, the aforesaid two valiant capitaine, bassard Dacres and Pulgrau, manfullie set upon the Scots with one hundred light hounses, and left a skale on the side of a hill, wherewith the Scots were wonderfullie dismayed, thinking that either the duke of Norfolk with his whole armie had bene come to those west marches, or that some other great power had bene coming against them, when they saw onlie sir Thomas Wharton with three hundred men marching forward toward them. But so it fortuneed at that time un-doubtleslie, as God would haue it, that the Scots fled at the first hunt; whome the Englishmen followed, and toke prisoners at their pleasures; for there was small resistance, or none at all shewed by the Scots.

Amongst others that were taken, we find these men of name, the earle of Caill and Glencarne, the lord Sparwell admiral of Scotland, and warden of the west marches, the lord Fleming, the lord Shermwell, the lord Oliphant, the lord Greie, sir Oliver Sinclair the kings minion, John Ross lord of Craigie, Robert Crislin son to the lord Crislin, Carre lord of Breton, the lord Sparwell two brethren, John Lelake bassard son to the earle of Ros, thus, George Hume lord of Hermiton, John Spauland lord of White castell, James Pringell, James Sinclair brother to Oliver Sinclair, John Carmichael capitaine of Craisforth, Patrike Hebborne esquire, John Seton esquire son in law to the lord Crislin, William Seton esquire, John Steward cousin to the king, John Foxrowe esquire, Henrie Dowmont esquire, James Gittton esquire, John Carmurth esquire capitaine of Craisforth, James Gittton esquire, and other esquires and gentlemen (beside the earles and lords before mentioned) to the number of two hundred and above, and more than eight hundred other persons of meaner calling; so that some one Englishman, yea some women had three or foure prisoners. They toke also foure and twentie peeces of ordinance, foure carts laden with speares, and ten paulions, with other things of price; so that this might well be said to be the handie worke of God; and the verse of the psalme verified:

Contemplans dixi, Et ecce militatio dextra Numinis excelsi mortalia cuncta gubernans.

The king of Scots toke such grieue and inward thought for his ouerthrow, and also for the murder of an English herald that was slain at Dunbar, by one Lech an Englishman (the which for the rebellion in Lincolnshire was fled into Scotland) that he fell into a hot ague, and thereof died, although manie reported that he was at the bickering, and recovered there his deaths wound, and fled therewith into Scotland. But of his death, and of the birth of his daughter ye may see more in the historie of Scotland.

Of these prisoners before named, one and twentieth of them were brought to London, and on the nineteenth of December entred into the citie by Bishops gate, and so were conueied to the tower, where they remained for the space of two daies: and upon saint Thomas daie the apostle, being the one and twentieth of December, they were conueied to Westminster, sir John Cage constable of the tower riding before them, and the lieutenant of the same tower riding behind them. They rode two and two together, and eight of them being earls and lords, had new gowns of blacke damaske furred with blacke conie, coates of blacke velvet, and doublets of sattin, with shirts and other apparell bought new for them at the kings charges.

Four and twentieth of the king of Scotland's prisoners brought to London.

Thus being solemnlie conueied through the streets of London into Westminster, they came before the counsell sitting in the Star chamber, and there the lord chancelor declared to them their vntruth, unkindnesse, and false dissimulation, declaring further how the king had cause of war against them, both for denieng of their homages, and also for their traitorous invasions made into his realme without defiance, and for keeping his subjects prisoners without redemption, contrarie to the ancient laws of the marches; for which doings, God (as they might perceiue) had scourged them. Wherewith the more regarding his honor than his princelie power, was was content to shew them kindnesse for takinge keepe them in streit prison by iust law of armes, yet he was content that they should haue libertie to be with the nobles of his realme in their houses, and according to their estates, they were appointed to dukes, earles, bishops, knights, and gentlemen, which so interteined them, that they confessed themselues neuer to be better bled, nor to haue had greater chere in all their life times.

The earle of Caillis was appointed to be with the archbishop of Cantuarburie, the earle of Glencarne with the duke of Norfolke, the lord Fleming with the lord priue seale, the lord Sparwell with sir Anthonie Holore, the lord Summerwell with the lord chandit, as were thought meet to answer for their safe keeping.

The two and twentieth of December, tidings came of the king of Scots death, and upon S. Johns daie in Christmas weeke the foresaid lords of Scotland were brought to the court, which was then at Greenwich, where they had great cheare, and went before the king to the chappell, and were lodged with in the court. Hereupon ye must consider, that where as the king of Scots had left no issue behind him in life but onelie one daughter, the king and his coun-cell perceiving a meane now offered, whereby without warre the two realmes might be united, these Scottish lords hauing first made the motion themselues, for a marriage to be had betwixt prince Coward and their yong queene, the king required their helpe unto the furtherance of that matter, which might be a great benefit to themselves and their coun-trie. This they promised faithfullie to do, and aswell by themselves as by their friends, to bring the same to effect, so much as the king could require. Whereupon the king was not onelie contented to release them home, but also highly rewarded them with rich and costlie gifts of sundrie sorts, in most bountifull wise, as Anglorum praelia notet verie uell, sateng:

35. 43

The thirtieth of December they departed from the court, and the morrow after, eight of them dined with sir John Cotes then lord maior of London, and the rest with the shiriffes, and had verie great cheare. On Newpeares daie they departed from London homewards towards Scotland, and rode to Enfield to see the prince, and there dined that day, greatlie reioicing, as by their words and countenance it seemed, to behold so proper and towarlike an impe. From thence they kept on their iournie till they came to the north parts, where they found the duke of Suffolke the kings lieutenant there, and with him remained till such pledges were come forth of Scotland, as it was couenanted they should leane behind them.

The duke then after he had receiued the hostages, permitted them to depart, and so they returned into Scotland, where they were gladlie welcomed by their kinsmen and friends. With them went also the earle of Angus, who had bene banished Scotland, and hauing remained here in England a long time, receiued of the kings fee, a thousand markes by yeare; and likewise his brother sir George Douglas, who had five hundred markes yearelie likewise of the kings gift. They were now both restored home into their countrie, and that (as was said) by the kings last will. The said earle of Angus, and diuerse of the lords that had bene prisoners here in England, were made of the priue councill of the realme by the earle of Araine; that was chosen gouernour to the yong queene, and of the realme, as next better apparent: notwithstanding that the archbishop of saint Andrewes, and cardinal of the see of Rome, came and sett vnto the king of England for the popes cause (and partly set on by the french king) had for-geu a bill, expelling him the king had made him gouernour (associated with two earles of his affinitie) as well of the queene as realme, contrarie to the lawes of Scotland. Whereupon the said earle of Ar-raine, according to his right (as he pretended) with the helpe of his friends, tooke upon him the au-thoritie of gouernour, and put the said cardinal in prison, and deliuered sir Robert Bowes, and the other English prisoners, by their bonds, according to the custome of the marches.

All this yeare was neither perfect peace, nor open warre betwixt England and France, but the merchants ships were taken and robbed on both parts, and at length merchants goods were seized, and the ambassadoes of both realmes staied. Howbeit, shortlie after the ambassadoes were deliuered: but the merchants still were robbed, and no warre proclaimed. In the end of this yeare came from the gouernor of Scotland as ambassadoes, sir William Hamilton, and James Leirmouth the secretaire of Scotland, whose message was so meane like, that they were faine to send an herald into Scotland for other ambassadoes, and so came hither the earle of Glencarne, and sir George Douglas: but what foruer their answer was, sir George returned in post, and within twentie daies came backe againe with an answer that was well liked of. But shortlie after they brake promise, and went from that which they had couenanted, greatlie to their reproch.

Now was sold verie deare in the winter season of this yeare, and likewise bittels both flesh and fish grow to an high price towards the spring, by reason (as was thought) of the vntemperate wet summer last past, causing great death among cattell. A quarter of mutton was sold for two shillings, or seuen grotes, a lambe at three shillings, or three and foure pence, which afore that time was esteemed scarce worth sixteen pence. Against Easter at a court of aldermen kept in the Guildhall the twentieth of March 1542, it was enacted by the lord maior and his brethren, that the maior and shiriffes should be serued at their tables but with one course at dinner and supper in their houses; the maior to haue but seuen di-shes at the most at one messe for his owne table, and the shiriffes and euerie other alderman but six dishes, upon paine to forfeit for euerie dish fortie shillings at euerie time when they offended in this ordinance.
Also that the fargeants and peomen of their houses should haue but three dishes at dinner or supper, the swordbearers messe onlie excepted, which should be allotted to haue one dish more. It was also enacted, that from the feast of Easter then next ensuing, neither the maior nor his brethren should haue anie crane, swan, or bussard, upon paine to forfeit for eu-rie soule by them so bought, twentie shillings, the offense to be tried by oth, if it should be presented.

king and the emperor at Hampton court, either of them to be friends to the others friends, and enemies to the others enemies. ¶ In this yeare also a proclamation was made, whereby the people were licensed to eat whit meates in Lent, but stricte forbidden the eating of flesh. Whereupon Hostie after the earle of Surrie, with diuerse lords, knights, and gentlemen, were imprisoned for eating of flesh in the same Lent, contrarie to the said proclamation. The eight of Maie, one Lech, sometimes bailie of Louth, who had killed Summerfet one of our heralds of armes at Dunbar in Scotland, was drawne to Tiburne, and there hanged and quartered. And the twelue of June, Edward Lech his brother, and with him a priest, for the same fact were likewise executed at Tiburne.

This yeare the first cast peeces of iron that euer were made in England, were made at Bucksted in Sussex, by Rafe Hoge, and Peter Babd. The third of June came to the court from the realme of Ireland, thre Irish lords, Dhrin, Mache William a Burgh, and Mache Gilpatrick. In Iulie the said Dhrin was created earle of Downon, Mache William a Burgh, earle of Claunrickford, and sir Dunon Dhrin was made baron of Chankie, and so with rewards they toke leaue and returned. The same moneth also, the Scottish ambassadoys returned with great rewards. The twelue of Iulie, at Hampton court, the king married the ladie Katharine Dar, widow, late wife unto the lord Latimer deceased, and then she was nominated queene, and so proclaimed.

In the parliament holden this yeare at Westminster, a subsidie was granted to the king, to be paid in thre yeares. Euerie Englishman being worth in goods twentie shillings & upward to five pounds, paid foure pence of euerie pound. From five pounds to ten pounds, eight pence. From ten pounds to twentie pounds, sixtene pence. From twentie pounds and upward, of euerie pound two shillings. Strangers as well denizens as other, being inhabitants, doubled this summe; and euerie stranger not being an inhabitant, that was sixtene yeares of age and upward, paid foure pence for euerie poll. And for lands, fees, and annuities, euerie one borne within the kings dominions, paid eight pence of the pound, from twentie shillings to five pounds. And from five pounds to ten pounds, sixtene pence. From ten pounds to twentie pounds, two shillings. And from twentie pounds and upward, thre shillings; strangers still doubling this summe. The cleargie granted a subsidie of six shillings the pound, to be paid of their benefices in perpetuities in thre yeares ensuing; and euerie priest hauing no perpetuities, but an annuall stipend, paid yearelie (during the said thre yeares) six shillings and eight pence.

About the same time, the king and the emperor sent Carter and Tolson Do. kings at armes, to demand the performance of certaine articles of the French king, which if he denied, they were commanded then to desie him, but he would not suffer them to come within his land, & so they returned. Whereby on the king caused the said demands to be declared to the French ambassadoys at Westminster. And in Iulie the king sent ouer sir Thousard men, under the leading of sir John Mallop, appointed to haue the generall conduction of them, accompanied with diuerse other knights, esquires and gentlemen right hardie and valiant. Sir Thomas Seimer was marshall of that armie, sir Robert Wolbes treasurer, sir Richard Cromwell capteine of the horsemen, and sir George Carew his lieutenant. There were likewise sir Thomas Palmer, sir John Keinsforth, sir

John saint John, and sir John Gascoigne, knights, that were capteines of the footmen. They were appointed to ioin with the emperours power, and so to make warre into France. They departed from Calis the two and twentieth of Iulie. The third of August open warre was proclaimed in London betwixt the emperor and the king of England on the one part, and the French king on the other, as enemies mortall to them both, and to all other christian princes beside, as he that had confederated himselfe with the Turke.

The armie that was sent ouer under the leading of sir John Mallop, passed south from the marches of Calis, and keeping alongst betwixt the borders of the French and Burgonion pales and confines, and joining with the emperours forces, Spaniards, Mallons, and Dutch, came at length before Landerseie, a towne latelie fortified by the French, within the borders of the emperours dominions, to the which they laid a strong siege. At length the emperor hauing dispatched his wars against the duke of Cleue, who had submitted himselfe unto him, came now to the siege of Landerseie, with a mightie power of sundrie nations, so that the towne was sore constrained and in danger to haue bene lost, if at that present the French king had not likewise with an huge armie of Frenchmen, Switzers, Lantiquenets, Italians, and others, come to the rescue, pitching downe his campe, making countenance as if he ment presentlie to giue battell: and verelie it was thought that two such powers as were there at that time so nere together, should neuer haue departed without battell. The emperor thinking surelie to fight, raised his siege, and drew his people into the field. The Frenchmen thereby espying their auantage, put as well fresh men as vittells, and all kind of munition necessarie into the towne, and in the meane while kept the emperours people occupied with hot skirmishes.

But now after the towne was thus releued, which thing the French king onelie wished to accomplish, the next daie when the emperor was readie with his armie ranged in battell to haue fought with his aduersaries, the French king put his armie also in order; but hauing no mind to come forward, he trilled south that daie, and in the night following, secretlie departed with as much haste as was possible. When the next morning had discovered the Frenchmens flight (for manie so termed this their sudden retire) it was no need to bid diuerse troops of the emperours armie to hie after them: but some made too much haste, for the French king suspecting what would ensue, appointed his eldest sonne Henrie the Dolphin to remaine behind with the reterward, accompanied with diuerse noble capteins, which ordered their people in their retire with such warinesse and heedfull skill, as the reason of warre required, that such of the emperours campe as adventured ouer rashlie, and shewed themselves more forward than wise, fell within danger of such ambushments as were by the waie couertlie laid in places of auantage: and so diuerse were taken, as sir George Carew, sir Thomas Palmer knight porter of Calis, Edward Bellingham, and others. But neuertheless a great number of such Frenchmen as could not make waie, and keepe pale with their maine troops, were snapped up, slaine, and taken in no small numbers by their enemies, who followed them as egges as tigers, and as the describer of that puruite saith:

Imbut et gladius manante cruore Britannum.

This was after Alhalowentide, so that now by reason the winter was farre entred, and the weather waring extreme foule, and contrarie to an armie that should lie in the fields, the emperor brake up his

After that the warres were once open betwixt England and France, sundrie enterprises were attempted by the parties on either side in the marches of Calis and Bullognois, in which, for the most part, the Englishmen got the vpper hand of their enemies.

Beside this, at sundrie times the Englishmen inuading the countrie of Bullognois, waisted the townes and villages, brought awaie great botties of goods and cattell, to the great impouerishing of the countrie. They burnt at one time the towne of Avinghen, and took the steeple of the church there, into the which were fled sir score pezzants with their wiues and children, whome the Englishmen threw downe headlong out of the steeple, because they had most stubbornele refused to yeld. In this yeare a 40 great death of the pestilence reigned in London, and therefore Michellmasse terme was adourned to St. Albons, and there kept till the end thereof. The eighteenth of December the archbishop of Canturburies palace at Canturburie was burnt, and therein was burnt his brother in law, and other men.

In Christmasse weeke came to the king lieng at Hampton court, Ferdinando Gonzaga viceroy of Sicilie, prince of Malfeta, duke of Juano, the emperours capteine generall. The chiefeest cause of his comming was, to appoint what time the emperours armie should be readie to inuade France. He had great chere, and at his departure was rewarded with a hundred and fiftie thre ounces of gold in plate, and foure thousand and thre ounces in gillt plate, all verie curiously wrought, and all the time of his being here, his charges were borne by the king. On the first yeares date, was sir Thomas Wriotheslie the kings secretarie made lord Wriotheslie of Wichefeld. On the seventh of March, Germaine Gardner, and Larke person of Chessele were executed at Tiburne, for denieng the kings supremacie, & with whom was executed for other offenses one Singleton. And shortly after Albere was likewise executed for the supremacie. In this yeare sir John Al- 70 len (who had bin twice maior of London, & of coun-

In this meane while was the cardinal of Scotland deliuered forth of prison, and shortly after got into his hands againe all such conclusions as were made touching the marriage betwixt the quene of Scots and prince Edward, procuring in maner all the lords and nobles of the realme to renounce that which they had promised to the king of England, as well bluerle of those whome the said king had released home out of captiuitie, as others. Wherewith the king took such fore displeasure, that he prepared an armie to passe into Scotland by sea, and ordeined the lord Edward Seimer, earle of Hertford to be lieutenant of the north parts, and to haue the leading of the same armie: who went thither in March, as well 30 for defense of the borders, as to foresee all things in order for the armie that should thus go into Scotland, whereof he was appointed generall.

And now wanted nothing to further their iourne, but a conuenient wind; which caused them to staie certeine daies at the said towne of Newcastle, and in the villages thereabouts.

There were at the least two hundred sailles which the lord admerall had caused to come together, according to his commission, rigged, trimmed, and furnished with all things necessarie for the conduction of such an armie, esteemed to be about ten thousand men.

order of warre, marched on towards the said towne of Litch. The lord admerall led the foreward, the lord lieutenant the battell, and the earle of Shrewsburie governed the reereward. Before they came to the towne of Litch, they found in their waie readie to impeach their passage sir thousand horsemen beside footmen. At the first the Scots made towards the Englishmen, as if they had ment to set upon the bowward; but being manfullie assailed by the batquebutters, five hundred in number, and shewable by them curried and galled, they had no mind to come forward, but perceiving how willing the Englishmen were to encounter with them, after certeine shot on both sides, they made a sudden retreat, and leaving their artillerie behind them, they fled to Edinburgh.

The first man that fled (as the talke went) was the cardinal, who perceiving the deuotion which the Englishmen had to his holinesse, had no mind to followe. With him also fled the gouernour, the earles of Huntley, Murray, and Bothwell: as for their soldiers, they were disparted, and feared the English forces as the lambe doth the wolfe, the doe the dog, or the hart the lion: to vse the words of Anglorum praelia berie fitlie describing this battell, and saieing:

Exhorrent, ut dama capes, ut cerva leones.

The Englishmen thus hauing put their enemies to flight, & seized upon their artillerie, made straight to the towne of Litch, and entered it without any great resistance, wherein they incamped themselves the same night to their most ease and aduantage, and afterwards landed their vittels and great artillerie. They found also in this towne such plenty of riches as they looked not to haue found in any one towne of Scotland.

The first of Maie they went towards Edinburgh, and as they approached nere the towne, the prouost of the same towne accompanied with one or two burgesses, and two or three officers at armes, desired to speake with the kings lieutenant, and in the name of all the towne, said that the heies of the towne should be deliuered unto his lordship, conditionallie that they might go with bag & baggage, and the towne to be saved from fire. Whereunto answer was made by the said lord lieutenant, that where the Scots had so manifestlie broken their promises confirmed by othes and seales, and certified by the whole parlement, as was euidentlie knowne to the world, he was sent thither by the kings highnesse to take vengeance of their detestable falschod, to declare and shew the force of his highnesse sword to all such as should make any resistance unto his graces power sent thither for that purpose. And therefore he told them resolutely, that unless they would yeld by their towne franklie without condition, and cause man, woman, and child, to issue forth into the fields, submitting them to his will and pleasure, he would put them to the sword, and their towne to the fire. The prouost answered it were better to stand to their defense.

Whereupon charge was given to the said prouost and officer at armes, upon their perill to depart. And forthwith the lord lieutenant sent to the bowward, commanding that they should march toward the towne, which right hardlie they did, and the English gunners manfullie assailed the gates; namelie sir Christopher Poole master of the ordinance, in such sort that the Scots were beaten from their ordinance, and the gate called Canogate beaten open with shot of the great artillerie, and therewith the Englishmen entering the same gate by fine force, beat downe & slew a great number of Scots, and continuallie without tairing was the great ordinance balone by the street to the castell gates: but those that were within the castell shot so frelie at the Englishmen thus approaching with their great artillerie, that diuerse were slaine, the artillerie of the castell beat so direalie alongest the high street, as the Englishmen came by the same. At length also one of the Englishmens culuerings was stricken, and dismounted, and thereupon they were forced to retire backe and giue over their enterpryse of making batterie to the castell, wanting pioners, baskets, and other things necessarie for such a purpose.

This daie the Englishmen set fire in diuerse parts of the towne, but they had not leasure to mainteine it, by reason of the smoke rising and troubling them so extremelie, that no great hurt could be done that daie, for that the night also came on, and so they departed backe againe to their campe at Litch. But the next daie, a certeine number of Englishmen under the leading of doctor Leigh, went againe to Edinburgh, and did what they could, vntillie to destroye the whole towne with fire, and so continued all that daie & the two daies next following. During all this violence offered by the English to the enemy, & nothing left but despaire of life, the women and children beholding this desolation, made such outrageous exclamations and woofull lamentations, that heauen it selfe rang with their noise, as berie pitillie is described by Chr. O. in his report, saieing:

Femine! sexus gemitis ad sidera grandis Tolluntur strepitus, puerorum clamor in auribus, Nil nisi triste fuit, faciesque miserrima rerum.

In the meane time, foure thousand light horsemen, under the leading of the lord Evers, came from our borders, as order was taken afore, and joined themselves with the armie thus lieng in Litch, where after their comming, they did such exploits, in riding and waiking the countrie, that within fouen miles euerie waie of Edinburgh, they left few places, either pile, village, or house vnburnt. And beside this, they brought great numbers of cattell dalie into the armie, and met with much good stuffe, which the inhabitants of Edinburgh had for the safetie of the same conueied out of the towne.

The names of the knights made at Litch after the burning of Edinburgh by the earle of Hertford, gouernall of the kings armie there, on lundae the eleuenth of Maie, in the six & thirtieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the eight, in the yeare 1544, as they were deliuered to me by sir Gilbert Deshike knight, alias Carter, king of armes, are as followeth: The lord Clinton, the lord Coners, sir William Wroughton, sir Thomas Holcroft, sir Edward Dorell, sir John Luttrell, sir John Fenins, sir Thomas Waterton, sir Charles Howard, sir George Blunt, sir Peter Dewitas, sir Edward Warner, sir Rafe Bulmer, sir Hugh Cholmeleie, sir Thomas Leigh, alias doctor Leigh, sir Richard Leigh, sir Peter Leigh, sir John Leigh of Both, sir Lawrence Smith, sir William Banasour, sir Richard Shirburne, sir Robert Stapleton, sir Thomas Holt, sir William Danenport, sir Rafe Leicester, sir Humfrie Bradborne, sir Thomas Maluereie, sir Francis Bothome, sir John Passie, sir Leonard Beckwith, sir Thomas Cokaine, sir Peter Freshwell, sir Richard Egerton, sir Anthoine Penill, sir John Penill, sir William Katchiffe, sir George Wolues, sir Brian Bereton, sir William Bereton, sir Roger Bereton, sir Edward Warren, sir Brian Leiton, sir Robert Warkeleie, sir Thomas Talbot, sir Hugh Caluerleie, sir John Clerc, sir Richard Holland, sir Thomas Menables, sir John Constable, sir Edmund Trafford, sir John Aberton, sir Richard Cholmeleie, sir Philip Egerton, sir Hugh Willoughbie, sir Thomas Constable, sir William Woodhouse, sir Edmund Sanage, and sir Thomas Gerard.

downe the piers of the haven of Litch, and burnt eu-erie sickle of it. This done, and hauing shipped their great artillerie, and taken forth all such Scottis ships as were meet to serue, appointing them to attend on their ships, they took upon them to returne home by land. Amongst other ships which the Englishmen had in Litch haues, there were two of notable fauour, the one called the Salamander, giuen by the French king at the marriage of his daughter into Scotland, the other called the Glouciers, made by the said Scottis king. The ballast of these two ships was cannon shot, which they found in the rowne, to the number of foure thousand. The rest of the Scottis ships being taken awaie together with their ordnance, which they brought with them, were for the moze part possessed with the spoile and booties of the said ships and armiers. On the fiftenth of Aprill, their armie and their fleet departed from Litch both in one booke, the towne being set on fire and burned to the ground.

The English armie incamped that night at a place called Seaton, seven miles from Litch, where they burnt the castell, and destroyed the orchards and gardens with the moze despayre, for that the lord Seaton owner of the place, was the chiefe laborer to helpe the lord cardinal out of prison. The same daie was Haddington burnt, with a great nurrie and house of friers there. The next night they incamped beside Dunbar, where they had an alarm given them, but in the morning they burnt the towne of Dunbar, and marched forth, though somewhat staie by the waie, by reason of the mist and fog; which was verie thicke, continuing all the forenoon, and because also they understood how the lords of Seton & Hume with the lord of Bonclough, and others, had assembled a power of men of warre, and were minded to impeach their passage at a streit named the Pease.

But after that the mist brake vp, which was about two of the clocke in the afternoone, the Englishmen came forthward, and passed the same streit without anie resistance, for the Scottis lords perceiving that they were not of power sufficient to encounter with the Englishmen, minded not to put their people in their danger, but wiselie retired, suffering the Englishmen to passe at their pleasure, who that night lodged at Kanton, eight miles distant from our boy-ders, where hauing ouerthrowne a pile which stood there, they dislodged the next morrow, and the same daie being the eighteenth of Aprill, they entered into Berwick: so ending their voyage with great tole and gladnesse, not hauing lost past forty persons in all this tourne.

The names of the chiefe towne, castles, and places burned in this voyage, were these: the burrow and towne of Edinburgh, with the abbey called ho-lie Rod house, and the kings palace adioining to the same. The towne of Litch burnt, and the haven and pire destroyed, the castle and village of Cragmiller, the abbey of Helybottle, part of Hufkelburow towne, with the chappell of our ladie of Lauret, Preston towne and the castell, Seton castell, Hadington towne, with the friers and nurrie, a castell of Bluer Sinclers, the towne of Dunbar, Lanrefton with the grange, Dilat, Wester crag, Cnderligh, the pile, and the towne, Broughton, Theffer fields, Crawnab, Wodiston, Stan house, the ficket, Beuerton, Cranent, Shenston, Parkie, Trapen, Kirkland hill, Hatherwike, Belton, east Barnes, Botland, Butterden, Nickelwood, Blackeburne, Kan-ton, Bilde and the Tower, Kirkcubine, saint Spines, the quenes ferrie, part of Petin Malines, and the burnt Island, were burned by the fleet on the sea.
For during the continuance of the armie at Litch, the ships laie not idle, but scowling the riuer, burnt diuerse places, and left neither ship, craier, nor bote belonging to ante village, towne, crake, or haven, upon either side of the fowd, betwene Sterling, and the mouth of the riuer, vnburned, or brought awaie, which space containeth fiftie miles in length. About the same time the earle of Lenox fled out of Scotland into the rebine of England, where he was right gladlie received by king Henrie, and shortly he ob-teined in marriage the ladie Marie Dologlas, neece to the king of England, and returned some after into Scotland by sea, accompanied with a good competent crew of English. But finding no such friendship among his countrie men as he looked to haue done, he was constrained to returne without attein-ing the enterprize which he had taken in hand, in hope of such assistance by his friends, as now failed him at need.

In the moneth of Aprill proclamation was made for the inhancing of gold to eight & forty shillings, & silver foure shillings the ounce. Also the king caused to be coined base monie, which was since that time called doine, the first yeare of Edward the first, and called in the second of quene Elizabeth. In the same moneth also passed through the cite of London in warlike maner, to the number of seauen hundred Irishmen, hauing for their weapons, darts, and handguns, with bagpipes before them: and in faint James parke besides Westminster they mustered before the king. In June the letanie or procession was set forth in English, with commandement by the king to be generallie used in parish churches.
About the same time that the armie before reitern-ized, was set forthward into Scotland under the guiding of the earle of Hertford, as before ye haue heard, the king by aduise of his counsell took order for the leuieing of a nightie armie, to passe ouer into France, according to the appointment taken with his confederate, friend and colleague, the emperor, against the French king, at that present common aduersarie to them both, and not long before had entered in leagu with the Turks, as Ch. Oc. noteth:

There were appointed three battels, the forward tell under the guiding of the duke of Suffolke, which also was reckoned to be the kings battell, because his maiestie ment to be present with the same in person, and the reere-ward was led by the lord Russell lord priute seale. Those of the fore-ward were appare-led in blew cotes garbed with red, and had caps and hosen after the same sute, partie blue and partie red, their caps made fit for their sculs, which were put into the same. The battell in cotes, caps, and hosen, af-others beside, no lesse worthe to be remembered for their valure and merits, if time would permit to tel hearse them; passed over to Calis about Whitsturtide, and from thence marching forward to France, lest Bullongne on their right hand, & keeping forth towards Puttrell, joined with an armie which the emperor had raised for that purpose, under the leading of the countie de Waren, admerall of the low countries, and so these armies being united in one, came before Puttrell, and there laid siege to that towne, being well manned and furnished with all things necessarie for defense, as well in bittels as munition. The chiefe captaine of which towne was monsieur de Dies, one of the marshals of France, and gouverneur also in the absence of monsieur de Glandoune of Picardie, who being within Bullongne & hearing how the English armie was passed by, and drew towards Puttrell, he left Bullongne, and with all speed got him into Puttrell, not mistrusting anie thing of that policie which the king of England went about, which was, to send this armie to besiege Puttrell, to the end the Frenchmen might be kept occupied further off, while he with the residue of his power should come and besiege Bullongne, which towne standing most commodious for his purpose, he ment by force to bring under his subiection.

Whereupon was the duke of Suffolke appointed with the kings armie to passe over, accompanied with the earle of Arundell marshall of the field, the lord saint John, and the bishop of Winchester, sir John Cage comptrolor of the kings house, sir Anthony Browne maister of the kings horse, with diuerse other worthe captaines, all which the nineteenth of Julie came before Bullongne, incamped on the east side of the said towne aloft upon the hill, and after for his more safetie removed into a vallie, where after manie sharpe skirmishes they first entered the base towne, being left and forsaken by the inhabitants, which hauing set fire on their fishing nets, and other such baggage, under couert of the smoke, got them vp into the high towne, before the Englishmen could espie them. After this, the old man, other wise called Le tour d'ordre, standing without the towne for a direction to them that were to enter the haven, and now being kept by sirène souldiers, was yielded by by them, upon presenting the canon before it.

The Frenchmen within the towne, being despoiled of those two places, yet spared not to shot off from their walles and bulwokes, doing what damage they might deuise, and namelie from the castle and grène bulwoke they did much hurt to the Englishmen with their shot, whereof they made no spare, till at length they were forced to be quiet: for the Englishmen so applied them with such plentie of their shot, that the Frenchmen had no oportunitie to do them anie great hurt with their artillerie. The fourteenth of Julie, the king in person, accompanied with diuers of the nobilitie, passed the seas from Dover to Calis; and the six and twentieth of the same moneth incamped himselfe before Bullongne on the north side, within lesse than thre quarters of a mile of the towne, where he remained, till the towne was surrendered into his hands. The king being then in campe, it was a matter of ease to discerne which was he, for none of the rest came nere him in tallnesse by the head: as for his proportion of lims, it was answerable to his goodlie stature and making: a memorabile description whereof, as also of his artificall armour, I find reported as followeth:

Rex capite Henricum reliquos supereminet omnes, Heros præualidus sen fortis brachia spectes, Sensuras quas fuluo opifex incluserat auro, Sine virile ducis præstanti pectore corpus, Nulla vi domitum, nullo penetrabile ferro, &c.

Beside the trenches which were cast, and brought in manner round about the towne, there was a mount raised upon the east side; and diuerse peeces of artillerie planted aloft on the same, the which together with the mosten peeces, had quailed them within, & battered downe the steeple of our ladies church. To conclude: the batterie was made in most forcible wise in those severall places, and the walles, towers, and castles were undermined; and the towne within so beaten with shot out of the campe, and from the mount and trench by the mosten peeces, that there were verie few houses left whole therein. The towne thus standing in great distresse, there were two hundred Frenchmen and halpards, which entered under the couert of night, to enter the towne in court of the night, which exploit they so warlike achieved, that by means of a priest that could speake the English tongue, they passed by the scouts, & through the watch, so as the most part of them were got over the trenches, yet it was knowne that they were: to the number of six score of them got into the towne, but the residue after they were once detected, being intercepted, were taken or slaine. Although this small succour somewhat relieved them within, and put them in some hope to defend the towne somewhat longer against the kings power: yet at length when a pece of the castle was blowne by, and the breaches made, as was thought reasonable, the assault was given by the lord admerall Dudley, that was comethither from the sea, which he had scouered after his returne from Scotland.

This assault was couragiously given, and to speake a truth, no lesse manfully defended: so that when the assailants had perceiued in what state the breaches stood; and what position they within had made for defense of their towne, which undoubtedly was great (for nothing was by them omitted, that might either auantage the defendants, or annoy the assailants) those that were appointed in this sort to giue the assault, were called backe, and so they retired, but not without losse on both sides, and namelie of them within. For during the time of the assault, the great artillerie did beat still upon them that presented themselves at the breaches to repell the assailants, and so diuerse of their valiant captaines and brave souldiers were slaine at this assault, & among other, captaine Philip Cose. Shortly after, the captaines within the towne, doubting to be euenly assaulted, and perceluing themselves in extreme danger to lose the towne by force, if they prolonged not the sooner, by rendering it to saue themselves: they sent forth two of their chiefe captaines, monsieur Sembelmont, and monsieur de Hales, which declared unto the king, that monsieur de Weruine gouverneur of the towne, with his retinue, was contented to deliuer the towne unto his grace, with condition that they might passe with bag and baggage. Which request the king, like a noble and mercifull prince, freely granted: and so the next date, the duke of Suffolke rode into Bullongne, unto whom in the kings name the keies of the towne were deliuered, & in the afternone departed out of Bullongne all the Frenchmen with heauie hearts, to the number of six thousand, as C. O. witnesseth, saing:

Sex hinc exierant Gallorum milia gentis.

The number of the men of warre that were strong and able to serue, were of horsemen sixte score, of footmen sixtine hundred, threescore and thre; of the which number eight hundred were harquebutters, of hurt men fourescore and seuen, of women & children ninetene hundred and twentie seuen, beside a great number of aged & sicke persons, not able to depart with the others. The last person that came forth was monsieur de Weruine himselfe, who upon his approach to the place where the king stood, alighted from his horse, and came to the king, and after he had talked with him a space, the king took him by the hand, and he reverentlie kneeling upon his knees, kissed his hand, and afterward mounted upon his horse, and so departed, following his companie.

The eight of September, the king having the sword borne before him by the lord marques Dorset, like a puissant conqueror rode into Bullongne, and the trumpeters standing on the walles, sounded their trumpets at the time of his entering, to the great comfort of the beholders. In the entering, there met him the duke of Suffolke, and deliuered to him the keies of the towne, and so he rode forth to his lodging that was prepared for him on the south side of the towne. Within two daies after, the king rode about the towne within the walles, and appointed that our ladie church of Bullongne should be taken downe, and in the place thereof a mount to be made, for the more strengthening of the towne. Finallye after he had set things in order for the safe keeping of this his towne of Bullongne, by his princely force thus wonne out of the possession of his aduersaries hands, he appointed the lord Lisle high admiral of the seas, to be his deputie of the same towne, and then determining not to stae there any longer, he took the seas, & returned into England, landing at Dover the first of October.

In this meane time, whilst the king of England laie (as ye haue heard) with his siege about Bullongne, and the duke of Suffolke, and lord priuie seale about Putterell, the emperor invaded France by Champeigne, winning diuerse castles and townes, as Comersis, Agnie, saint Desir, Chantreaux, Ytierie, and others. But at the length, meanes were made by treatie to haue the matter taken up, as in the end it was, and a peace concluded without consent of the king of England, although there was place left for him and other princes to enter into this agreement of peace. But the king of England hauing now defrauded no small quantitie of treasure in these warres, beside the trauell of his owne person and his people, and hauing the thing now in a manner sure in his possession, which he chiefly went about to obtaine, that is to wit, the strong towne of Bullongne, he would not agree vnto any peace, except he might inioy that towne, at that instant redie to be deliuered into his hands. And euen now after it was to him deliuered, hearing that for certaine, the peace was concluded betwixt the emperor and the French king, he determined to breake up his camps: but neuertheless to keepe Bullongne in his possession, in despite of all his aduersaries. But here, before we proceed any further, we haue thought good somewhat to speake touching the siege which all this while continued afore Putterell, where the Englishmen and Burgonians inforced themselves by all waies and meanes they could deuise, how to constrain their enemies within the towne. On the other part, monsieur de Biez, and those that were with him in gard of the same towne, lest nothing vndone that might serue for their defense, and make to the annoiance of their enemies.

There were with monsieur de Biez within the towne, an hundred men at armes of the retinue of the constable of France, vnder the leading of the lord de la Cuche an expert man of war. There were also with the lord of Genlie, foure enignes of French souldiers. Count Berenger a Neapolitane with a thousand souldiers Italians. Capteine Francisco de Chiaramont, a Neapolitane also, with the like number of Italian souldiers. So that the towne might seeme sufficientlie furnished with men, and they wanted neither shot nor powder requisite, so that there was no spare thereof when occasion serued on either part.

The duke of Suffolke and the lord priuie seale caused a mount to be raised, and aloft thereon were certaine peeces of artillerie planted to shot into the towne. Whereouer they compassed the walles so on each hand with their seuerall camps and trenches, that hardlie might any escape either in or out vnspied. Sir Francis Bryan was appointed with certaine bands, containing about the number of a thousand men, to lodge in a campe fortified by himselfe, ouer against one part of the towne, to stop certaine passages on that side, that no succors should enter by the same to the reliefe of them within. There were likewise baillie betwixt them that sallied forth of the gates, and the Englishmen that watched and warred in the trenches, and other places, inso much that diuerse lost their liues, and some were irreuerable wounded, as Anglorum praelia witnesseth, saing :

Confessi sano moriuntur vulnere multis Disperso cerebro, faciei nulla figura.

On a daie as sir Thomas Poinings soldours were warding in one of the trenches, an Italian secretly comming forth of the towne, fetched awaie the said sir Thomas Poinings his ensigne; and notwithstanding the pursute that was made after him, he escaped and got into the towne with it, to the great displeasure of the whole campe. But as the enemies sometimes went awaie with the aduantage of their attempted enterprises, so oftentimes againe they paid for their aduenturing ouer rashlie about the common price of the market.

But here I cannot but lament the negligence used in that season: for there is not one English writer to be found extant, that hath written any thing effectualle of the exploits atchieued in that fornie; so as we are dyuen to borrow of the aduersaries that haue written thereof, wanting other helps of our owne nation to furnish our booke herein according to our wished purpose. But neuertheless, to giue occasion to those that yet liue, and can best doe it, to set forth hereafter a more perfect discourse thereof, I haue thought it not amisse to recite in part what I haue read and learned of such things as then were accounted worthy of relation, and now like to be buried in the dimme booke of oblivion, unless some fauourer of notable euents chancing in the siege of those two townes, Bullongne and Putterell, will put to his helping hand to report the same to posteritie.

Among other stratagems, one I remember, devised and put in practise by the lord Mountiole, as thus. The enemies had espied a place of aduantage without the towne, where vnder fauour of the shot of certaine peeces of great artillerie lodged upon some platforms or bulwarks within the towne, they might lie without the walles betwixt the Englishmens trenches and the towne ditches, and there couer themselves within a litle trench or counterscarpe made for the purpose, and out of the same be readie with their harquebusses to shot at the Englishmen, so some as any of them should once shew his head out of the trenches, to the great danger of them that warred in the same.

The lord Mountiole perceiuing this, deuised with himselfe how to rouse the enemies out of that lurking place, and withall came to the duke of Suffolke, and desired licence to put the deuise (which he had already forecast in his mind) in practise. But the duke being not willing that he should put himselfe in such danger, was loth to grant thereto, but rather perswaded with him not to attempt it: for (said he) my lord, ye may do the king better service than so to hazard your life, and cast your selfe awaie, rie the smoke full vpon the place where the French men laie. At length vpon his earnest sute, the duke gaue him licence to trie what he could do, commanding the great ordinance to be laid and charged readie to shot off as he should appoint it. Herewith the lord Moutioie taking with him fourteteene of his oldest soldiors (of the which number one of them forsoke to go through with him when it came to the point) immediatlie vpon the shooting off of the artillerie, & that all the ground about was couered ouer with smoke, he came to the place where those French men laie under covert of their trench, and so displaced them, that they had no liking of stones to lodge so nere vnto such vnfrendlie neighbors.

The lord Moutioie a noble young gentleman.

Manie other valiant and politike feats (no doubt) were atchieued during this siege, & happie as was the rehearfall as this. But sith it was the inuen-tion of so noble a young gentleman, I haue esteemed it not impertinent to speake thereof, and withall to lament the losse of the inuentor, who being taken awaie shortly after in his returne homewards, by vntimelie death, was like (if he had liued to greater yeas of experience) to haue proued comparable in valor to anie of his noble progenitors. But now to speake of other incidents that chanced whilest this siege remained before Sputtrell, you must understand that the most part of the vittels that was spent in the campe was brought to them either from the kings campe at Bullongne, or else from St. Omers, to conuie the same so far off, it was needfull to haue the carriage garded with good troops and bands both of horsemen and footmen: for the French fortresses were stronglie furnished with great numbers of men of war, which vpon occasions were readie to take aduantages offered.

And as it fortuneth at one time among other, there was a conuoie of certeine wagons laden with vittels appointed to come from saint Omers, the same being garded with diuerse bands of Englishmen and Burgonions, sent thither for that purpose, the which marching forward from saint Omers, kept not so good order as had bene requisite: whereof certeine companies of French horsemen that were abroad being auaire, set vpon the Burgonions that were attendant vpon the foremost carriages, and finding them in some disorder, easilie discomfited them, followed, and slue them in the chafe, till they came to the hindermost carriages, where sir hundred English men that attended on the same, impaled themselves with their wagons, so as the Frenchmen could take no aduantage: but with shot of the English archers were so curried and galled that they were driuen to retire, and that in such hast, as they left diuerse of their companie captiues in the Englishmens hands beside those that were saile laide to take their last sleepe there on the ground. Next betwixt, of the Burgonions there were slain foure hundred, and much good vittels lost, the bottoms of the hogheads and other vessels being beaten out, and manie a good Flemish mare killed or taken. For the Frenchmen found small resistance (as before ye haue heard) till they approached to the Englishmen, by whose accustomed manhood, some part of the vittels of that conuoie was saued, to the releafe of the campe, which notwithstanding by losse of the residue suffered great want for the time.

Moreouer, somewhat towards the latter end of this siege, the earle of Surreie son vnto the duke of Norfolke and marshall of his field, accompanied with the lord warden of the cinque ports, and thurle other valiant capteins English & Burgonions marched forth into the countrie towards Abule, where they toke and burnt a proper towne called saint Re-quiers: and after comming to another towne called Aien, they found no bodie at home but women and children, for the men were departed out of it before their comming thither. When they had taken their pleasure in sacking all such goods as they found there fit to be carried awaie, they spared the towne from fire, and so departed. And thus after they had bene thus daies and two nights abroad in the coun-trie, they returned home to the campe with a great botie of beasts, sheepe, and other things which they had got in that voyage.

But now to conclude with this siege of Sputtrell, after the king had toome Bullongne, and understood how the emperor had agreed with his aduersarie the French king, he resolved to haue his armie to raise that siege which thus had lien before Sputtrell, and with all conuenient speed to draw toward Calis. And because it was signified that the Dolphin of France Henrie was comming forward with a great power, which had bene raised by his father the French king to resist the emperor, and now was sent vnder the conduct of the said Dolphin, to the succours of them that were besieged in Sputtrell, the kings sent the earle of Arundell, sir John Coge, sir George Carew, sir John Keinsford, and others, with a chosen number of lustie soldiors vnto Sputtrell, to reinforce his armie there, that in leuieng the campe, and withdrawing backe, they might be the better able to withstand anie attempt which the enemies might put in execution to their annisance. And verelie this was done with good aduise and necessarie consideration, for the Englishmen that had lien so long time at the siege before Sputtrell, wanting such behouefull refreshment as those were stored with that late before Bullongne, hauing the seas open, and all things at pleasure brought vnto them forth of England, were soe weakened and decayed by death and sicknesse, and now in raising their campe had manie things to loke vnto, as well for the conueieng of their ordinance, trusse, and baggage, as their feeble and discased persons: so that if the Dolphin with his armie might haue made such speed forward as to haue overtaken them with his maine power before they had come to Bullongne, it was to be feared least he might haue put them in danger of a plaine distresse.
But with such timelie foresight as was vsed the siege was raised, and the armie retired first to Bullongne, and after to Calis without losse, although the French horsemen in great number followed, and sundrie times made proud proffers to giue the charge vpon the hindermost companies; but nothing was done to make great account of, except certeine skirmishes that were procured, and alarums giuen, as in such cases it fortuneth.

The Dolphin notwithstanding that the siege was thus raised from Sputtrell, yet he could come thither, yet he kept forward his iourneie, to proue what he might do to reconer Bullongne, which towne the king of England (as ye haue heard) had left in the keeping of the lord Lisle high admerall. The same towne being then weake, God knoweth, on all sides through batterie and minings, which by the kings power had been made, so bring it into his subiectors and the trenches not cast downe, nor the ordinance mounted.

The Dolphin being come befoze the towne, sent certene bands of his best soldiors by night to giue a camfado to the hafe towne. They that thus were sent, entred the same the ninth of October, about two of the clocke in the morning, where they toke the stand wat ches, and slue (beside a great number of sicke and weake persons) as well soldiors as other, before they could araise themselves, or well get out of their beds. But after, the Frenchmen and Italians fell to rising and breaking bp of coffers, scattering here and there abroad, and began to fall to their vittels, which they found there in good plentie. The Englishmen that were dyuen vp to the gates of the high towne, got weapons that were throwne downe vnto them forth of the same, & assembling togither, fierce, he entred in amongst the pzease of their enemies. And here with there sallied forth of the high towne sir Thomas Poinings with a band of two hundred soldiors, the which togither with the other so besirred themselves, that they manfullie beat backe the enemies, slue to the number of eight hundred of them, and chased the residue out of the towne, which fled ouer the sands vp to the hill, where the Dolphin himselfe stood with a great troupe of horsemen about him, and durst not once come downe to the rescue of his people, for feare of the great artillerie that with plentie of bullets saluted the enemies, after that the beake of the daie had once discovered them in sight. Amongst other that were slaine in this repulse of the Frenchmen, le seigneur de Froquellolles, another of the marshall de Biez his sons in law, and senechal of Bullongne was one.
Thus the Dolphin, perceiuing that it would nothing auail him to make anie further attempt against Bullongne, passed forth toward Cuiues, & shortly after through want of vittels, and sicknesse which soze infested his campe, brake vp his armie, and returned into France: so that the poud enterprises of the vainglorious and most insolent French turned to their olone great shame, as C. O. tralie saith: Sic Galli in magnam cesserunt dedecus ausa.
What shortly after Christmas came downe an armie of fourtene thousand, vnder the conduction of monsieur de Biez, the which the six and twentieth of Januarie incamped on the west side of Bullongne beyond the haueu, where they laie ten daies: but on the first of Februarie, the earle of Hertford, the lord admerall, as then lord lieutenant of the towne of Bullongne, the lord Greie of Wilton, sir Thomas Poinings & others, hauing assembled out of the garisons on that side the seas, to the number of foure thousand footmen, & seuen hundred horsemen, whereof an hundred or foure score were Albanoises, issued forth of Bullongne about foure of the clocke in the morning, and comming to the place where the king had incamped during the time of the siege, they staid there, and put the mselues in order of battell: and about six of the clocke, it being then a low water, capteine Edward Bzeie, with three hundred shot, was appointed to passe ouer, and to giue the enemies an alarm in their campe.
At which instant the trumpets sounded, and the drums stroke vp in the English armie, and herewith they being diuided into three battels, and to each one his gard of two hundred horsemen, beside the od hundred that attended as a defense to the residue, they shewed themselves to their enemies. The Frenchmen perceiuing this, packed abuaie with all haste possible, marching toward Hardilo in two battels. Whereupon the English capteins leauing their footmen behind them, and taking onlie with them the horsemen, followed with all speed after the enemies, and comming to the bridge commonlie called pont de Bieque, which certene English carpenters garded with a number of harquebutters, and foure small field pieces, had forced and repaired the same that night: and so the horsemen finding it sufficientlie repaired, passed ouer, and comming to S. Estienne, they found there five hundred Dutch horsemen, commonlie called Swart ritters, that were lodged there to keepe that passage: but being surprised on the sudden by the English horsemen, and sherpelie assailed, they were wholie distressed, and the most part of them taken prisoners, and there with left with the followers of the armie, were after slaine, because they knew not where to bestow them.

But now the hill of saint Estienne being thus gained by the English horsemen, they put themselves in order of battell againe, appointing an hundred of their men at armes to follow and keepe aloof as a stalle to relieue their fellows in time of need, when they saw them in anie danger. The lords, to encourage euerie one to do his dutie, rode bp and downe about the troops, & using manie comfortable words, desired them, that although they were but an handful in comparison to the number of their enemies, they would yet in regard of the honour of the realme of England, make a proffer of an onset to the enemies, that they might perceiue that there they were to giue them battell, and to follow, as they should see them their capteins and gouernors to lead them the waie. Here with forward they make towards the enemy, and overtaking them three miles on the hither side of Hardilo sands, they valiantlie gaue the charge, and thrusting in betwixt the two French battels, ouerthrew their carriages, toke their ordinance and munitions, slue and bare downe manie of them that pzeased forth to defend the same.
Monsieur de Biez being in the fore ward, brought backe the strongest and best armed men he had to resist his enemies, ranging them in order so, as he ment to haue inclosed the English horsemen betwixt his battels and the sea, and so to haue distressed them. But this purpose being espied first of all by the lord admerall, the Englishmen by his valiant encouragement gaue a new charge, and breaking through their ranks by force, came backe againe vnto their hundred men of armes that kept aloof, and there staid till their footmen might come to them, who by this time were advanced within sight of them, but distant yet by the space of two English miles, or little lesse.
Monsieur de Biez, perceiuing that the English footmen began thus to approach, made forward againe with his armie, so fast as was possible for his people to march, drawing still his armed men and best soldiors to the hinder most ranks, there to be readie to withstand the Englishmen, as they should offer to assaile them: and in this order the Frenchmen made away, and rested not till they came to Hardilo sands, being a place of such strength and aduantage, by reason of the streit, that after they were once got thither, they might account themselves out of all danger, and therefore there they staid, and dispatched an herald vnto the chieffains of the English armie, to signify vnto them, that there they ment to abide and to giue them battell, if they would advance forward to fight with them: but yet they would not in anie wise come forth of their strength vnto some even ground, although they were earnestlie required there vnto. Whereupon the Englishmen, to light them a candle that they might see where they were, set all the villages & houses about on a light fire, continuing the same all that afternone, and most part of the night following, and the next morning betwixt scure and fine of the clocke, they came backe againe vnto Bullongne with all their spoiles and prisoners.

They toke in this incounter seuen peces of artillerie, two of brasse and fine of iron; also the peces of aduantage of the armour of monsieur de Biez, beside apparell, plate, and furniture in great plentie, as well taken in the field, as also in their campe, where they left their tents standing, & all their provision of vittells wholie vntremoued. The same peces of armour were sent ouer into England to the king for a witnesse of the good successe that had thus happened to his people in this famous enterpryse, in the achieving wherof there were not past halfe a dozen Englishmen slaine, besides those that were hurt, which neither were manie, as vnder halfe a scope at the most.

Whilest such things were in doing about Bullongne, and other places (as before ye haue heard in this twentie and sixt yeare) the ships of the west countrie and other coasts of this realme waisted abroad on the seas, and toke to the number of thre hundred & 80 french ships, so that the Graie friers church in London was laid full of wine, the Austine friers and Blache friers full of herring, and other fish that was taken, as the same should haue bene conueied into France. About the same season the king demanded a beneuolence of his subiects spirituall and temporall, towards the maintenance of the warres against the Frenchmen and Scots. ¶ On the twelfe of Januarie, the lord chancellour, the duke of Suffolke, and other of the kings counsell, began to sit at Wainards castell, where they first called before them the maior and aldermen, &c. And because Richard Head alderman would not agree to paie as they set him; he was commanded vpon paine to serue the king in his warres of Scotland, who departed from London the thre and twentieth of Januarie.

Also sir William Roch alderman, for words of displeasure taken by the kings counsell, was by them sent to the fleet, where he remained till passion sundaie. On the six and twentieth of Januarie, there camped on the west side of Bullongne beyond the haue, an armie of french, to the number of eighty thouse, where they laie ten daies, and the first of february were put to flight by the earle of Hertford, and sir John Dobleie lord admerall, then depuie of Bullongne. On the thirtieth of february, a priest was set on the pillozie in Cheape, and burnt in both cheekes with the letters F. and A. and a paper on his head, wherein was written, For false accusing: which iudgement was giuen by the lord chancellour in the Starre chamber, a notable example of iustice. Great cause haue I to witte the like to the like accuser, who neuer yet repented, but contrariwise sweareth and forswareth that he neuer did anie such act against his brother.]

In the beginning of March sir Rafe Cuers lord warden of the marches after manie fortunate rodes and forraies made into Scotland, assembled now about foure thousand men, & entering with the same into Scotland, was encountered at Halidon rig by the earle of Arraine and other Scottishmen, which so beset the Englishmen with thre battels on ech side, that in the end they slue the said lord warden, with the lord Dgle, and a great number of other gentlemen and commons, beside prisoners, which they toke, so that few escaped the Scottishmens hands. Among other prisoners taken, Richard Head an alderman of London aforesaid was one. The death of sir Rafe Cuers was greatlie bemoaned: for he had shewed great proofe of his valiant prowesse at sundrie times before; namelie in this yeare past, as at the taking and burning of the towne of Jedworth, which enterpryse was achieved the tenth of June, beside diuerse other exploits fortunatelie brought to passe by his high ballancie and manhood, till his hap was at this present to finish his daies: whose life though then it toke end, yet shall not his fame & good report (purchased by martiall courage, policie, and dangerous adventures) perishe or decaie; as the poet trulie saith:

Parla labore volat et aethum bona fama per orbem, Hec veluti Phœbus non moritura manet.

This yeare on saint Georges daie sir Thomas Wriotheslie lord chancellour of England was made knight of the garter. Also Trinitie terme was adjourned by reason of the warres, but the elcheber and the court of the tenths were open, for those that were accomptable in either of the said courts. The thirteenth of June Robert Luken seruant to sir Humfric Broome one of the iustices of the kings Bench, Anne Askew gentlewoman, otherwile called Anne Kine, wife to one Kine, a gentleman of Lincolnshire, and Jone Sauterere, wife to John Sauterere of London, were arraigned in the Guildhall of London, for speaking against the sacrament of the altar (as they tearmed it) contrarie to the statute of the six articles: but because no witnesse appeared against the women, nor against Luken, one onelie excepted, who was thought to accuse him rather of malice, than otherwise, they were by twelue honest substantiall men of the citie (sworne to passe vpon their indictments) clerelie acquitted and discharged.

The same daie also was a pewterer named Thomas Date discharged, by the pardon granted in the last parlement, after he had remained in prison in Newgate the space of thre yeares now past, condemned long before the date of the same pardon, for the article of auricular confession compisled within the same statute. About the same time, to wit the seuenth of June a great armie of frenchmen came downe to Bullongne, and nere to the haue incamped themselves. In this armie were reckoned to be twelue thousand lanceknights, twelue thousand french footmen, six thousand Italians, foure thousand of legionarie soldours of France, & a thousand or twelue hundred men of armes, beside seuen or eight hundred light horsemen. After some skirmishes not greatlie to their aduantage, they began yet to build a fort, which at length they accomplished, as after shall appeare. ¶ About the six & twentieth of June, was a great tempest in Derbyshe, where thorough trees were ouerturned, & diuerse churches, chapels, and houses were vncouered. Also in Lancashire, there fell hallesones as big as mens fists, which had diuerse prints in them, some like mens faces, some like gun holes, &c.]

The same moneth also the lord Lisle admerall of England with the English fleet entered the mouth of Saine, and came before Newhauen, where a great manie of the frenchmen laie, to the number of a two hundred ships, and six and twentie gallees, wherof the pope (as was reported) had sent twentie well furnished with men and morie, to the aid of the french king. The Englishmen being not past an hundred and threescore saile, and all great ships, determined not to set vpon the frenchmen where they laie: but yet approaching nere vnto them, shot off certeine peces of ordnance at them, and thereby caused the gallees to come abroad, which changed shot againe with the Englishmen. The gallees at the first had great aduantage, by reason of the great calme. Twise either part assaulted other with shot of their great artillerie, but suddenly the wind rose so high, that the gallees could not indure the rage of the seas, and so the Englishmen for feare of flats were compelled to enter the maine seas, and so sailed vnto

Portsmouth where the king late, for he had knowledge by his espials that the Frenchmen intended to land in the Ile of Wight, wherefore he repaired to that coast, to see his realme defended.

After this, the eighteenth of Julie the admerall of France in person Danebalte hoisted by sailes, and with his whole navie came forth into the seas, and arrived on the coast of Sussex before bright Ham-stead, and set certeine of his soldiors on land, to burne and spoile the countrie: but the beacons were fired, and the inhabitants thereabouts came downe so thicke, that the Frenchmen were driven to flie with losse of diverse of their numbers: so that they did little hurt there. Immediatlie hereupon they made to the point of the Ile of Wight, called saint Helens point, and there in good order upon their arrivall they cast anchors, and sent dailie firtene of their gallees to the verie haven of Portsmouth. The English navie li-eng there in the same haven, made them readie, and set out toward the enimies, and still the one shot hotter at the other: but the wind was so calme, that the kings ships could beare no saile, which greatlie grieved the minds of the Englishmen, and made the enimies more bold to approach with their gallees, and to assail the ships with their shot even within the haven.

The twentieth of Julie, the whole navie of the Englishmen made out, & purposed to set on the Frenchmen, but in setting forthward, thorough too much following, one of the kings ships called the Marie Rose was drowned in the midst of the haven, by reason that she was overladen with ordinance, and had the ports left open, which were verie low, and the great artillerie unbraced; so that when the ship should turne, the water entered, and suddentlie she suncke.
In hir was sir George Carew knight and foure hundred soldiors vnder his guiding. There escaped not past forty persons of all the whole number. On the morrow after about two thousand of the Frenchmen landed in the Ile of Wight, where one of their chiefe capteins named le chevalier Daur, a Breuon-cois was slaine with manie other, and the residue with losse and shame driven backe againe to their gallees.

The king perceiving the great Armada of the Frenchmen to approach, caused the beacons to be fired, and by letters sent into Hamptonsyre, Summersetshyre, Willeshire, and into diverse other counties adjoining, gave knowledge to such as were appointed to be readie for that purpose, to come with all speed to encounter the enimies. Whereupon they repaired to his presence in great numbers well furnished with armor, weapon, vittels, and all other things necessarie, so that the Ile was garnished, and all the frontiers alongest the coasts fortified with cr-cading great multitudes of men. The French cap-teins having knowledge by certeine fishermen, whom they took, that the king was present, & so huge a power readie to resist them, they disanchored and drew along the coast of Sussex, and a small number of them landed againe in Sussex, of whome few returned to their ships: for diverse gentlemen of the countrie, as sir Nicholas Delham, and others, with such power as was raised, upon the sudden, took them by the waite and quickelie distressed them.

When they had searched everie where by the coast, and saw men still readie to receive them with bat-tel, they turned sterne, and so got them home againe without anye act achieved worthy to be mentioned.
The number of the Frenchmen was great, so that diverse of them that were taken prisoners in the Ile of Wight, and in Sussex, did report that they were three score thousand. The French king advertised the emperour most vnturly by letters, that his armie had gotten the Ile of Wight with the ports of Ham-ton, and Portsmouth, and diverse other places. In August following, the earle of Hertford entered againe into Scotland with twelve thousand men, and destroyed all the towncs in the middle marches, burned Coldingham abbey, and passed to the west marches, fore annoieng and indamaging the Scots, and yet neither they, nor the Frenchmen that were sent into Scotland this yere to the aid of the Scots, under the leading of monsieur de Logres, Montgomerie his father, durst once come forth into the field to incounter with him.

Also in the beginning of this moneth the citie of London set forth a thousand soldiors of archers, harquebutters, pikes, and bills, which went to Dover, and so passed over unto Calis, to serve the king in his wars on that side the seas. In the same moneth that valiant capteine sir Thomas Poinings knight, lord Poinings, and the kings lieutenant of his towne and marches of Wallogne departed this life, after he had to his great hono: achieved manie won-derfull enterprises in service of his prince against the enimies, so that his death was much lamented. A gentleman undoubtedlie deserving to be had in perpetuall memorie: and pittie it is, that diverse such valiant feats as he in his life time achieved, were not committed to writing, to remaine for examples sake to posteritie.

Also in the same moneth at Gullford died the noble and valiant duke of Suffolke Charles Brandon lord great master of the kings household, a right hardie gentleman, and yet not so hardie, as almost of all estates and degrees of men, high & low, rich and poore, hartlie beloved, & his death of them greatlie lamented: his bodie was honorablie buried at Windsoze, at the kings costs. This man in his daies had done to the king and realme right agreeable services, as well in peace, as in wars, both in England, France, Scotland, and Ireland, he died the kings generall lieutenant of his armie then appointed to resist the Frenchmen, if they durst have landed.

But now, whereas in this meane time we have spoken nothing of the doings in Scotland, where the warre was still continued, the king of France sent thither certeine bands of Frenchmen, vnder the gouvernement of monsieur de Logres, to aid the Scots against the Englishmen; and the king of England waged manie strangers, and sent them with certeine Englishmen to the borders, for defense of the same against the inuasions of the enimies: for after the arrivall of the Frenchmen, a great armie of Scots was raised, and approached nere to the borders, where for a certeine time they incamped, so that manie thought some notable enterprife would have bene attempted. But after they had laine in campe a certeine time, they brake up, and departed without attempting anye further exploit.

Shortlie after the earle of Hertford lieng on the borders, as lieutenant of the north parts of England, calling to him an armie of twelve thousand men, or thereabouts, what of Englishmen and frangers, entred Scotland with the same, and burnt a great part of the pers, and Leithdale, as Kellsie abbey and the towne; Melrosse abbey & Dalborne abbey, also Jedworth abbey, and diverse other places, townes, and villages, to the number of five score.
Kellsie abbey was defended a while by three hundred Scots, but in the end the most part of them were slaine, & taken by the strangers and others that gave the assault. Thus the earle of Hertford fore in-damaged the Scots by this inuasion, and yet neither they, nor the Frenchmen their assistants, durst come forth into the field once to incounter with him.

Scots and Frenchmen attempted to enter into England on the east borders. But the Englishmen perceiving them about to passe by a certaine streit, set upon them, and slue and toke of them to the number of seven score. Among the prisoners that were taken, the lord of Humes sonne, and a French capteine were accounted chiefest. Also in another rode made into the west borders, the lord Marwels sonne, and diuerse others were taken. But at an other time about the same season also, certaine Englishmen to the number of five hundred, making their entrie by the west borders into Scotland, were discomfited by the Scots, and the more part of them either taken or slaine. Thus were they occupied as well on the borders betwixt England and Scotland, in this season, as also in the marches of Calis, Guisnes, and Bullognois, where the garrisons lying in those places, made continuall rodes & forraies into the marches of the enemies cuntry, and oftentimes chanced to encounter with some of their troops.

The capteine of Ard, monsieur de Dampiere, hauing got for a supplie from the French campe at Bullogne, the companie of the men of armes that belonged to the duke of Orleans, led by his lieutenant monsieur de Cauannes, chanced on a daie to encounter with the Englishmen guided by that valiant baron the lord Greie of Wilton, capteine of the towne of Guisnes, who being accompanied with a number of valiant gentlemen & soldiers, distressed their enemies, & slue the capteine of Ard the foresaid lord de Dampiere there in field. Diuerse other skirmishes and encounters chanced in that summer, on the further side the seas. And moreover, now after that the French naue was withdrawen (as ye haue heard) from the coasts about Portsmouth, that martiall chiefeine, sir John Dudley, lord Aisle, and high admerall of England, hauing all his ships, men, munition, & furniture readie, set forward from Portsmouth hauen, to haue fought with the Frenchmen, if they had still kept the seas, but they were withdrawen home into harborough.

Whereupon the lord admerall meaning to reuenge their brauados, and presumptuous attempts made at Portsmouth, and in the Ile of Wight, approached to the coasts of Normandie, and landed with sir thousand men at Treport, burnt the suburbs of that towne, with the abbey, and certaine villages and houses thereabouts. Also they destroyed thirtie ships, and a barke there found in the hauen: and after they had wrought their pleasures, they returned to the sea, and so home, not hauing lost past fourtēne persons in the execution of this whole enterpryse. Of this great spoile & overthrow giuen at Treport, by the kings admerall, I find these verses remembred:

In this meane while monsieur de Biez, being incamped nere to Bullogne with such a puissant armie (as before you haue heard) busied about the building of a fort, there was not such diligence used therein, as was promised on his part in accomplishing the same, to the French kings great displeasure (as some write) who had meant with that armie (if this fort had bene finished at the appointed time) to haue gone to besiege the towne and castell of Guisnes: but now the time being prolonged, and not without some suspicion least monsieur de Biez cared not how long the warres indured in that fort, so as he might command oder so manie princes and great lords as were there under his gouernance, at length before the fort were fullie finished, he remoued to mount Lambert with the more part of the armie, pretending as though he meant to fight with the Englishmen, the which (as he said) he understood were purposed to come with a conuoy of vittells from Calis to Bullogne.

Whilest he there remained, manie princes and great lords came from the court, that late at an abbey called forrest Pontier, eleuen leagues from Bullogne beyond Guttrell, on the waie towards Abuille, in hope that battell should haue followed betwixt the English and French armies. Among other that came thither are these remembred as principall, monsieur Danguen, monsieur Daumalle, monsieur le duc de Peuers, monsieur le conte de La uall, and monsieur de la Trimoille. Monsieur Daumalle eldest sonne to the duke of Guise, being lodged in the bantgard that was gouerned by monsieur de Bissac, chanced on a daie to be present at a skirmish, where shewing himselfe verie forward, he was striken through the sight of his helmet, with a light horsemans staffe, that pearcing in betwixt his nose and his eie, entred halfe a foot into his head, as monsieur de Langeie writeth, and breaking off a two fingers beneath the iron, the same iron remained still within his head: but yet escapng out of the English mens hands, he came backe to the campe, had the truncheon and iron pulled out of his head, and being dressed was conueied in a litter to Plaquigne, where he laie for two or thre daies in such danger, that no man looked that he should haue escaped with life.

There were manie of these skirmishes, wherein the Englishmen bare themselves so valiantlie, that the Frenchmen went awaie oftentimes with losse of manie of their noble men and best soldiers. At one time they lost the lord Penaintuille brother to the lord de Lillebonne, being slaine with stroke of lance and pike. At another time they lost likewise a yong lord of Picardie called le seigneur de Fretote. At length, after their new fort or bastillon was brought in some strength, they furnished it in most defensible wise with men, munition and vittells, naming it Monpleastre. Herewith monsieur de Biez departing from mount Lambert with part of the armie, came downe towards Calis, and entring into the English pale beside Grauelin, wan certaine bulwarks, and incontring diuerse new bands of selecter shiremen and others, latelie before sent ouer, distressed them, and after burnt certaine villages, forraied the cuntry almost to Parke, and afterwards in great haile with their bowtie and pillage they turned. This enterpryse was exploited by the French men about the thirteenth daie in September.

There were with monsieur de Biez at this enterpryse the lord of Bissac, who gouerned the bantgard, and had with him his owne companie of men of armes, and the light horsemen of whome he had the generall conduct. There was also the companie of men at armes that belonged to the constable of France, led by the lord Gutch, & fiftie men of armes vnder the gouernance of the lord of Belleie, the companie also of the lord of Boisse, the companie of the lord Escars, and that of the lord de la Roch du Maine, & others. There was also monsieur de Laies generall of the French footmen, and manie yong princes and lords of high estate, as monsieur Francis de Bourbon, duc Danguen, Francis de Lorraine, duke Daumalle latelie recovered of his hurt, the duke of Peuers, and the earle de La uall that in this voiage was hurt with an harquebus shot in the arme.

Dom. 1545.

An. Reg. 37.

The three and twentieth of November, a parlement began at Westminster, in the which was granted to the king a subsidie of the spiritualtie of six shillings the pound, to be paid in two yeares next ensuing: and of the temporaltie two shillings and eight pence of the pound in goods, and four shillings of the pound in lands, to be paid likewise within two yeares. Also in this parlement all colleges, chanteries, and hospitals were committed to the king, to order, by altering or transposing the same as to him should seeme expedient, which at the prorogation of the same parlement he promised should be done to the glorie of God, and the common profit of the realme. The foure and twentieth of December, the said parlement was proroged, on which daie the king coming into the house, to give his rofall assent vnto such acts as there passed, the speaker made vnto him an eloquent oration, to the which although the custome hath euer bene that the lord chancellor should make answer, it pleased the king at that present to make the answer himselfe, which he uttered as here ensueth.

The kings oration in the parlement house.

Although my chancellor, for the time being, hath before this time used verie eloquentlie and substantiallie, to make answer to such orations as hath bene set forth in this high court of parlement; yet is he not so able to open and set forth my mind and meaning, and the secrets of my heart, in so plaine and ample manner, as I my selfe am and can doe. Wherefore I taking vpon me to answer your eloquent oration master speaker, saie, that where you in the name of our welbeloued commons, haue both praised and extolled me, for the notable qualities that you haue conceiued to be in me: I most hartlie thanke you all, that you haue put me in remembrance of my dutie, which is to indoeuour my selfe to obtaine and get such excellent qualities, and necessarie vertues, as a prince or gouernour should or ought to haue, of which gifts I recognise my selfe both bare and barren, but of such small qualities as God hath indued me withall. I render to his goodnesse my most humble thanks, intending with all my wit and diligence to get and acquire to me such notable vertues and princelie qualities, as you haue alledged to be incorporated in my person. These thanks for your louing admonition and good counsell first remembred, I esteeme thanke you. Again, because that you considering our great charge, not for our pleasure, but for your defense, not for our gaine, but to our great cost, which we haue lately sustained, aswell in defense of our and your enemies, as for the conquest of that fortreffe, which was to this realme most displeasing and noisome, and shalbe (by Gods grace) hereafter to our nation most profitable and pleasant, haue frælie of your owne minds granted to vs a certeine subsidie, here in an act specified, which verelie we take in good part, regarding more your kindnesse, than the profit thereof, as he that setteth more by your louing harts than by your substance. Beside this hartie kindnesse, I cannot a little reioise, when I consider the perfect trust and confidence, which you haue put in me, as men hauing vndoubted hope and vnfained beleefe in my good doings and iust proceedings for you, without my desire or request, haue committed to mine order and disposition all chanteries, colleges, hospitals, and other places specified in a certeine act, firmly trusting that I will order them to the glorie of God, and the profit of the common wealth. Surelie if I (contrarie to your expectation) should suffer the ministers of the church to decaye, or learning (which is so great a iewel) to be diminished, or worse and miserable to be vntelued, you might saie that I being put in so speciall a trust, as I am in this case, were no trustie friend to you, nor charitable to mine euen christian, neither a louer to the public wealth, nor yet one that feared God, to whome account must be rendered of all our doings. Doubt not I praie you, but your expectation shall be serued, more godlie and goodlie than you will wish or desire, as hereafter you shall plainlie perceiue.

Now sith I find such kindnesse on your part towards me, I cannot chuse but loue and fauour you, affirming that no prince in the world more fauoreth his subiects than I doe you; nor no subiects or commons more loued and obeyed their soueraigne lord, than I perceiue you doe me, for whose defense my treasure shall not be hidden, nor if necessitie require, my person shall not be vndauentured. Yet although I wish you, and you wish me, to be in this perfect loue and concord, this frændlie amitie cannot continue, except both you my lords temporal, and my lords spiritual, and you my louing subiects, study and take paine to amende one thing, which surelie is amisse, and farre out of order, to the which I most hartlie require you: which is, that charitie and concord is not among you, but discord and dissention beareth rule in euerie place. Saint Paule saith to the Corinthians, and the thirtieth chapter: Charitie is gentle, charitie is not enuious, charitie is not proud, and so forth in the said chapter. Behold then what loue and charitie is among you, when the one calleth an other heretike and anabaptist, and he calleth him againe papist, hypocrite, and pharise. Be these tokens of fraternall loue betwene you? No, no, I assure you that this lacke of charitie amongst your selues will be the hinderance and allwaging of the seruer betwene vs, as I said before, except this two. First, be salued, and cleerlie made whole. I must needs iudge the fault and occasion of this discord to be partly by negligence of you the fathers and preachers of the spiritualtie: for if I know a man which lieth in adulterie, I must iudge him a lecherous and a carnall person: if I see a man boast and brag himselfe, I cannot but deeme him a proud man. I see here daile that you of the cleargie preach one against another, teach one contrarie to another, inueigh one against an other without charitie or discretion: some be too stiff in their old Mumpimus, other be too buisie and curious in their new sumpsimus: thus all men almost be in varietie and discord, and few or none preacheth trulie and sincerelie the word of God, according as they ought to doe. Shall I iudge you charitable persons doing this? No, no, I cannot so doe. Alas, how can the poore soules liue in concord, when you preachers sow amongst them in your sermons debate and discord? If you they looke for light, and you bring them to darkenesse. Amend these crimes I exhort you, and set forth Gods word, both by true preaching and good example giuing: or else I, whome God hath appointed his vicar and high minister here, will see these diuisions extinct, and these enomities corrected according to my verie dutie, or else I am an vnprofitable seruant, and an vntrue officer. Although I saie the spiritual men be in some fault, that charitie is not kept amongst you; yet you of the temporaltie be not cleare and vnspotted of malice and enuie: for you raile on bishops, speake slanderouslie of preests, and rebuke and taunt preachers, both contrarie to god order and christian fraternitie. If you know suerlie that a bishop or preacher erreth, or teacheth peruerse doctrine, come and declare it to some of our counsell, or to vs, to whome is committed by God the Charitie and concord in commonwealths be things most necessarie: both in matters of religion, charitie and concord is not enough, without heretike and true doctrine of God.

high authoritie to refoyme and order such causes and behaviors, and be not iudges your felues, of your owne fantastickall opintions and vaine expostions, for in such high causes you may lightlie erre. And although you be permitted to read holie scriptures, and to haue the word of God in your mother tong, you must vnderstand, that it is licenced you so to do, onlie to informe your owne consciences, and to instruct your children and familie, and not to dispute, and make scripture a railing and a taunting stocke against priests and preachers, as manie light persons do. I am verie soie to know and heare, how vntucentlie that most precious ietwell the word of God is disputed, rined, song, and tangled in euerie alehouse and tauerne, contrarie to the true meaning and doctrine of the same: and yet I am euen as much soie, that the readers of the same follow it in doing so faintlie and coldlie. For of this I am sure, that charitie was neuer so faint amongst you, and ver-tuous and goble living was neuer lesse vsed, nor God himselfe amongst christians was neuer lesse reuerenced, honored, or serued. Therfore (as I said before) be in charitie one with an other, like brother and brother: loue, or ead, and serue God, to the which I as your supream head and souereigne lord exhort and require you, and then I doubt not, but that loue and league that I spake of in the beginning, shall neuer be dissolved or broken betwene vs. And to the making of laws which we haue now made and concluded, I exhort you the makers to be as diligent in putting them in execution, as you were in making a furthering of the same: or else your labour shall be in vaine, & your common-wealth nothing releued.
Now to your petition, concerning our roiall assent to be given to such acts as haue passed both houses, they shall be read openlie that ye may heare them.

Then were they openlie read, and to manie his grace assented, and diuerse he assented not vnto.
Thus the kings oration was to his subiects there present such comfort, that the like soie could not be vnto them in this world. And thus the acts read (as the manner is) and his assent given, his grace rose and departed. Manie proper seats of armes were exploited and done in this meane while, betwixt the parties English and French about Bullongne. On the morrow after the feast of the Epiphanie, there came a conuioe of vittels towards the French fort, garded with three or foure thousand lancequenets; vnder their coronell the Keingtraue and certeine French horsemen. The earle of Surreie then lieutenant of Bullongne aduertised thereof, made out with such powder as he might conuenientlie spare of them within Bullongne and the Old man, to cut off those vittels: but coming to encounter with the enimies at saint Eustiens, he was put to flight: sir Edward Poynings capteine of a band called the kings gard of Bullongne was slaine in that conflict with fiftene or sixtene other capteins, beside officers and common soldiors. About the same time the Frenchmen made a voyage vnto the Isle of Wasill, with a ship called the barke Ager, which they had taken from the Englishmen before: and in their waie they met with a little craier, of the which one Col-ding was master, a proper man and an hardie. The barke perceiving the craier to be an Englishman, shot at him and botoged him. Whereupon straightwaies the craier drez to the great barke, and sir or seauen of the Englishmen leapt into him. In the meane time while the Frenchmen, without regard of perill towards themselves, looked ouer hatches to behold how the craier sunke there at hand before them, not mistrusting anie thing that the Englishmen might do against them, it fortunied that those Englishmen which got by into the barke, found in the end thereof a great number of lime pots, which they with waier quenched, or rather (as the nature thereof is) set them on fire, and threw them so thicke at the Frenchmen which were there aboard, that they blinded them, in such wise as those few Englishmen that entered the ship vanquished the Frenchmen, and dviuing them vnder hatches, shut the same, and brought the barke a waie with them home into England. In the latter end of March the bothell houses called the Stues on the banke side in Southwoike were conuerted from such filthy vices by the kings commandment, the balwds and ruffians being put out, and other persons of honest behauior placed in their rooms to inhabit in the same houses. This was done by proclamation and sound of trumpet by an herald of armes.

On the seuen and twentieth of Aprill being tuesdaie in Easter weeke William Forleie pot-maker for the mint of the Towre of London fell asleepe, and so continued sleeping, and could not be wakened with picking, cramping, or otherwise burning what-soener, till the first daie of the next terme, which was full fourtene daies, and as manie nights or more, for that Easter terme beginneth not before seauentene daies after Easter. The cause of his thus sleeping could not be knowen, though it were diligentlie searched for by the kings physicians and other learned men, yea the king himselfe examining the said William Forleie, who was in all points found at his waking to be but as if he had slept but one night: he was liuing in the Towre of London in the yere of our Lord God 1579.]

This yere by meanes made by the emperors commissioners were appointed to meet & treat of some accord betwene the realmes of England & France, so that the king of England sent ouer to Calines, Cutbert Tunstall bishop of Duresme, sir William Paget his secretarie, and doctor Tregonell: and the French king sent to Ard a bishop, the chiefe president of Rouen, and a notarie, but no conclusion followed of their trauell. Whereupon the king of England hauing perfect knowledge how the Frenchmen intended to build a fortreffe at saint Johns rode be-twene Bullongne and Calis, to the great annoyance of both those places, if they might haue compassed their purpose, he meant to preuent that deuise of his aduersaries, sending ouer the earle of Hertford and the lord Lisle high admerall of England, with manie valiant capteins, which got the rode but two daies before the Frenchmen had appointed to be there. But when they vnderstood that the Englishmen had so preuented them, they staied about Harb-low, where monsieur de Bie; their generall gaue order to incampe, and durst not once come forward to assaie the English forces: so that without anie impeachment by land, the Englishmen built certeine fortresses, to wit, two at the same place of saint Johns rode, otherwise called Hamble Thew, and an other about a two miles from thence at a place called Blacke Helle. There was in the earle of Hertfords campe beside Englishmen diuerse Frangers, Almains, Spaniards and Italians. And because it is not much impertinent to the matter, we haue thought good here to set downe the whole number of all the kings forces at that present in his paie that were there vnder the said earle of Hertford: the kings generall lieutenant. First the earle had two hundred, the lord William Sturton three hundred, the lord John Creie brother to the marques Dorset two hundred, the lord Bzaie one hundred, sir Thomas Seimer knight marshall of the host one hundred, sir Henric Bneuet capteine of the horsemen ordinance one hundred, sir Spauris Backleie three hundred, sir Thomas Wolcroft two hundred, sir Walter Dennis two hundred, sir George Blewet two hundred, sir Richard Cranesfield two hundred, sir George Cornwell two hundred, sir John Luttrell one hundred, sir Edmund Hulle one hundred, George Holmston two hundred, capteine Brough-ton two hundred, capteine Palmer two hundred, capteine Chancie two hundred, capteine Windam two hundred, capteine Stukeleie one hundred, capteine Sidnam one hundred, capteine Bret one hundred, capteine Dier one hundred, capteine Evans one hundred, Spaniards fifteen hundred, Italians two hundred, Clemeners three hundred, lancequenets under the government of their coronell Conrade Henning, commonlie called Courtpernie, three thousand. The summe of all the soldiors in Bullongne & Bullongnois were 93000. Here you must note, that whilst the English armie laie thus in the field till the foyts of Hamble Chew and Blacke Pesse were in building, the French gallies were on the seas, and now and then came and approached nere to the shore, where the English armie laie in campe, at the which they shot off their ordinance: and the Englishmen answered them againe with the like. They came also before Sals, and shot off at the towne. But the lord admerall being there, made out to encounter them, notwithstanding they did first much hurt, and take awaye diuerse of the English vessels laden with vittells.

The eighteenth daie of Maie there were foure of the kings ships, and foure pinases abroad on the seas afore the haven of Hamble Chew, and there came eightene of the French gallies to set vpon them, and so there was great shooting betwene them: and at length one of their gallies was taken, in the which were aboord fourteene score soldiors and seauen score rowlers: the rest of their gallies packed awaie. Moreover, whilst the campe laie thus at Hamble Chew, it chanced that on a daie a mutinie rose among the lancequenets against their capteine, so that they got themselves into order of battell, seized vpon the great artillerie, and shewed countenance as if they would haue set vpon the residue of the whole campe. Herevpon euerie soldior was commanded to repaire to his ensigne, and the Spaniards came and joined with the Englishmen, readie to take such part as they did. At length by the diligence of the chieftaines, and good countenance of the English soldiors and Spaniards the tumult was staied, and six of the principall beginners were hanged.

The one and twentieth of Maie the French armie came and incamped beyond Bullongne at the church on the hill: and the morrow after the earle of Hertford marched with his power to a place within two miles of them, and certeine footmen and horsemen went forth and skirmished with them; and in the meane time the artillerie ceased not to shot off, as well from the French campe and fortresse as from Bullongne and the Old man. This daie were slaine fouretene Frenchmen and two taken prisoners; and three of the English part were likewise taken, and so the earle of Hertford returned to his campe, and left the lancequenets vpon the hill, incamped before the enemies faces, not two miles distant from them, in which place a fort was begun to be raised, which was after called the fort of Bullongne Berg. The next daie, to wit, the three and twentieth of Maie the soldiors of Bullongne and the lancequenets skirmished with the Frenchmen, slue and toke of them seuen score and aboue, of the which there were fortie that were in cotes of beluet, and diuerse also with chaines,

Here you must vnderstand, that now in this meane while by the motion of diuerse princes, a meeting was had of sundrie commissioners, appointed to treat of some peace, to be concluded betwixt the two kings of England and France. Herevpon there came to Guisnes for the king of England the earle of Hertford, the bishop of Winchester, sir John Dupleie viscount Lille baron of Gaupas, and high admerall of England, sir William Paget the kings secretarie, and doctor Nicholas Wotton deane of Canturburie. For the French king there came to Ard monsieur Claude Danebanlt admerall of France, being also one of the foure marshals of that realme, the bishop of Curcur, monsieur Keimund chiefe president of Rone, the secretarie Bonchesteil. Diuerse times they met betwixt Ard and Guisnes, and after long debating of matters, and diuerse breakings off: yet at length the seauenth of Iune a peace was concluded, and proclaimed as well in the court as in the citie of London on Whitfundae the thirtieth of Iune, with sound of trumpet, according to the manner: and in like sort the same daie it was proclaimed at Paris and at Rone. The chiefest article of which peace was this, that the French king paing to the king of England 800000 crownes within the terme of eight peares, should haue Bullongne againe to him restored, which in the meane time should remaine in the hands and possession of the king of England, as a pledge and gage for assurance of the said moneie.

On the seuen & twentieth of Iune doctor Crome recanted at Paules crosse: which recantation was bzged vpon this occasion. When the chanteries & colleges were given by act of parlement into the kings hands (as is aboue remembred) which was about the moneth of December 1545, the next lent following doctor Crome preaching in the mercers chappell, among other reasons and persuations, to rouse the people from the vaine opinion of purgatorie, inferred this, grounding vpon the said act of parlement: that if trentals and chanterie masses could auail the soules in purgatorie, then did the parlement not well in giuing awaie monasteries, colleges, & chanteries, which serued principallie to that purpose. But if the parlement did well (as no man could denie) in dissolving them & bestowing the same vpon the king, then is it a plaine case, that such chanteries and priuat masses do nothing conferre to releue them in purgatorie. This Dilemma of doctor Crome, no doubt, was insoluble: but notwithstanding the charitable prelates (for all the kings late exhortation vnto charitie) were so charitable to him that they brought him Coram nobis, and so handled him that they made him recant his words. ¶ On the sixteenth of Iune were letters patents deliuered to sir Thomas Cheinie treasurer of the kings household, and lord warden of the cinque ports, whereby he was authorized to be the kings agent in chassening the Dolphins daughter of France named Elizabeth. A true copie of which letters patents is here recorded, because the said action hath bene ignozantlie transferred from the said sir Thomas Cheinie to sir Henrie Inne: as appeareth in Holinsheds chronicle published 1577, pag. 1608.

The king hauing passed ouer the foresaid letters patents to sir Thomas, and he in forwardnesse to execute his charge, to the intent that his retinue and attendants should no waies offendueltie behaue themselves against the French, with whom the king was verie carefull to continue and mainteine the peace interchangeably agreed vpon and concluded, his maiestie to preuent and cut off all occasions that might anie waie impeach, interrupt, or violate this peace, commanded the lords of his counsell to direct letters withall expedition to the said sir Thomas, then vpon his volage into France, containing a prescript forme of demeanour, which the gentlemen & yeomen attendant vpon him in France should vse, during the time of their abode in those foren parts: a copie of which letter, being a testimoniall of the king of Englands inclinable mind to peace hereafter followeth out of the verie originall, as the same was subscribed by the lords.

A copie of the said letters sent in post to sir Thomas Cheinie being vpon his voiage into France.

After our right hartie commendations to your good lordship. The kings maiestie hath willed vs to signifie vnto you, that his highnesse expresse pleasure and commandement is, ye should in his maiesties name declare to such gentlemen as accompanie you into France, that they haue in remembrance so to vse & behaue them selues among the Frenchmen as well on the waie as at the court, in such sort as they by communication vpon feats of the warre passed giue no occasion of priuat displeasure. Wherein therefore it shall be expedient, that either they saie nothing, vnlesse they be prouoked; or in that case call the things happened fortune de la guerre, without comparison of things chanced on our part or on theirs, but turne the communication to reioise in peace. In the conditions whereof they shall pretend ignorance, without speaking of the keeping still of Bullogne, or deliuerance of it againe, but as shall please the princes for the continuance of peace, wherein by Gods grace the crueltie of warre shall be conuerted into extremitie of friendship, to the weale and commoditie of both realmes.

And forsomuch as there want not in the world naughtie men of the state of monks and friers, who for malice of the alteration of their estate here, would gladlie defame our religion towards God, as though we had with them cast out all; his highnesse expresse pleasure and commandement is, that considering at this first entrie of you, the behauiour of your companie shall be much marked and noted in matters of religion and circumstances: of the same they should therefore haue so much the more regard both to their communications and also behauiours, and not onelie in speech to forbear to dispute or intermedle with the state of their policy there, but also in their diet on the fith daie and deuout hearing of masse, follow the order of the kings maiesties relme, so as their conuersation & behauior maie be cōfution to such as would defame this realme in the contrarie. Thus fare your good lordship right hartilie well. From Greenwich the nineteenth of Iune 1546. Your lordships assured louing friends, Thomas Wriothesleye counc. W. Saint-Iohn. I. Russell. Cuth. Duresme. Steph. Winton. Anthonie Brenne. William Petres. This letter was thus indorsed. To our assured louing friend sir Thomas Cheinie knight of the order, treasuror of the kings maiesties household, and lord warden of the cinque ports, presentlie in speciall commission from the kings maiestie into France. Hast, post hast for thy life, to Douer, Calis, or where he shall chance to be: hast, hast.

Thus farre of sir Thomas Cheinie, imployed about the kings affaires in France; namelye the chrestening of the Dolphins daughter: wherein we haue bene the more copious in words, because it hath ben published, that sir Henrie Kneuet was therunto personallie deputed: which to be vntreue, both the letters patents and the letter missiue do sufficiently proue: both which we receiued at the hands of an ancient seruitor, attendant vpon the same sir Thomas at his being in France to execute his charge in the kings behalfe. Of which word the knight when we come to the years and daie of his death, we will deliuer further report to his high commendation, but yet none otherwise than as by warranted intelligence we shall be directed.]

The same time was a combat fought before the French king betwixt two Spaniards, Julian Romero, and one Porro. They both serued the king of England in the last wars against France: but Porro had revolted from his seruice to the French kings, and for certaine speeches which he had vttered, was chalenged to fight the said combat by the said Julian, for whome sir Henrie Kneuet undertooke that he should stand to his chalenge, and trie it with his aduersarie, which he now did, and vanquished him in lists; the fight being appointed on horse backe. Incontinentlie after, sir Henrie Kneuet sickened and died at Coibell, and was buried in Paris within the church of S. Paule. Whereouer, for the full establishment of the peace, and to receiue the French kings oth, the vicount Aisle lord admerall, with the bishop of Duresme, and diuerse other lords, and gentlemen, Henrie Tennant.

element, to the number of one hundred and above, all in velvet cotes and chaines of gold, with fure and fotte peomen right semelie appointed, went into France, departing from Bullogne the tenth of Julie, and came to Spelune a towne beyond Paris, where the French king then laie, by whome and the Dolphin his sonne they were roialtie receiued, sealed, and banketed: and hauing done that for the which he was sent, the said lord admerall vnderle the first of August took his leaue of the French king, who rewarded him with a cupbord of plate all gold, valued at 1500 pounds. The lords also and gentlemen had chaines of gold giuen to them, and the peomen had two hundred crownes bestowed amongst them, and so the lord admerall returned into England. This lord admerall, during the time that he had to deale with the French, so valiantlie demeaned himselfe, and was such a terror and astonishment to the enimie, as it is left written of him, that they durst not quench in his presence, but were like a fozt of timorous cattell, giuing roome to the raging lion ranging ouer the pastures with his yonglings, and making the berie heauens to ring with his ro-ring, after he hath filled his selfe with bulles flesh, and laid his selfe downe to rest being wearie with eating: the comparisson berie aptlie followeth:

præque iracundo cedunt armenta leoni, Pascua cum plenus bacchante furore peragrat Solum cum catulis, celum, & rugibus implens Conspicitur, postquam taurorum carnibus atra sit saturata fames, lassusque recumbit edendo: Tantus terror erat Gallis Dupleius Heros.

In the same moneth of August monsieur Dane-halt high admerall of France, accompanied with the bishop of Carreur, the earle of Mauteuil knight of the order, the earle of Williers, the chiefe president of Moan, secretaire Bouchetell, monsieur de Carples knight of the order, monsieur de Laes knight of the order, monsieur de Mailletie viceadmerall of France, monsieur de Dese, the baron de la Card, with diuerse other lords and capitaines of honoz, beside two hundred gentlemen well appointed, leued from Depe with twelue gallies and a right faire ship called the Sacre of Depe, and so making saile he sailed not anie where to take land, till he came into the Thames, where at Blacketwall he was recei-ued into the kings barge by the earles of Warbie and Clee, who brought him to Grenewich, where he landed, and lodged there that night.

The next daie he came vp with all his gallies, and landed at the Tower wharfe. Upon all the banks by the water side were laid peeces of artillerie, which shot off frelie, and so likewise did all the artillerie in the ships, but spectallie from the Tower was shot a maruellous great peale of ordinance. From whence being landed, they rode thorough London in great triumph (the maior and the crafts standing in the streets in berie good order) vnto the bishops palace by Pauls, where the French admerall lodged till Bartholomeu euen, on which daie he was conueied toward Hampton court, where in the waie the prince hauing with him the archbishop of Yorke, the earles of Hertford and Huntingdon, and about two thousand hoise, met him and imbraced him in such courteous and honorable wise, that all the beholders greatlie reioiced, and much maruelled at the said princes high wit and great audacitie, and so the French admerall came to the court, giuing the prince the hyper hand as they rode. And at the utter gate of the court, the lord chancellor, and all the kings counsell receiued him, and brought him to his lodging.

On Bartholomeu daie the king admitting him to his presence, welcomed him, and in great triumph went to the chappell, where the king receiued his oath to performe the articles of the league, as it was couenanted. To speake of the banquettings, huntings, and such like honorable sorts of interteinements, it were much to bitter, and hard to beleue. But on Fri-daie following, being the seuen and twentieth of August, he being rewarded with a cupbord of plate, to the value of twelue hundred pounds, returned to London, and on the sundaie next ensuing took his gallies and departed. Beside the kings gifts, he had giuen to him by the citie of London two flaggons guilt, and two other that were parcell guilt, valued at one hundred thirtie six pounds, beside wine, war, and torches. There were diuerse of his companie also that went not a waie unrewarded, hauing both plate, and also manie hoises, and greibounds giuen them.

Although this peace pleased both the English and French nations, yet suerlie both mistrusted the continuance thereof. And verelie the old prouerbe seemed to be thoroughlie verified, which saith, that what the eye seeth, the hart rueeth: for the Frenchmen still long-ed for Bullogne, and the Englishmen meant not willinglie to giue it ouer. For during the French admerals being in England, monsieur de Chatillon capitaine of Pontplaisier began to make a new batilion euen at the berie mouth of the hauen, naming it Chatillons garden. Whereupon that noble gentleman the lord Greie of Wilton, shortly after appointed to be deputie of the towne and countie of Bullogne, perceluing the great inconuenience that this new building would bring to the towne if it went forwards, did aduertise the king thereof, ear-nestlie beseeching his grace, that the matter might be thoroughlie considered of. Sir Thomas Palmer was the messenger.

The king vpon the intelligence, asked his coun-cels aduise, which onelie went wholie, that the conditions of the peace were not in anie wise to be infringed. This resolved, secretaire Paget then knight, and afterwards lord, was commanded accordingly to draw a letter to the lord Greie, the which the king himselfe did signe, willing that the messenger should further know of his pleasure before he departed.
Whereupon Sir Thomas Palmer, hauing his dispatch at the secretaries hands, did get word to be giuen to the king, who presentlie sent for him into his priuie chamber, and betwixt them two, bled these wordes: Palmer, you haue there a letter from vs to the lord Greie, that he do in no wise deale in the matter that he hath by you aduertised vs of. Notwithstanding, I will that you deliuer him this message from vs.

Wid him call to mind how that his brethren and himselfe not a short time, but euen from tender yeares, no farre off, but still nere to our person, we haue brought him vp, which (tell him) not vnuslie, if that be in him that we conceiue doth breed in vs an od trust of seruencie to serue vs of him, more than a common seruant or subiect. By that token will him what soeuer I haue written to the contrarie, that he presentlie impeach the fortification of Chatillons garden, and rafe it if it be possible: and this my message shall be his clearing therein, & the seruice gratefullie accepted. Sir Thomas Palmer somewhat astonied hereat, considering the weightinesse of the cause, and the contrarietie of the letter and message, began to put the king in mind of the small credit that his bare errand of right was like to haue, so that against that which his maiesties letters imposed.
But the king cutting off his tales, deliuer thou the message (quoth he) at his cholle then be the executing thereof.

So some as the noble king had finished his last will and testament, as afore is said, he thortite thereupon yelded vp his spirit to almightie God, departing this world the eight and fiftenth date of Janu-arie, in the eight and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare of our Lord 1546, after the accompt of the church of England; but after the accompt which we follow in this booke 1547, beginning our yeare the first of Januarie. He reigned thirtie and seuen yeares, nine moneths and od daies. His bodie (according to his will in that behalfe) was conueted to Windso: with all funerall pompe, and in the college there interred. Of this tresnoble and trespuissant monarch, I find these few verses, which maie serue in god stead of an epitaph or funerall inscription:

Henricus princeps prope lustra peregerat octo, Et populum magna prudens cum laude regebat; Ex quo magna solistractant sceptrum Britannia; Cum Deus omnipotens, morbo obrepente, moueret Hinc emigrandum de vita. Probo dolor ingens!
Quod pia plebs lachrymis quam tristibus ora riganit?
Quam grauius regni proceres plangere cubantem?
Anglia tota acer moriens, lugubris & anens, Nil quis apportant medici, nil profuit herba; Qua solent humanis membris adferre salutem; Pharmaca nil profunt, praebetur potius fustis; Heu nulla tristis mors est medicabilis arte.

This noble prince was right fortunate in all his doings, so that commonlie whatsoeuer he attemted, had good successe, as well in matters of peace as of wars: Of personage he was tall and mightie, in his latter daies somewhat grosse, or as we tearmoit, beuillie: in wit and memorie verie perfect of such maiestie tempered with humanitie, as best became so noble and high an estate: a great fauourer of learning; as he that was not ignorant of good letters himselfe: he was of great magnificence and liberality, in so much that John Leland that worthy antiquarie, hauing tasted of his royall bountyfullnesse, hath left the lesse testifies to the world in a proper epigram, which I will not omit, least I should wil-fullye conceale a manifest protestation of his thank-fulnesse: which I will now transcribe into the world in writing:

Ante suos Phœbus radios, et Luna mundum Definet, & clara Cynthia pulchra facies: Ante suet rapidum, & iter, & sine fine sequor; Spinifer & nullam sentio habere quæm; Ante sacra quercus cessant spargere ramis, Florida sollicita pingere prata manu; Quam rex ducit tuum labatur pectore nistro Nomen, quod studij portus & auræ meæ.

And the same John Leland, who deseruedlie had tasted the fruits of the kings largesse, was not unacquainted with the same of his renowne, which had made it selfe knowne by restles flight to nations far and neare, some to their smart hauing felt the valor of his forces, and others submitting themselves for fear of utter desolation. Whereupon he became a terro: to his enemies, and yet none more desirous of peace than he, if by anie other meanes (besides violence) the same might haue bene obtained. Sufficient cannot be said in his high & merited commendation, considering that as his victories were singular, so were they also manifold; and hard it is for the pen of a cunning rhetorician to paint him out according to his dignitie: howbeit the said John Leland hath left in writing a proper epigram, deuised in praise of his most excellent king, by way of comparison, to his immortall commendation, as here followeth:

Quantum punicis nouo rosetis Cedunt vere suis rubra spinis; Quantum lilio amenioris hortis Gemma omnes alia nitore cedunt: Quantum cetera punicis decoro Malis poma quidem rubore cedunt: Quantum confert breues myricæ Concedunt quog gloria cupressus; Quantum stellæ ero repressa tellus Cala mole sua & nigrore cedit: Tantum omnes alij celebritate, Fama, nomine gloriæ, vera (Et mittam ingenij valentioris Lumen, flumina, fulmen atq; vires Rari iudicij tui perennes) Concedunt tibi principes sereni; Henrice, & patria tua columna Talis, qualis erat celebris illa Olim quam extulit Henrich triumphans.

Tristram Keuell, Henrie Binklow a merchant of London wrote a little booke, which he published vnder the name of Roderike Mors, and also a complaint vpon London, &c. Robert Shingletan borne of a good familie in Lancashire wrote a treatise of the seauen churches, and other things, as of certeine prophesies, for the which (as some write) he suffered at London, being conuict of treason in the yeare 1544; William Warreie a Welshman wrote a booke intituled Speculum iuuenum.

Of strangers that liued here in this kings daies, and for their woꝝkes which they wrote were had in estimation, these we find recorded by master Bale: Barnard Andreas a Frenchman borne in Colouise an Augustin frer, and an excellent poet; Adrian de Castello, an Italian of Corneto a towne in Tuscanie, he was commended vnto king Henrie the seventh by the archbishop of Dorset, and thereupon was first made bishop of Hereford, and after resigning that see, was aduanced to Bath and Wells; Andreas Ammonius an Italian of the citie of Luca, secretary to the king, wrote diuerse treatises; James Calco an Italian also of Pavia in Lombardie, by profession a Carmelite frer, an earnest defender of the diuorle betwixt the king and the ladic Katharine Dowager, disprouing the marriage betwixt them to be in any wise lawfull.

cause his sonne and heire prince Edward to be proclaimed king of this realme by the name of Edward the first, king of England, France, and Ireland, defender of the faith, and of the churches of England and Ireland the supream head, he being yet but nine yeares and od moneths of age: he was thus proclaimed the eight and twentieth of Januarie, in the yeare of the world 5513, and after the birth of our Lord 1547, according to the accompt of them that begin the yeare at Christmalle; but after the accompt the nine and twentieth yeare of the emperor Charles

Shortlie hereupon the earle of Hertford with other of the lords resorted to Hatfield, where the yong king then late, from whence they conduced him with a great and right honorable companie to the Tower of London. During the time of his abode there, for the god gouvernement of the realme, the honour and suerie of his maiesties person, his uncle Edward earle of Hertford, was by order of the counsell, and the assent of his maiestie (as one most meetest to occupie that roome) appointed gouernour of his roiall person, and protector of his realmes, dominions and subiects, and so proclaimed the first of Februarie by an herald at armes, and sound of trumpet through the citie of London in the vsuall places thereof, as it was thought expedient.

Hertford chosen protector.

The first daie of Februarie the earle of Hertford lord protector, adorned king Edward with the order of knighthood, remaining then in the Tower, and therewith the king standing vp, called for Henrie Hubbetheorne lord maior of the citie of London, who coming before his presence, the king took the sword of the lord protector, and dubbed the said Hubbetheorne knight, he being the first that euer he made. The seauenteenth of Februarie the lord protector was created duke of Summerset, the earle of Essex was created marquisse of Northampton, the lord Lisle high admerall of England was created earle of Warwick and high chamberlaine of England, sir Thomas Wriothesley lord chancelour was created earle of Northampton, sir Thomas Seimer was aduanced to the honour of lord of Sub-leie and high admerall of England, which office the earle of Warwick then resigned, sir Richard Rich was made lord Rich, and sir William Willoughbie was created lord Willoughbie of Parrham, sir Edmund Sheffield was made lord Sheffield of Butterwike; and as saith a late writer of this action:

Et quisque est diuine potentior, aut eius honore, Et noua virtutis sumens insignia fulget.

At the same time great preparation was made for the kings coronation, so that the foure and twentieth of Februarie next ensuing, his maiestie came from the Tower, and so rode through London vnto Westminster, with as great roialtie as might be, the streets being hong, and pageants in diuerse places erected, to testifie the good willes of the citizens, reioi-sing that it had pleased God to deale so fauourable with the English nation to grant them such a to-wardlie yong prince to their king and soueraigne thus to succed in place of his noble father. ¶ Now as he rode through London toward Westminster, and passed on the south part of Pauls churchyard, an Argoline came from the battlements of the steeple of Pauls church vpon a cable, being made fast to an ancho; by the deanes gate, lieng on his breast, aiding himselfe neither with hand nor foot, and after ascended to the middelt of the cable, where he tumbled and plaid manie pretie toies, whereat the king and the nobles had good pastime.]

The morrow after being Shrouesundae and the five and twentieth of Februarie, his coronation was solemnized in due forme and order, with all the roialtie and honour which therevnto appertained. Shortlie after the coronation, to wit, the first of March, the erle of Southhampton, lord chancelour of England, for his too much repugnancie (as was reported) in matters of counsell to the residue of the counsellors about the king, was not onelie depriued of his office of chancelor, but also remoued from his place and authoritie in counsell, and the custodie of the great seale was taken from him, and deliuered vnto sir William Paulet lord Saint-John, that was lord great master of the kings household.

ding a reformation, did not onelie set forth by cer-teine commissioners, sundrie intunditions for the remouing of images out of all churches, to the suppressing and auoiding of idolatry and superstition within his realmes and dominions, but also caused certeine homilies or sermons to be drawne by sundrie godlie & learned men, that the same might be read in churches to the people, which were afterward by certeine of these commissioners sent forth as vi-sitours, accompanied with certeine preachers, the roughout the realme, for the better instruction of the people, published and put in use. At Caister next following, he set out also an order thorough all the realme, that the supper of the lord should be ministered to the laic people in both kinds. ¶ On the fifteenth of Maie doctor Smith recanted at Paules crosse.]

All these things done concerning religion (as before is said) the lord protector and the rest of the council, calling to mind the evil dealing and craftie dissimulation of the Scots, concerning the matter of marriage betwixt the kings maiestie, and the queene of Scotland (which marriage as ye have heard, in the five and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the eight, was by authoritie of parlement in Scotland fullie concluded) thought it not to stand with the kings honor to be in such maner by them deluded, and withall considering how greatlie it should turne to the quietnesse and safetie of both realmes to have these two princes contained in matrimonie, they did devise sundrie waies and meanes how the same might be brought to passe, and the rather (as some do write) for that king Henrie (before his death) had given them in speciall charge by all indentours to procure that the said marriage might take place, as whole wishing by the coniunction of those two young princes, the uniting of the two kingdoms in perpetuall amitie and faithfull league of love; as our poet saith:

Optat coniugio duo regna corae fideli,

Aeternam pacem hinc aeternaque federa iungi.

But the lords of Scotland were so inveigled and corrupted by the French king, and abused by cardinal Beton, archbishop of saint Andrews, and other of their clergie, that they not onelie shanke from that which they had promised, but also sought to destroye those that favored the king of Englands part: whereupon a great and puissant armie was now prepared to passe by land into Scotland, and likewise a nauie to passe by sea to attend upon the same: whereof the great gallie and foure and twentie tall ships were thoroughlie furnished with men and munition for the warres, besides manie merchants ships and other small vessels, which served for carriage of vittells, and other necessities.

But now to shew what noble men and other were ordeined officers, and assigned to have the conduction as well of the armie by land, as of the fleet by sea; ye shall understand, that first the duke of Summerset, lord protector, took upon him to go himselfe in person, as generall of the whole armie, and capteine also of the battell of middle-ward, wherein were foure thousand footmen. The marshall erle of Warwicke appointed lord lieutenant of the same armie, led the fore-ward containing three thousand footmen. The lord Dacres governed in the reere-ward, wherein were other three thousand footmen. The lord Greie of Wilton was ordeined high marshall of the said armie & capteine generall of all the horsemen, being in number six thousand. Sir Rafe Sadler knight treasurer of the armie. Sir Francis Blizan knight, capteine of the light horsemen, in number two thousand.

Sir Rafe Wane knight lieutenant of all the men of armes and demilances. Sir Thomas Darcie knight capteine of all the kings maiesties pensioners, and men at armes. Sir Richard Leigh knight deuiser of the fortifications. Sir Peter Helwates knight capteine of the harquebutters, which were in number six hundred. Sir Peter Camboa knight, capteine of two hundred harquebutters on horsebacke. Sir Francis Fleming knight was master of the ordinance. Sir George Blaag & sir Thomas Wolceroft commissioners of the musters. Edward Shelleie, the lord Greies lieutenant of the men of armes of Bullongne, who was the first that gave the onset in the date of battell, and died most honorable in the same. John Wyenne capteine of the pioneers being in number a thousand foure hundred. Thomas Audeleie and Edward Chamberleine harbingers of the field.

The lord Edward Clinton admerall of the fleet: Sir William Woodhouse knight his viceadmerall. There were in the armie of great ordinance fifteen hundred pieces, and of carriages nine hundred carts, besides manie wagons, whereof the commissarie generall was George Ferrers. As soon as the armie by land was in a readinesse, and set forward to come to Berwicke at a date appointed, the nauie likewise took the sea, and by the helpe of Gods good guiding had so prosperous speed in their passage, that they arrived at Berwicke in time convenient, wither upon the thirtieth of August being tuesday, the lord protector came, and laic in the castell with sir Nicholas Strelleie knight, capteine there. The next daie commandement was given that everie man should provide himselfe for foure daies vittells to be caried forth with them in carts.

On thursdaie the first of September the lord protector, not with manie more than with his owne band of horsemen, rode to a towne standing on the sea coast, a six miles from Berwicke within Scotland called Almouth, whereat there runneth a river into the sea, which he caused to be sounded, and finding the same well able to serve for an haven, caused afterwards a foztresse to be raised there, appointing Thomas Cotter, that was marshall of Berwicke, to be capteine thereof. On fridate, all saving the councill departed the towne of Berwicke, and incamped a two flight shots off by the sea side, toward Scotland. And the same daie the lord Clinton with his fleet took the seas from Berwicke, to the end that in case the wind should not serve them to keepe course with the armie by land; yet were it but with the driving of tides, they might upon anie need of munition or vittells be still at hand, or not long from them.

The same daie the earle of Warwicke, and sir Rafe Sadler treasurer of the armie, came to Berwicke from Helwates, where they had staid till then, for the full dispatch of the rest of the armie, and the next daie the earle of Warwicke incamped in field with the armie. On which daie a proclamation with sound of trumpet was made by an herald in three severall places of the campe, signifying the cause of the coming of the kings armie at that present into Scotland, which in effect was, to advertise all the Scottish nation, that their coming was not to deprive them of their liberties, but to advance the marriage already concluded and agreed upon betwixt the kings maiestie of England and their queene, and no hostilitie ment to such as should shew themselves furtherers thereof. On the fourth of September being sundaie, the lord protector came from out of the towne, and the armie raised, and marched that daie a six miles, and camped by a village called Kossan in the baronie of Boukendall.

The order of their march was this. Sir Francis Blizan capteine of the light horsemen, with foure hundred of his band, tended to the skout a mile or two before. The carriages kept along the sea coast, and the men at armes and demilances divided into three troops, answering the three wards, rid in arraye directly against the carriages a two flight shots asunder from them. The three foot battels kept order in place betwixt them both, the fore-ward foremost, the battell in the middle, the reere-ward hindermost, each ward having his troope of horsemen and gard of ordinance, his aid of pioneers for amendment of waies, waies, where need should be. The first of September they marched an eight miles, untill they came to the heathes, a clough or ballie, running for a six miles west freight eastward, and toward the sea a twentie score yode from banke to banke aboue, and a five score in the bottome, wherein runnes a little river. Sothe is this ballie on either side, and deepe in the bottome.

The Scots had cast trenches ouerthwart the side waies on either side, in manie places, to make the passage more cumbersome: but by the pioners the same were sone filled, and the waie made plaine, that the armie, carriage, & ordinance were quite set ouer sone after sun set, & there they pitched downe their campe. Whilest the armie was thus passing ouer this cumbersome passage, an herald was sent from the lord protectoz, to summon a castell, that stood at the end of the same ballie, a mile from the place where they passed downe towards the sea. Matthew Hume capteine thereof, a brothers sonne of the lord Humes, vpon his summons required to speake with the lord protectoz. It was granted, and he came, whome the lord protectoz handled in such sort with effectuall wordes, putting him in choise whether he would yeld, or stand to the aduenture, to haue the place twine of him by force, that he was contented to render all at his graces pleasure.

And so being commanded to go fetch his compaignie out of the house, he went and brought them, being in all one and twentie persons. The capteine and six other were staied and commanded to the keeping of the marshall, the residue were suffered to depart whither they thought good. After this surrender, the lord John Greie brother to the marques Dorset, was appointed to seise & take possession of the house, being capteine of a great number of demilances, as for his appoyued worthinesse and valiance right well he might, agreable to the deserued report remaining of him in print in foiren speech as followeth:

Grains heros
Ob summam belli cataphractis praeiit artem.

The spoile was not rich sure, but of white bread, oten cakes, and Scotish ale indifferent good store, and sone bestowed among my lordes soldiorz; for swordes, bucklers, pikers, pots, pans, yarne, linnen, hempe, and heapes of such baggage, which the countrie people there about had brought into that pile, to haue it in more suretie, the soldiorz would scarce vouchsafe to stope and take the same vp.

In the meane time the lord protectoz appointed the house to be ouerthstone, which by the capteine of the pioners was done, though with some trauell, by reason the walles were so thicke, and the foundation so deepe, and thereto set vpon so craggie a plot. Tuesdaye the first of September, the armie dislodged and marched forward. In the waie as they should go, a mile and an halfe from Dunglas northward were two piles of holds, Thoznton & Anderwiike, set both on craggie foundations, & diuided a stones cast a funder by a deepe gut, wherein ran a little river. Thoznton belonged to the lord Hume, and was kept by one Thom Trotter, who vpon summons giuen him to render the house, lockt vp a sixtene poze soules like the soldiorz of Dunglas fast within the house, toke the keyes with him, commanding them to defend the place till his returne, which should be on the morrow, with munition and releefe: and this done, he and his pickers prickt (as saith maister Patten) quite their waies.

Anderwiike pertained to the lord of Hambleton, and was kept by his son and heire, whome of custome they call the maister of Hambleton, & eight more gentlemen for the most part, as was reported. The lord protectoz at his comming nigh, sent vnto both these places, which vpon summons refusing to render, were freight assailed; Thoznton by batterie of sone great peeces of ordinance, and certeine of sir Peter Helwas hackbutters, and Anderwiike by a sort of the same hackbutters, who so well bestirred them, that where these keepers had rammed by their oute doores, cloied and stopt their staires within, and kept themselves for defense of their house about the battlements, the hackbutters got in, and fired them vnderneath, whereby being greatlie troubled with smoke, they cried for mercie, which the lord protectoz meant to grant them; but yet the messenger came, the hackbutters were got vp to them, & killed right of them aloft: one leapt ouer the walles, and running more than a furlong, was after slaine without in a water.

All this while at Thoznton was the assault on the English part, and the defense by them within stoutlie continued: but at length when they perceived in what danger they stood, and how little able they were to helpe themselves, or to anniole the assailants, they pluckt in a banner which they had hong forth, in token of defiance, and put forth a white linnen clout tied to a stickes end, crying all with one tune for mercie: but hauing answer by the whole voices of the assailers that they were traitors, and that it was too late, they pluckt in their stickes, and set vp againe their banner of defiance, and shot off, hurled stones, & did what else they could with great courage of their side, & small hurt of the assailants. Wherefore perceiving that they could not long keepe out, being on the one side battered, and mined on the other, kept in with hackbutters on ech side, and some of the Englishmen being got into the house below, for they hauing shot vp themselves also in the highest of their house, pluckt in againe their banner, and cried estones for mercie, but being answered generallie by the assailants, that they should neuer loke for it, they fell to make this petition, that if they should needs die, they might rather suffer by hanging, and so reconcile themselves to God, than to die in malice with so great danger of their soules.

This sute was so furthered to the dukes grace by sir Miles Partridge that was nere at hand when they made this sute, that it was granted; and they comming forth, humbled themselves, and without more hurt they were but commanded to the prison of marshall, who kept them for a time, and were after released. The house was shortly after so blowen with powder, that more than the one halfe of it fell freight downe to dust and rubbish, the rest stood all to shaken with rifts and chinks. Anderwiike also was burned, and all the houses of office, and stacks of corne about them both. While this was in doing the dukes grace, in turning but about, saw the fall of Dunglas, which likewise was undermined and blowen vp with powder.

This done, about none the armie marched, and passing by Dunbar, the castell sent them diuerse shots of artillerie, but all in vaine. The Scotish pickers shewed themselves in the field with proffer of skirmish, but to no great purpose, one of them being killed with a shot of one of Barteuils men an hackbutter on horsebacke. The armie hauing marched that daie a ten miles, lodged at night nere vnto Tantallon, and had a blind alarum. Marching the next morning a two miles, they came to a river called Lin, where there is a stone brydge, named Lin-ton brydge of a towne thereby on the right hand as the armie marched, and standing eastward vpon the same river: the horsemen and carriages passed thorough the water, for it was not verie deepe, and the footmen ouer the brydge. The passage was frecht for an armie, and therefore the longer in setting ouer.

Wales castle.

Beyond this bridge about a mile westward upon the same river, on the south side standeth a proper castle called Wales, pertaining to the earle of Northwell, but kept as then by the gouernours appointment, who held the earle in prison. Out of this castle as the lord protector passed forward in following the foreward, there were roundlie shot off (but without hurt) six or seven peeces, the which before that (though some of the armie had bene verie nigh) yet kept they all couert. In the meane time rose a thicke mist, which caused a great disorder in the reereward, by reason they could not see about them. The earle of Marlowe therefore doubting least the enimies, who had been picking vp and dooing noere to the armie, and offered skirmish the same morning, should now by occasion of the mist attempt some feat to the annoyance of the Englishmen in their passage, his lordship himselfe scant with firtene horses (whereof Bartenill, and John de Ribaud Frenchmen were two, seven or eight light horsemen more, and the rest being his owne seruants) returned toward the passage to see the arrate againe.

A subtle place of the Scots.

The Scottish horsemen perceiuing our horsemen to haue passed on before, and thinking (as the truth was) that some capitaine of honor did staie for the looking to the order of this reereward, they keeping the south side of the river, did call ouer to some of the armie, to know whether there were anie noble man nigh there? They were asked whie they asked? One of them answered, that he was such a one whose name the Englishmen knew to be honorable among the Scots, and would come in to the dukes grace, so that he might be sure to come in safetie. Some young soldiers nothing suspecting the craftie falshood of the Scots, told him that the earle of Marlowe was nigh there, by whose tuition, he should be safetie brought to my lord protectors presence. They had caud their lesson & fell to their practice, which was this. Hauiug come ouer the water, in the waie as the earle should passe, they had cotoched about two hundred of their pickers, and had sent forth bridle to search where my lord was, whome when they had found, part of them pickt verie nigh, whome ten or twelue of the earles small companie did boldlie incounter, and droue them well nigh home to their ambush, fleeing perchance not so much for feare as for falshood, to bring them within their danger. But hereby informed that the earle was so nigh, they sent out a bigger number, and kept the rest more secret upon this purpose, that they might either by a plaine onset distresse him, or else by fainting of sight to haue trained him within danger of their ambush. And thus instructed, they came picking toward his lordship apase. Whie (quoth he) & wilt not these knaues be ruled? Giue me my staffe. The which then with so valiant a courage he charged at one (as it was thought) Wandie Car, a capitaine among them, that he did not onelie compell Car to turne, and himselfe chased him aboue twelue score together, all the waie at the speares point, so that if Cars horse had not bene exceeding good and wight, his lordship had surely run him through in this race, but also with his little band caused all the rest to flee amaine. After whome as Henrie Lane, a gentle man of the said earles, and one of his companie did fiercelie pursue foure or fise Scots, suddenlie turned, and set vpon him, and though they did not altogether escape his hands free, yet by belwing and mangling his head, bodie, and manie places else, they did so cruelie intreat him, as if rescue had not come the sooner, they had slaine him outright. Here was Bartenill run at sideling, and hurt in the buttocke, and one of the Englishmen slaine: of Scots againe none slaine, but three taken prisoners, wherof one was Richard Martwell, and hurt in the thigh, who had bene long in England not long before, and had receiued right manie benefits, both of the late kings liberalitie, and of the earle of Marlowe, and of manie other nobles and gentlemen in the court beside.

But to conclude, if the earle of Marlowe had not thus valiantlie incountered them, per they could haue warned their ambush how weaklie he was guarded, he had bene beset round about by them ver he could haue bin aware of them, or rescued of other. Whereas hereby his lordship vndoubtedly shewed his wanted valor, saved his companie, and discerned the enimie. As Bartenill the Frenchman that daie had right honestlie serued, so did the lords right honorable acquite it: for the earle of Marlowe did get him a furlong, and dressed he was, straight after laid and conueied in the lord protectors owne chariot. The rest that were hurt were here also dyed, 20 Scots and others.

The armie hauiug marched that same daie nine miles, incamped at night by a towne standing on the frith called Lang Raddrie. The next morning being thursdaie the eight of September, in time of the dislodging of the English, signe was made to some of the ships (whereof the most part and chieftest laie a ten or twelue miles in the forth, beyond vs, ouer against Lielh & Edenborough) that the lord admerall should come a shore, to speake with the lord protector. In the meane time, somewhat earlie as our gallie was comming toward vs, about a mile and more beyond our campe, the Scots were verie busie, wafting here on thore toward them with a banner of saint George that they had, so to traine them to come on land there: but the earle of Marlowe some disappointed the policie, for making toward that place where the lord admerall should come on thore, the Englishmen on the water by the sight of his presence, did some discern their friends from their foes.

The lord admerall hereby came to land, and riding backe with the earle vnto the lord protector, order was taken, that the great ships should remoue from before Lielh, and come to lie before Spunkelborough, and the Scottish campe which laie there in field already assembled, to resist the English power that marched thus towards them. The smaller vessels that were vittellers were appointed to lie neerer to the armie. The lord admerall hereby, being returned to the water, & the armie marching onward a mile or two, there appeared aloft on a hill, that laie longwise east and west, and on the south side of them, vpon a six hundred of their horsemen pickers, wherof some within a sight shot, streake against the Englishmen, they tooke themselves vpon the same hill, & more further off.

Toward these, ouer a small bridge that laie ouer a little riuer there, verie hardlie did ride about a dozen haquebutters on horsebacke, and held them at baie so nise to their noses, that whether it were by the goodnesse of the same haquebutters, or the badnesse of them, the Scots did not onelie not come dooing to them, but also verie courteously gaue place, and fled to their fellowes. The armie went on, but so much the slower, because the waie was somewhat narrow, by meanes of the forth on the one side, and certaine marshes on the other. The Scots kept alwaies pale with them, till there were shot off two field peeces twise, wherewith there was a man killed, and the leg of one of their horses stricken off, which caused them to withdraw, so that the Englishmen saw no more of them, till they came to the place where they meant to incampe, for there they shewed themselves againe aloft on the fore remembred hill, standing standing as it were to view and take muster of the armie; but when the lord Greie made towards them, minding to know their commission, they wisely went their waie, and would not once abide the reasoning.

Little else was done that daie, but that George ferrers, one of the duke of Summersets gentlemen, and one of the commissioners of the cariages in the armie, perceiving where certaine Scots were got into a caue vnder the earth, stopping some of the vents, and setting fire on the other, smothered them to death, as was thought it could be none other, by consequence of the smoke breaking forth at some of the other vents. The English ships also taking their leane from before Lieth, with a scoe of shot or more, and as they came by saluting the Scots in their campe also, with as manie, came and laie according to appointment. The armie hauing marched this daie about a fine miles, incamped at Salt Preston by the forth. On Friday the ninth of September, the English armie lieng in sight & view of the Sco-tish campe, that laie two miles or therabouts from them, had the forth on the north, and the hill last remembered on the south, the west end whereof is called Fandide Blate, on the which standeth a forie castell, and halfe a scoe houses of like worthinesse by it, and had westward before the Englishmen, the Scots li-eng in campe. About a mile from the English campe were the Scots horsemen verie busie, prank-ing vp and downe, & faine would haue bene a counsell with the Englishmens doings; who againe, bi-cause the Scots seemed to sit to receiue them, did diligentlie prepare that they might come go to them, and therefore kept within their campe all that daie.

The lord protector and the counsell sitting in consultation, the capteines and officers providing their bards, store of vittels, and furniture of weapons, for furthurance whereof our vessels of munition and vittels were here already come to the shore. The Scots continued their brauerie on the hill, the which the Englishmen not being so well able to beare, made out a band of light horsemen, and a troupe of demilances to backe them: the Englishmen and strangers that serued among them, got vp aloft on the hill, and thereby of euen ground with the enimie rode straight toward them with good speed and order, whom at the first the Scots did boldly countenance and abide: but after, when they perceived that our men would needs come forward, they began to pierce, and would faine haue bene gone, yet they had told their errand. But the Englishmen hasted so speedilie after, that euen straight they were at their elbowes, and did so frontlie then besire them, that what in the onset at the first, and after in the chase, which lasted a thre miles welnie to as far as the furthest of their campe on the south side, they had killed of the Scots within a thre houres, aboue the number of thirtene hundred, and taken the maister of Hume, the lords Humes sonne and heire, two priests and six gentlemen, whereof one by sir Jaques Granado, and all vpon the highest and welniere might of the hill toward the Scots, within the full sight of their whole campe.

On the English part one Spanishe haquebutter hurt, and taken sir Rafe Bulmer knight, Thomas Sommer marshall of Berwik, and Robert Crouch, all capteins of severall bands of the English light horsemen, and men of right good courage and appointed service, & at this time distressed by their owne too much forwardnesse, and not by the enimies force.
To conclude, of sixtene hundred horsemen for hire much, and five hundred footmen to lie close in ambush, and to be readie at need, which came that morning out of their campe, there returned not home a bone seven hundred, and diuerse of those sore hurt, and among other, the lord Hume himselfe, for he in the flight, had a fall from his horse, and burst the ca-nell bone of his necke, that he was faine to be caried straight to Edenborough, and finallye there departed this life of that hurt. So that it is true which C. O. saith, that in this skirmish manie a good rider was dismounted, their horses with emptye saddles and loose bridles running by hill and downe dale, as if they had bene sturke mad, and to conclude (saith he) — equi lapsi sunt in hostia

Tergo alius summo tellurem vertice pulsum.

Then after this, the lord protector, and the earle of Warwicke, and other of the counsell, with a small gard, mounting by the hill where the slaughter had bene made, about halfe a mile southward from the Scottish campe, toke full view therof, the plot where they laie, so chosen for strength, as in all their coun-trie (some thought) not a better, saue on the south by a great marish, & on the north by the forth, which side they fenced with two field peeces, and certaine haque-butteres a croke, lieng vnder a turffe wall, Eden-borough on the west at their backes, and eastward betwixt the Englishmen and them strongly defended by the course of a riuer called Esk, running north into the forth, which as it was not verie deepe of water, so were the bankes of it so high and steepe, as a small sort of resistants might haue bene able to keepe downe a great number of commers vp.
About a twelue scoe from the forth, ouer the same riuer, is there a stone bridge, which they did keepe also well garded with ordinance.

When the lord protector, and the earle of Warwicke had viewed euerie thing, as they thought expedient, they returned home towards their campe, alongst before the campe of the enimies, within lesse than two slight shoots, entring into a lane of thirtie foot broad, fenced on either side with a wall of turffe, an ell of heighth. The Scots did often shot at them in the waie as they passed thus homewards, without hurt, saving the killing of an horse among thre hundred, the rider escaping else harmlesse. And as the dukes grace was passed welnie halfe the waie homewards, a Scottish herald with a cote of his princes armes vpon him (as the manner is) and with him a trumpetter, ouertooke them.

The herald declaring this message to the lord protector, pretended to come from the gouernour, to inquire of prisoners taken, and therewith to proffer honest conditions of peace. And after he had told his tale, then began the trumpetter, and said, how he was sent from the earle of Huntley: *My lord my maister (saith he) hath willed me to shew you grace, that because this matter maie be the sooner ended, and with lesse hurt, he will fight with your grace for the whole quarell, twentie to twentie, ten to ten, or else himselfe alone with your grace man to man.
The lord protector hauing kept with him the lord lietenant, had heard them both throughe, and then in answering, spake somewhat with louder voice, than they had done their messages. Wherevpon they that were the riders by, thinking that his grace would haue it no secret, were somewhat the bolder to come nearer, the words whereof were vttered so expeditelie with honour, and so honourable with expedition, that the standers by were moued to doubt whether they might rather note in them the promptnesse of a singular prudence, or the boldnesse of a noble courage: and they were thus.*

Your gouernour maie know, that the speciall cause of our coming hither was not to fight, but for the thing that should be the waie, both of vs and you. For God we take to record, we mind no more hurt to the realme of Scotland, than we do to the realme of England, and therefore our quarell being as for peace, he hath refused such conditions at our hands, as we will neuer proffer againe: and therefore let him looke for none, till this waie we make it: and thou trumpet, saie to thy maister, he saith to lacke wit so to make this chalenge to me, being of such estate, by the sufferance of God, as to haue so weightie a charge of so peticious a ieiwell, the gou-ernance of a kings person, & then the protection of all his realms, whereby in this case I haue no power of my selfe, which if I had, as I am true gentleman, it should be the first bargain I would make: but there is a great sort amongst vs his equals, to whom hee might haue made this chalenge without refusal.

The earle of Warwikes request and message to the earle of Huntley.

Then quoth the lord lieutenant to them both, He sheweth his small wit to make this chalenge to my lords grace, and he so meane, but if his grace will giue me leaue, I shall receiue it: and trumpet bring me word thy maister will so do, and thou shalt haue of me an hundred crownes. Saie (quoth my lords grace) the earle of Huntley is not meet in estate with you, my lord: but herald saie to the gouernor, and him also, that we haue bene a good season in this countrie, and are here now but with a sober companie, and they a great number, and if they will meet vs in field, they shall be satisfied with fighting inough: and herald bring me word if they will so do, and by my honour I will giue the a thousand crownes. He haue a proud sort among you, but I trust to see your pride abated shortly, and of the erle Huntleys too: This he is a glorious young gentleman.

 war touching heralds violated.

This said, the earle of Warwike continued his request, that he might receiue this chalenge: but the lord protector would in no wise grant it. These messengers had their answers, and therewith leave to depart. The Scots in midst of this message, doing contrarie to the order of warre, which as it granteth safetie to heralds and trumpeters, to passe betwixt armie and armie: so during the time of anie such message, as this was, hostilitie on both parts ought to cease, but it skilled not. On the morow after, they had their guns taken from them (as saith maister Patten) and put into their hands that could vse them with more good manner. But now concerning the message of the herald, it was thought that he was sent therewith, not for that it was beleued of them, that it would be accepted; but rather that whilst he was doing his errand, he might surueile the English powder: or else for that upon refusal of the offer, they might vse the victorie (whereof they accounted themselues assured) with more crueltie.

The doubt
 of the Scots.

If nothing they doubted more, than least the Englishmen would haue bene gone backe, and gotten to the water, before they should haue encountered them, and therefore they had appointed to haue giuen the English armie a canifado in the night before the daie of the battell: but peradventure, understanding that the Englishmen had warning of their intention, and were provided for them if they had come, they staied and came not at all. But in the morning, they were by verie timelie, and being put in order of battell, they marched straight towards the English campe, against whom then, though they saw the English horsemen readilie to make: yet could not be persuaded, but that it was for a policie to staie them, till the English footmen and carriages might fullie be bestowed a shipboard, and that for the same purpose the English ships were come backe from before Lich.

Ordinance
 plaied against the enimie.

In the night of this daie, the dukes grace appointed, that earlie in the next morning part of the ordinance should be planted in the lane (whereof men tion before is made) vnder the turfe of the wall, next to their campe, and some also to be set vpon the hill nie to Andzelske church afore remembred: and this to the intent we should with our shot cause them ether wholie to remoue their campe, or else much to annoie them in that place where they laie. It was not the least of the Englishmens meaning also to win from them certeine of their ordinance, that laie nereest vnto this church. And herewith the same moning, being the tenth of September, and Saturday, somewhat before eight of the clocke, the English armie dislodged, & marched straight toward the church of Andzelske, as well for intent to haue incamped nere the same, as for placing their ordinance, and other considerations afore remembred.

The Scots either for feare of the Englishmens departing, or hope of their spolling, were out of their campe comming toward them, passed the riuer, gathered in arais, and well nere at this church, per the Englishmen were halfe waie to it, so quite disappointing the Englishmens purpose. Which at the first seemed verie strange in their eies, as altogether beside their expectation, as they that thought they would neuer haue forsaken their strength, to meet them in the field. But after it was knowen that they did not onelie thus purpose to do, but also to haue assailed them in their campe, as they laie if they had not bene stirring the timelier, and hauing caused all their tents to be let flat downe to the ground, per they came out, because none should lie lurking behind them in their campe, and as well the nobles as other, leauing their horses behind them (except such as were appointed to serue on horsebacke) marched on with their souldiours on foot.

They came speedilie forwards on both sides, the one till then no whit aware of the others intent: but the Scots indeed with a rounder pale betwene two hillocks, betwixt the Englishmen and the church, mustered somewhat by in, at whome as they staied, the English galle shot off, & slue the maister of Grefme, with fise and twentie others nere by him, and therewith so skard foure thousand Irish archers, brought by the earle of Argile, that where (as it was said) they should haue bene a wing to the foreward, they could neuer after be made to come forward. Herby on did their armie hastilie remoue, & from thence be-clining southward, toke their direct waie toward Faulside braie. Of this, sir Rafe Blane, lieutenant of all the English horsemen, first of all, or with the first, noting it, quicklie aduertised the lord protector, who thereby did readilie conceiue their meaning, which was to win the hill, and thereby the wind and sunne, the gaine of which three things (as is thought) whether partie in fight of battell can hap to obtaine, hath his force doubled against his enimie.

In all this enterpasse, they used for haste so litte the helpe of horse, that they plucked forth their ordinance by draught of men, which at that present began frelie to shot off towards the English armie, whereby it was perceiued they ment more than a skirmish. Herewith euerie man began to applie him selfe in his charge and dutie which he had to do. And herewith the lord protector, and other of the counsell on horsebacke as they were, fell straight in consultation. The sharpnesse of whose circumspect wis-doms, as it quicklie espied out the enimies intents, so did it among other things promptlie prouide therin remedie, to prevent them (as needfull it was) for the time asked no leisure.

Their deuise was, that the lord Greie of Wilton, marshall of the armie, with his band of Ballesters, and with the lord protectors band, and the earle of Warwikes, all to the number of eightene hundred horsemen, on the left hand on the east halfe, and sir Rafe

The lord

the sudden,

Consultation
of the English lords on
back.

Kase Wane, with sir Thomas Darcie capteine of the penfioners, and men of armes, and the lord Jfitz-waters, with his band of demilances, all to the number of fiftene hundred, to be readie and euen with the lord marshall, on the west halfe. And thus all these together afoze to incounter the enemies afront, whereby either to breake their arae, and that waie to weaken their potwer by disorder, or at the least to stop them of their gate, and force them to fraie, while the fore-ward might wholie haue the hill side, and the battell and rere-ward be placed in grounds next that in order, and best for aduantage. And after this, that the same horsemen should retire vp to the hill side to come downe in order afresh, and inest them on both sides, whilest the foot battels should occupie them in fight afront.

Which enterprife, though it seemed right dangerous to the assailers, yet was it not more wiselie denied by the counsell, than valiantlie and willinglie executed of the lord marshall, & the others. For euen there taking their leaues of the counsell, the said lord marshall requiring onelie, that if it went not well with him, the dukes grace would be good to his wife & children, he said he would meet those Scots, and so with their bands the foresaid capteins took their waie, and made towards the enimie. By this time were the fore-wards on either part aduanced within two sight shots in lumber. The Scots came on so fast, that it was thought of the most part of the Englishmen, they were rather horsemen than footmen. The Englishmen againe were led the more with speed, to thew that they were as willing as the Scots to trie the battell. The master of the ordinance to their great aduantage plucked vp the hill at that instant certeine peeces, and some after planted two or three canons of them welnigh upon the top there, whereby hauing so much the helpe of the hill, he might ouer the Englishmens heads shot niest at the enimie. As the lord protector had so circumspectie taken order for the arae and station of the armie, and for the execution of euerie mans office beside, he being perfectlie appointed in safre armour, accompanied onelie with sir Thomas Chaloner knight, one of the clerkes of the kings priuie counsell, got him to the hight of the hill, to carrie by the ordinance, where he might best surueie the whole field, and succour with aid where most he saw need, and also by his presence to be a defense to the thing that stood weakest in place, and also most in daunger, the which how much it stood in stead, anon ye shall heare further.

As he was halfe vp the hill, the erle of Warwicke was ware the enimies were all at a sudden fraie, and stood still a good while, so that it seemed to him that they perceiving now their owne follie in leauing their ground of aduantage, had no will to come anie further forward, but gladlie would haue bin whence they came. The reasons were these. First because at that time, beside the full muster of the English footmen, of whome they thought there had bene none there in field, but all to haue bene either thipt, or a shypping; then they saw plaine that the Englishmen were sure to haue the gaine of the hill, and they the ground of disaduantage out of their hold, and put from their hope: and hereto, for that their herald gaue the lord protector no warning, the which by him (if they had ment to fight it out) who would not haue presumed that for the estimation of their honoz, they would little haue trucke to haue sent; and he againe, and it had bene but for his thousand crotons, would right gladlie haue brought: Well yet how so euer their meaning changed, finally considering belike the state they stood in, that as they had left their strength to some, so now to be to late to repent, vp-on a change of countenance, they made hastilie forward againe, and as it seemed) with no lesse stoutnesse of courage, than stronglie in order, whose manner, armour, weapon, and order in fight in those daies and also before (though now somewhat changed as well as amongst other nations) was as insueth.

Harquebutters had they few, and appointed their fight most commonlie alwaies on foot. They used to come to the field well furnished, with sacke and skull, dagger, buckler, and swords, all notable brode and thin, of exceeding good temper, and vniuersallie so made to slice, as hard it is to denie the better: hereto euerie man his pike, and a great hercher wrapped twisse or thysle about his necke, not for cold but for cutting. In their arae toward the joining with the enimie, they thrust so nie in the fore-ranke, shoulder to shoul-der, together with their pikes in both hands, streight afoze them, and their followers in that order so hard at their backs, lateng their pikes ouer their foregoers shoulders, that if they do assaile vn-disseuered, no force can well withstand them.

Standing at defense, they thrust shoulders like, wise so nie together, the fore-ranks well nie to kneeling scope low before, for their fellows behind, holding their pikes in both hands, and there with in their left their bucklers, the one end of their pike against their right foot, the other against the enimie breast high, their followers crossing their pike points with them before, and thus each with other, so nie as place and space will suffer, through the whole rankes so thicke, that as easilie shall a bare finger pearce through the skin of an anerie hedgehog, as anie in-counter the front of their pikes. Thus provided, they (I meane the Scots) addressed themselves to incounter inflamed with a heat of furious hatred, but not advised whether the cause were iust or vniust, for the which they were vp in armes: which foolish madnesse the poet pointeth at, and painteth out, sayeng:

Arma Scotus poscit, valida contendere vi vult,

Is nec habet pensū sit id equum an profusū iniquum.

The lord marshall notwithstanding, whome no danger detracted from doing his enterprife, with the companie and order afoze appointed, came full in their faces from the hill side towards them. Herewith waxed it verie hot on both sides, with pittifull cries, horrible roze, and terrible thundering of guns, beside the daie darkened aboue head with smoke of the artillerie, the sight and apperance of the enimie euen at hand before, the danger of death on euerie side else, the bullets, pellets and arrowes flieng each where so thicke, and so uncerteinlie lighting, that no where was there anie suretie of safetie, euerie man stricken with a dreadfull feare, not so much perchance of death, as of hurt, which things though they were but certeine to some, yet doubted of all, affered cruelitie at the enimies hands, without hope of mercie, death to sie, and danger to fight.

The whole face of the field on both sides upon this point of joining, both to the eie and to the eare so heanie, so deadlie, lamentable, furious, outragious, terrible, confuse, and so quite against the quiet nature of man, as if to the nobilitie the regard of their honor and fame, to the knights and capteines the estimation of their worship and honestie, and general-lie to them all the naturall motion of bounden du-tie, their owne safetie, hope of victorie, and the fauour of God, that they trusted upon for the equitie of their quarrell, had not bene a more vehement cause of courage, than the danger of death was cause of feare, the verie horrour of the thing had bene able to haue made anie man to forget both prouesse and policie.
But the lord marshall and the others, with vntrent mind and courage warlike and quicklie continued their course towards them. The enimies were in a fallow

fallow field, whereof the furrowes late sodelong toward the Englishmen, next to whome by the side of the same furrowes, & a stones cast from the Scots, was there a crosse ditch or slough, which the Englishmen must needs passe to come to them, wherein manie that could not leape ouer stucke fast, to no small danger of themselves, and some disorder of their fellows.

The order of the Scottish battels.

The enimie perceiuing the Englishmen fast to approach, disposed themselves to abide the hurt, and in this order stood still to receiue them. The earle of Angus next to the Englishmen in the Scottish foreward as capteine of the same, with an eight thousand men, and foure or fve peces of ordinance on his right hand, and a foure hundred horsemen on his left. Behind him westward, the gouernour with ten thousand Inland men (as they call them) the choicest soldiers counted of their countrie. And the earle of Huntlye in the rere-ward, twelue even with the battell on the left side with eight thousand. The foure thousand Irish archers as a wing to them both, last indeed in order, & first (as they said) that ran awaie. The battell and also the rere-ward were garded likewise with their ordinance according.

The Irish archers on a wing.

Edward Shelleie.

The lord John Greie.

Edward Shelleie lieutenant vnder the lord Greie of his band of Bulleyners, was the first that passed ouer the slough. The lord Greie himselfe next, with the lord John Greie and others in the foremost ranke, and so then after two or thre rankes of their former bands. But badlie yet could they make their race, by reason the furrowes late trauctie to their course. That notwithstanding, and though also they were nothing likelie well to be able thus afront to come within them to do them hurt, as well because the Scottishmens pikes were as long or longer than their staves, as also for that their horses were all naked without bardes, whereof though there were right manie among them, yet not one put on, for as much as at their comming forth in the morning, they looked for nothing lesse than for battell that daie: yet did those worthy gentlemen, the lord Greie of Wiltton, the lord John Greie, and maister Shelleie with the residue, so valiantlie & stronglie giue the charge vpon them, that whether it were by their prowesse or power, the left side of the enimies that his lordship did set vpon (though their order remained vnbroken) was yet compelled to swate a good waie backe, and giue ground largelie, and all the residue of them beside to stand much amazed.

The English horsemen repelled.

Beside this, as the Englishmen were twelue at their enimies, they stood verie bzaue and bzagging, shaking their pike points, & crieng: Come lounds, come here likes, come here likes; and such like rhytlike they used. But though (saith maister Patten) they meant but small humanitie, yet shewed they thereby much ciuilitie, both of faire plaie, to warne per they stroke, and of formall order, to chide per they fought. The English capteines that were behind, perceluing at eie, that both by the vneuenesse of the ground, by the sturdie order of the enimie, and for that their fellows were so nie and streight beside them, they were not able to anie aduantage to mainteine this onfet, did therefore according to the denise in that point appointed, turne themselves, and made a lost retire vp toward the hill againe. Howbeit, to confesse the truth, some of the number that knew not the prepened policie of the counsell in this case, made of a sober aduised retire, an hastie, rash, and vnaduised flight: howbeit, without capteine or standard, & vpon no cause of need, but of a mere vndiscretion and madnesse. A madnesse indeed, for first the Scots were not able to pursue, because they were fowmen; and then if they could, what hope by flight to farre from home in their enimies land, where was no place of refuge?

The valiant lord Greie, Edward Shelleie, little Dreston, Bampton, and Ferringham, Bulleyners, Katcliffe, the lord Fitzwaters brother, sir John Cleres sonne and heire, Kableie a gentleman of right commendable prowesse, Digs of Kent, Ellerker a pensioner, Segraue: of the duke of Summersets band, Standlie, Wodhouse, Constable, Hogill, Pozis, Denis, Arthur, and Atkinson, with other in the fore-ranke, not being able in this earnest assault, both to tend to their fight afoze, and to the re-10 tative behind: the Scots againe well considering hereby how weake they remained, caught courage afresh, ran sharplie forward vpon them, and without antie mercie, slue the most part of them that abode furthest in pzeale a fir more of Bulleyners, and other than before are named, in all to the number of twentie fir, and most part gentlemen. My lord Greie yet and my lord John Greie, and likewise my lord Edward Scimer (as some grace was) returned again; but neither all in safetie, nor without eui-dent markes they had bin there: for the lord Greie with a pike through the mouth was rased a long from the tip of the tong, and thrust that waie verie dangerouslie more than two inches in the necke; and the other two had their horses vnder them with swozds soze wounded. Like as also a little before his onfet, sir Thomas Darcie vpon his approach to the enimies, was striken glansing wise on the right side, with a bullet of one of their field peces, and thereby his bodie bzused with the bowing in of his armour, his sword hilts broken, and the forefinger of his right hand beaten flat. Euen so vpon the parting of this fraie, was sir Arthur Darcie slayt at with swozds, and so hurt vpon the wedding finger of his right hand also, as it was counted for the first part

About the same time, certeine of the Scots ran on hastily to the kings standard of the horsemen 40
(the which sir Andrew Flammoche bare) and lateng fast hold vpon the stasse therof, cried, A king, a king, that if both his strength, his hart, and his horse had not bene good, and here with some what aided at this pinch by sir Rafe Coppinger a pensioner, both he had bene slaine, and the standard lost, which the Scots neuertheless held so fast, that they brake and bare awaie the nether end of the stasse to the burrell, and intended so much to the gaine of the standard, that sir Andrew (as hap was) scaped home all safe, and else without hurt. At this businesse also the lord Fitzwaters, both earle of Suller and lord chamberleine to the queenes maiestie, capteine there of a number of demilances was vnhorst, but some mounted againe, scaped yet in gre at danger, and his horse all beaten. Hereat further were Caluerleie the standard-bearer of the men at armes, and Clement Paston a pensioner, thrust each of them into the leg with pikes, and Don Philip a Spaniard into the knee, o-uerse others maimed and hurt, and manie horses

By this time had the English foreward accord-dinglie gotten the full vantage of the hilles side, and in respect of their march stood sodelong toward the en-mie: who neuertheless were not able in all parts to stand full square in arrate: by reason that at the west end of them vpon their right hand, and toward the enimie, there was a square plot inclosed with turfes (as their maner of fensling in those parts, as well as in diuerse other is) one corner whereof did let the square of the same arrate. The battell in good order next them, but so as in continuance of arrate, of the English armie in this wise, they shewed themselves in maner to compasse in the Scots battells, that they should no waie escape them: but how little able they were to do it with powre and number, you may easilie coniecture.

Those horsemen that were so repelled, and in their coming backe disorderly brake their arraie from the residue, ran so hastily through the ranks of the English fore-ward as it stood, that it did both disorder manie, feared manie, and was a great inconvenience to the enimie. The worthy earle of Marwick, who had the guiding of this fore-ward, right valiantlie had conducted the same to their standing, and there did verie noblely encourage and comfort them with such cherefull words, offering to live and die among them, that doubtlesse his presence, demonstrating himselfe in such manlike sort, stood the whole company in great stead. Neither wanted there the chearefull diligence of those capitaines, with whome his honor was furnished in that fore-ward likewise to encourage their bandes, nor the worthy behaviour of other in the battell and reere-ward, everie one according to his calling, shewing such proofe of his du-tie, as the most part certeinlie desired to have their names registred in the kalender of fame, where no rust of cankered oblivion might fret out the remembrance of their commendable demeanours: and therefore if anie among them should haue shewed anie lacke of courage, their dyspalle had bene the more, with by others they saw such worthy example giuen, and were to stand upon this resolution, to haue harts hardened against all hazards in a iust cause, whereof they hoped almightie God had undertaken the managing and direction, unto whome they had committed the same; as the poet truelie saith:

Iusta Deo commissa Anglorum causa tonanti, Audaces animos fecit impavidosque pericli.

But sith there were so manie that did well, & therfore deserving a longer processe to be made of their high valiances shewed in that dangerous seruice, than this volume may permit, I will proceed to the battell. The Scots were somewhat disordered with their coming out about the slaughter of the Englishmen, the which they did so earnestlie follow, that they toke not one to mercie. The dukes grace placing himselfe (as ye haue heard) on the hill of Faur-side baie, and therewith perceiuing the great disorder of the stragling horsemen, that had in the retire broken arraie, hemmed them in from further straieng, whome sir Rafe Wane, and others of the captains sone after with great determitie brought into good order and arraie againe, and with all the rest of the strengths of the whole armie, by the policie of the lords, and diligence of everie capitaine and officer beside, were so fittlie and apillie applied in their feat, that where this repulse giuen by the enimie to the horsemen was doubted of manie, to turne to the whole losse of the field, the same was wrought and advanced according as it was deuised, to the great certeintrie of gaine and victorie. For first at this slough, where most of the horsemen had stood, sir Peter Hewtas capitaine of all the harquebutters a foot did verie valiantlie conduct & place a good number of his men in maner hard at the faces of the enimies, whereunto sir Peter Gamboa a Spaniard, capitaine of two hundred harquebutters, Spaniards, and Italians on horsebacke did readie bring his men also, who with the hot continuance of their shot in both parts, did so frontlie fraie the enimies, that they could not well come further forward: then the archers that marched in arraie on the right hand of the footmen, and next to the enimies, pricked them sharpelie with arrows as they stood. Therewith the master of the ordinance, to their great annoiance, did gall them with halfe shot and other out of the great ordinance, directlie from the hill top, and certein other gunners with their peeces a flanke from the reere-ward, most of the artillerie and mistue engines then who-lie thus at once, with great puissance and behemencie occupied about them, herewith the full sight of the Englishmen, all shadowed from them before by the horsemen, and dust raised, whome then they were ware in such order to be so nere upon them, and to this the perfect arraie of the horsemen againe com-ming couragiously to set on them afresh, miserable men, perceiuing themselves then all to late, how much to much they had ouerhot themselves, began suddenlie to thinke.

Their gouernour and other the principall capitaines that had brought them to the bargaine, toke their horses and fled amaine, which other perceiuing did quicklie follow, and with the foremost of that crue their Irishmen, and therewith turned all the whole rout, cast downe their weapons, ran out of their wards, off with their iackes, and with all that euer they might, betoke them to the race that their gover-nour began. The Englishmen at the first had found them (as that could scape so manie eles) and sharpe-lie and quicklie with an vnuerfall outcrie, they fled, they fled, pursued after in chase so egerlie, and with such fiercenesse, that they ouertooke manie, and sparred indeed but few, that when they were once turned, it was a wonder to see how sore, and in how sundrye sorts they were scattered. The place they stood on like a wood of stauces strewed on the ground, as run-thes in a chamber, unpasseable (they laie so thicke) for either horse or man. Here at the first had they let fall all their pikes, and after that, euerie where scattered swords, bucklers, daggers, iackes, and all things else that was of anie weight, or might be any let to their course: which course among them, three waies speciallie they made, some along the sands by the ffrith towards Litch, some straight towards Eddenburgh, whereof part through the parke there (in the walles whereof, though they be round about of sint stone, yet were there manie holes already made) and part of them by the high waie that leadeth along by the abbaye of Holierood house; and the residue and most part of them towards Wakest, which waie by means of the marish our horsemen were worst able to follow.

Sundrye shifts, some they shod, some soie, made they in their running: diuerse of them in their courses, as they were ware they were pursued but of one, would suddenlie start backe, and lath at the legs of the horse, or soine him in the bellie, and sometime did they reach at the rider also, whereby Clement Passon in the arme, and diuerse in other parts of their bodies otherwise in this chase were hurt. Some other laie flat in a furrow as they were dead, thereby past by of the Englishmen untouched, and (as was reported) the earle of Angus confessed he couched in that sort till his horse hap to be brought him.
Other some were found to skate in the ruer, courting downe his bodie under the root of some willow tree, with scant his nose above water for breath. Some for lightnesse cast a waie shoes and doublets, and ran in their shirts, and some were seene in this race all breathlesse to fall flat downe, and haue run themselues to death.

Before this, at the time of the onset, which the English horsemen gaue, there came eastward five hundred of the Scottish horsemen by along this Faur-side baie, straight upon the English ordinance and carriage. The lord protector (as ye haue heard) most speciallie for doubt hereof, placing himselfe by the same, caused a pece or two to be turned toward them, with a few shots whereof they were some tarned alld and fled to Wakef. But had they kept on their purpose, they were prouided for accordingly. For one parson Heble a chapleine of his graces, and two or three other, by and by discharged foure or five of the carts of munition, and therewith bestowed pikes, billes, bowes and arrowes, to as manie as came; so that of carters and other, there were some weaponed about a thousand, whome parson Heble and the other did verie hant somlie dispoise in arraie, and made a pretie muster.

the slaughter.

To retorne now after this notable stretuing of their footmens weapons, began a pittifull sight of the dead coxples, lieng disperfed abrode, some their legs off, some but hough, and lest lieng halfe dead, some thrust quite through the bodie, others their necks halfe a funder, manie their heads clouen, with other thousand kinds of killing. After that, and further in chase all for the most part killed, either in the head, or in the necke, for the horsemen could not well reach them lower with their swords. And thus with blood and slaughter of the enimie, this chase was continued five miles in length, westward from the place of their standing, which was in the fallow fields of Winderke, untill Edenburgh parke, and well nigh to the gates of the towne it selfe, and unto Liff, and in breadth nre foure miles, from the Forth sands by toward Wakef southwards: in all which space, the dead bodie laie as thicke as a man may note cattell grasing in a full replenished pasture. The riuer ran all red with blood (a signe of great slaughter) so that in the same chase were slaine to the number of ten thousand men, some saie about foure tene thousand, as I doe find by this report concerning the battell:

mens vow.

To conclude, considering the smallnesse of the Englishmens number, and shortnesse of the time (which was scant five houres, from one till well nigh six) the mortalitie was so great (as it was thought) the like afore time had not bene scene. One great cause why the Englishmen spared so few of them, was thought to be their tyrannous vow by them made (which the Englishmen certainly heard of) that whensoever they fought and ouercame, they would kill so manie, and spare so few: a sure proofe whereof they plainelie had shewed at the first onset given, where they killed all, and saved not a man that came within their danger. An other respect was, to revenge their great and cruell tyrannie shewed at Danlar hough, where they slue the lord Cuers, whome otherwise they might haue taken prisoner and saved, and cruellie killed as manie else of our men as came into their hands. An other occasion also was their armor among them so little differing, all clad alike in iacks covered with white leather, doublets of the same, or of fustian, and most comithonlie all white hosen, not one with either chaine, bryoch, ring, or garment of silke, unleffe chains of latten or rawne foure or five times along the upper stocks, or to the master Pattens words, the thighs of their hosen and doublet sleeves for cutting.

The apparell of the Scots.

This lacke for difference in apparell was the chiefest cause that so manie of their great men and gentlemen were killed, and so few saved. The outward shew, the resemblance or signe, whereby a stranger might discerne a poxe man from a gentleman, was not among them to be scene: as for words and godlie profers of great ransoms, were as rise in the mouths of the one as the other. And it came here to passe, that after at the examination and counting of the prisoners, there were found taken about twentie of their common countrie people, to one of their gentlemen, whome no man need to doubt the Englishmen had rather haue spared than the other, if they could haue scene anie difference betwene them in taking. And yet verelie considering the case as it shod, the Englishmen shewed more grace, and were more to mercie, than the respects before mentioned might seeme to haue required. For beside the earle of Huntlee, who in god armor appointed like a gentleman of anie among them, but could not then escape because he lacked his horse, and harned to be taken by sir Rafe Glane, and beside the lord of Peter, Hobbie Hambleton capteine of Dunbar, the master of Sanpole, the lord of Wilmings taken by John Wyen, a brother of the earle of Caills, and besides one Pontrell, taken by Cornelius comptroller of the ordnance in the armie, and one Camals an Irish gentleman, and beside manie other Scottish gentlemen more, taken by diuerse others.

The prisoners reckoned in the marshals booke were numbred to aboute fiftene hundred. Touching the slaughter, sure they killed not so manie, as for the time & oportunitie they might, if they had minded crueltie. For the lord protector moued with pitie at the sight of the dead bodie, and rather glad of victorie than desirous of slaughter, some after (by gelle) five of the clocke, said the standard of his horsemen at the furthest part of their campe westward, & caused the trumpets to sound a retreat. Whereat also sir Rafe Sadler treasurer (whose great diligence at that time, and readie forwardnesse in the chieft of the fraie before, did worthilie merit no small commendation) caused all the footmen to staie; and then with much trauell & great paine made them to be brought in some order againe: which was a thing not easilie done, by reason they all as then were somewhat busie in applieng their market, the spoile of the Scottish campe, where was found god prouision of white bread, ale, otencakes, otemeale, mutton, butter in pots, chese, and in diuerse tents god wine also, and in some tents among them was found some silver plate and chalices, which with god deuotion he maie be sure were plucked out of their cold clowts, and thrust into their warme bosoms.

The plot of their campe called Edmonston edge, nigh Silberton a place of the lord of Wilmings, halfe a mile beyond Hunsfelburgh, and foure miles on this side Edenburgh, occupied in largenesse with diuerse tents and tenticles, that stood in sundrie places out of square, about a miles compasse, wherein as the Englishmen upon the sound of the retreat somewhat assembled, they all with a loud and entree outcrie and hallowing, in signe of gladnesse and victorie, made an vniuersall noise and thotot, the shynesse whereof (as after was reported) was heard unto Edenburgh. It was a wonder to see, but (as they saie) make hands make light tooke, how some the dead bodie were stripped out of their garments stark naked, even from as farre as the chafe went, unto the place of the onset, whereby the personages of the enimies might by the waie easilie be viewed and considered, the which for the talnesse of their stature, cleannesse of skin, bignesse of bone, with due proportion in all parts was such, as the beholders, if they had not scene it, would not haue beleued that there had bene so many of that sort in all their countrie. Among them laie manie priests, and kirkmen, as they call them, of whome it was huted that there was a whole band of three or foure thousand, but it was found afterwards not to be altogether so.

Among other battinets, standards, and pennons, a banner of white sarsenet was found, vnder which it was said these kirkmen came, whereupon was painted a woman with hir haire about hir shoulders, kneeling before a crucifix, on hir right hand a church, after that written in great Romaine letters, Afflicta sponse ne obliuiscaris. It was said that this was the abbat of Dunfermlings banner, but whether it was his or the bishop of Dunkels, the gouernours brother, who (as was said) were both in the field, his meaning was, to signifie that the church made intercession to Christ hir husband, not now to forget hir his sponse, being at that time afflicted and persecuted by the Englishmen. But whose denisse soeuer it was, it maie seme, that this church comitting thus to battell, full appointed with weapon, and garded with such a sort of beacons to fight, howsoeuer in painting he had set hir out, a man might well thinke, that in condition, he had rather framed hir like a curst queane, that would plucke hir husband by the pate, except he had hir will; than like a meke sponse, that went about humbly by submission and prayer to de-siue hir husbands helpe, for redresse of thyngs amisse.

But now to leaue this prelat with his Afflicta spon- sa, and to make an end with this battell. There was upon fawrside braie, a little castell or pile, which was herie buile all the tyme of the battell, as anie of the Englishmen came nigh it, to shot at them, with such artillerie as they had; which was none other than of handguns and harquebuts, & of them not a dozen neither. A little hurt they did, but as they saw their fellowes in the field thus dyen and beaten abate before their faces, they plucked in their peeces, and couched themselves withur all mute: but by and by the house was set on fire, and they for their god wils burned and smothered withur. Thus (saith master Patten) throughe the fauour of Gods bountie, by the ballancie and policie of the lord protectour, by the forward indouour of all the nobles and counsell there beside, and by the willing diligence of euerie captaine, officer, and true subiect else, they most valiant-lie won the victorie ouer their enemies, of whome such slaughter was made in the field, as ye haue heard, amongst whome (as the prisoners reported) beside the lord Fleming, the lard of Loghestuare, the master of Greim, the master of Arkin, the master of Wglebie, the master of Auendale, the master of Rouen, and manie other of noble birth amongst them, there were of lards, lards sons, and other gentlemen thaire above twentie six hundred, & among the prisoners also there were manie gentlemen, spe-ciallie of name these: the earle of Huntleie lord chan-celloz of the realme, the lord of Desser, Hobbie Hamilton capteine of Dunbar, the master of San-pole, the lord of Wilmnes, and a brother of the earle of Camis. Two thousand by lurking and lying (as they had bene dead) scaped a waie in the night all maimed and hurt. Herewith of weapons and armor more was found than the Englishmen did boughtase to giue carriage for: & yet were there conueied thence by ship into England, of sacks specialie and swords, aboue thirtie thousand.

This night the Englishmen with great gladnesse and thanksgiuing to God (as god cause they had) about seauen of the clocke pitched their campe at Codgebuckling byate, beside Winkerlongh, and a mile beyond the place they camped at before. Now after the battell, among other questions, one was moued who killed the first man that daie in the field, the glorie whereof one Jeronimo an Italian would gladlie haue had, a gentleman sure that had serued that daie right valiantlie: howbeit it was after well tried, that Cutbert Musgraue, a gentleman of the earle of Marwicks, deserued the praise of killing the first enimie that died that daie, who right hardilie sue a guncr at his pece in the Scots foreward, per-euer they began anie whitt to turne. As for the oddi-narie soldiors, it was a pleasure vnto them to make rehearsall of their aduentures past, and to record that dangers (in maner inenitable) they had escaped, according to the poets report in that case, saying: res est meninisse laboris.

Præteriti iucunda: grauis effugisse periculum Summa recordari securamente voluptas.

The next daie being sundae the eleuenth of September, somewhat before none, the armie remoued, & marching along the forth side toward Lieth, about thre of the clocke in the after none pitched there field, a picke shot on this side that towne on the southeast halfe, somewhat shabolved from Orenburgh by a hill, but yet the most part of it laie within the full sight and shot of the castell there, and in distance somewhat aboue a quarter of a mile. The lord marshall, and the most part of the hostmen were bestowed and lodged in the towne of Lieth. The dukes grace, the lord lieutenant, and the rest of the armie in the campe. On tuesday the thirtenth of September, the smaller vessels of the English were burned Binkorne, and a towne of two standing on the north thore of the forth against Lieth.

In the after none the dukes grace roloed by the forth a six or seuen miles westward, as it runneth into the land, and toke in his waie an island there called saint Comins ins, which lieth foure miles betweene Lieth, and a good waie nearer the north thore than the south, yet not within a mile of the nereest. It is but halfe a mile about, and had in it an abbey, but the monks were gone: fresh water inough, and sore of conies, and is so naturallie strong, that but by one waie it can be entred; the plot whereof the lord protectour considering, did quicklie cast to haue it kept, whereby all traffike of merchandize, all commodities else comming by the forth into their land, and vnterlie the whole yle of the forth it selfe, with all the hauens vpon it, should quite be taken from them.

The next daie the lord protectour riding backe againe eastward, to view diuerse thyngs and places, toke Dakesh in his waie, where a house of George Douglas did stand, and comming somewhat nere it, he sent Summer set his herald with a trumpet to know who kept it, and whether the keepers would hold or yeld it to his grace: Answer was made, that there were thre score persons within, whome their maister lieng there saturday at night after the battell, did will that they, the house, and all that was in it, should be at his graces commandement. Whereupon the chieffest came, and in name of all the rest humbled himselfe to the dukes will. From thence his grace passed to the place where the battell had bene stricken, and so by Spuskilburgh returned backe to the campe.

On thursdaie being the fiftenth of this moneth, the lord Clinton high admerall, taking with him the gallie whereof Richard Boke was capteine, and four or fve other smaller vessels besides, as well appointed with munition and men, roloed by the forth a ten miles westward, to an haue towne standing on the south thore called Blacke Bessie, whereat toward the water side is a castell of a pretie strength; as nigh whereunto as the depth of the water would suffer, the Scots for safegard had laid the sparie Willooughbie, and the Anthoine of Beruicall, two tall ships, which with extreme iniurie they had stollen from the Englishmen before time, when no war was betwixt vs: with these laie there also an other large vessell called the Wolfe, and seauen more, wher-of part laden with merchandize. The lord Clinton and his companie with right hardie appoch, after a great conflict betwixt the castell and his vessels, by fine force won from them those thre ships of name, and burnt all the residue before their faces.

The firtenth of September the lord of Wilmston a Scotish gentleman came to the dukes grace from Doddid.

On saturday the seauententh of September, sir John Luttrell in the after none departed toward saint Comins, hauing with him an hundred harquebatters, fiftie pioneers, & two rowe barks well furnished with munition, and thre score and ten mariners to remaine there, & keepe that from inuasion of the enimies, against whom the English were so sharplie whetted, that when they came to encounter, they gaue proofe of their manhood by wounds and bloudshed, according to the report of C.O. in these verses following:

Anglorum pectora Mauris

Belliger exacuit, crescent ad vulnera vires.

Bothwell.

In the time whilste the armie laie thus in the campe betwene Lieth and Edenburgh, manie lords and gentlemen came in to the lord protector to requyre his protection, the which his grace to whome he thought good did grant. This daie came the earle of Bothwell to his grace, who hauing bene kept in prison by the gouernour, the night after the battell was set at libertie, and comming thus to the lord protector, was frienblie welcomed and interteined; and hauing this night supped with his grace, he departed.

Lieth burned.

Lieth was set on fire this saturday, whereas it was meant, that there should haue bene but one house onelie burnt, belonging to one Barton that had plaid a slipperie part with the lord protector. But the soldiors being set a worke to fire that house, fired all the rest. Sir great thys also that laie in the haue, which for their age and decaye were not so apt for use, were likewise set on fire and burnt. On saturday the eightenth of September, the lord protector (for considerations mouing him to pittie) hauing all this while spared Edenburgh from hurt, did so leaue it, but Lieth and the ships burning, sone after seauen of the clocke in the morning, caused the campe to dislodge, and as they were raised and on foot, the castell shot off a peale, with chambers hardie and all, of foure and twentie peces. Walling that daie seauen miles, they camped earlie for that night at Crainfon by a place of the lard of Wilmsons.

Crainfon.

The same morning the lord protector made master Andew Dupleie knight, brother to the earle of Marwick, dispatched my lord admerall and him by ships full fraught with men and munition toward the winning of an hold in the east side of Scotland called Broughticrag, which stood in such sort in the mouth of the riuer of Taie, as that being gotten, both Dundee, saint Johns towne, and diuerse other townes standing vpon the same riuer the best of the countrie in those parts, set vpon the Taie, should either become subiect vnto this hold, or else be compelled to forgo the whole vse of the riuer, for hauing anie thing comming in or outward. The lord admerall, and the said sir Andew sped themselves with such good successe and diligence in that enterprise, that on the wednesday following, being the one and twentieth of September, after certeine of their shot discharged against that castell, the same was yielded vnto them, the which sir Andew did then enter, and after kept, as capteine to his high please and commendation.

Lawder.

But now to the armie. On mondaie the nineteenth of September, they marched ten miles, and incamped a little on this side a market towne called Lawder. Here as they were settled in their lodging, the herald Porrie returned from the Scottish counsell, with the lard of Wilmson, and Rose their herald, who vpon their sute to the lord protector, obtained that sue of their counsell should haue his graces safe conduct, that at anie time and place within fiftene daies, during his abode in their countrie, or at Berwick, the same sue might come and commune with sue of the English counsell, touching matters in controuersie betwene them. Rose the herald departed earlie with his safe conduct, the campe raised, and that daie they went seauen miles till as far as Hume castell, where they camped on the west side of a rockie hill that they call Hare crag, standing about a mile westward from the castell.

Here they did so much by shewing that they ment indeed to win the castell by force, if otherwise they might not haue it, causing a certeine number of harquebatters vpon appointment before to beset the castell, and to watch that none should passe in or out, that in the end, the ladie of the house, and other that were within in charge with it, yielded it vp to the lord protector's hands: for the ladie doubting the losse of hir son that was prisoner with the Englishmen, hauing the first daie bene with the lord protector, and got respite till the next daie at none, in the meane time consulted with hir sonne, and other hir friends the keepers of the castell, returned at the time appointed the next daie, being the one and twentieth of that moneth, and made sute for a longer respite till eight of the clocke at night, and therewith safe conduct for Andew Hume hir second son, and John Hume lard of Colban Annots, a kinsman of hir husbands, capteins of this castell, to come and speake with his grace in the meane while. It was granted hir. Wherevpon these capteins about thre of the clocke came to the lord protector, and after other couenants (with long debating on both parts) agreed vpon, the said these capteins concluded to giue their assent to render the castell, so far forth as the rest of the keepers would therewith be contented, for two or thre within (said they) were also in charge with keeping it as well as they, for knowledge of whose minds the duke sent Summerfet his herald with this ladie to the castell vnto them; who as the herald had made them priuie to the articles, would faine haue had letsure for foure and twentie hours longer, to send to their lord to Edenburgh, where he laie hurt (as before you haue heard) and in danger of death, which followed of the fall that he caught at the first daies skirmish before the battell, to know his will and pleasure in this point of rendering vp the castell: but being wiselie and sharplie called vpon by the herald, they agreed to the couenants afore by their ladie and capteins concluded on: whereof part (as the sequelle shewed) were these. That they should depart thence the next daie in the morning by ten of the clocke with bag and baggage, as much as they could carie, leauing all munition and vittels behind them in the castell. Howbeit, to be assured of them, the lord protector providing ech waie to be readie for them, caused eight peces of ordinance fensed with baskets of earth to be planted on the southside toward the castell within power of batterie, and the harquebatters to continue their watch and ward.

On thursdaie morning being the two and twentieth of September, the lord Greie was appointed to receiue the rending of the castell into his hands, and sir Edward Dupleie now lord Dupleie after to be capteine there. They both departed to it, and at the time set Andew Hume, and foure other of the chiefest there with him came out, and yielding the castell, deliuered the keyes to the said lord Greie: his lordship causing the residue to come out then, sauing sir ship causing the residue to come out then, sauing sir in number seuentie and eight, entred the same with master Dupleie, and diuerse other gentlemen with him. He found there indifferent good store of vittels, and wine, & of ordinance two bassard culuerings, one fortie horsemen, and a hundred psoners: sir Rafe Sulmyr capteine of Rokeburgh thre hundred soldiers of bargubutters and others, and two hundred psoners. As things were thus concluded, and warning giuen ouer night on this wednesdaie being Michaelmasse euen, on the next morrow being Michaelmasse daie euerie man fell to packing apase and got them homewards, passing ouer the Tward there with some trouble and danger also, by reason of raine that latelic fell before, & had raised the streame, which being swift of it selfe, and the chanel vneuen in the bottome with great stoncs made the passage cumbersome, so that manie as well horsemen as footmen were in no small perill as they passed thorough, and one or two drowned, and manie carriages ouerthrowne, and in great hazzard of losing.

The duke of Summerset rode freight to Peter-castell, and thence homewards. The earle of War-wike, my lord Greie, and sir Rafe Sadler, with diuerse other rode to Berwike, to abide the comming of the Scottish commissioners. In the meane time of their tarieng there, the earle of Warwike made sir knights; sir Thomas Penill the lord Speills brother, sir Andzew Cobbet, sir Anthonie Strelleie, sir Arthur Panering, sir Richard Nerneie, sir John Bertheuille. After that the earle of Warwike had taried for the comming of the Scots the full terme of the appointment, which was untill the fourth of October, and perceiued they came not, the next daie he departed homewards.

Here ye haue to vnderstand also, that in part of the meane time whilst the duke of Summerlet was in doing of these exploits in Scotland (as ye haue heard rehearsed) the earle of Lenor, and the lord Wharton warden of the west marches, with an armie of fise thousand men, entred Scotland on that side, and first passing two miles after a dale and a nights defense, they wan the church of Annan, toke seuentie & two psoners keepers of the same, burnt the spoile for lumber of cariage, and caused the church to be blowne up with powder, passing thence a fiftene miles within the land, they wan the castell of Dilke, the which they left furnished with munition and men, and so returned. But of this ye shall find more in the historie of Scotland, by the sufferance of God, where we intreat of the doings there in this yeare.

Thus much haue I collected out of master Pattens booke, or rather exemplified the same, not much digressing from his owne words, except where I haue bin forced to abridge his worke in some places, withing to haue inserted the whole, if the purpose of this volume would haue so permitted, as well for the full vnderstanding of euerie particular point, by him remembred, as also for his pleasant and apt manner of penning the same. Whilst the lord protector was abroad thus in wars against the Scots, the lords of the councell that remained at home, chieselic by the god and diligent calling on and furtherance of the archbishop of Cantuarburie, and others of the cleargie, toke order for the aduancement of religion, causing the booke of homilies and the paraphrase of Erasmus to be set forth and had in churches.

At the comming backe of the lord protector from his iourneie into Scotland, the citizens of London determined to haue receiued him with great triumph: but he hearing thereof, forbade them in anie wise so to do: for (said he) if anie thing hath bene done to the honour of the realme, it was Gods doing, and therefore willed them to giue him the praise. Neuertheless the mayo and aldermen, with certeine of the commoners in their kueries and their hoods, hearing of his approach to the citie, the eight daie of October met him in Finnesburie field, where he toke each of them by the hand, and thanked them for their good wils. The lord mayo did ride with him till they came to the pound in Smithfield, where his grace left them, and rode to his house of Shene that night, and the next daie to the king to Hampton court. The fourth daie of Nouember began a parlement, called and holden at Westminster, which continued till the foure and twentieth of December next following, & was then proroged. In this parlement, all colleges, chanteries, and free chappels were giuen to the king, and the statute of the six articles was repealed, with diuerse others tending to the like end. Moreover, during this parlement visitors being appointed to visit in London, the firste of Nouember began to take downe the images in Pauls church: and shortly after all the images in euerie church, not onelic through London, but also throughout the whole realme, were pulled downe and defaced.

The lord protector and others of the councell, considering now in what sort they had got forthold in Scotland, by reason of such peeces as they had taken and fortified within the realme, did denie for the more suertie of those places, which they had already got, and the better to bying the rest of the countrie vnto reason, to haue some holds also more within the land, and therefore first they caused a fort to be builded at Lowder, where sir Hugh Willoughbie was appointed capteine with a convenient garri- son of soldiers to keepe it. Beside this, it was thought expedient to fortifie the towne of Haddington, where- upon the lord Greie lieutenant of the north parts, with sir Thomas Palmer, and sir Thomas Pol- croft, were appointed to go thither with a convenient number of men of warre & psoners to see that towne fenced with trenches, rampiers, and bulwarks, as should seeme to his lordship necessarie and behoue- full; who therefore entring into Scotland the eigh- teenth of Aprill, passed forth to Haddington, where he began to fortifie, and there remained to see the worke brought to some perfection. During his abode there, diuerse exploits were both valiantlie attempted and luckilie achieved by his martiall conduct and politike direction, as occasions offered might moue him, which I would gladly haue set downe at large, if I could haue come to the true vnderstanding thereof; but sith I cannot get the same, in such full manner as I haue wished, that yet which I haue learned by true report (as I take it) I haue thought good to impart to the reader.

The eight and twentieth of Maie, his lordship wan the castell of Pester, after he had beaten it right sore with terrible batterie of canon shot for the time it lasted, and therewith hauing made a reasonable breach for the soldiers to enter, they within yielded with condition to haue their liues saued: which the lord Greie was contented to grant to them all, one onelic excepted, who during the siege uttered vn- seemelic words of the king, abusing his maiesties name with vile and most opprobrious termes. They all comming forth of the castell in their shirts, hum- bled themselves to my lord Greie (as became them) and vpon strait examination who should be the rai- ler that was excepted out of the pardon, it was knowne to be one Petwton a Scot: but he to saue himselfe, put it to one Hamilton, and so these two gentlemen accusing one an other, the truth could not be decided otherwise than by a combat, which they required, and my lord Greie therevnto assented, and pronounced iudgement so to haue it tried: which he did the rather, because all men doe seeme resolute in the triall of truth (as in a verie good cause) by losse of life to gaine an endlesse name; as one saith:

At

At the appointed time they entered the lists, let by for that purpose in the market place of Hadington, without other apparell saving their doublets and hosen, weaponed with sword, buckler and dagger. At the first entrie into the lists, Hamilton kneeling downe, made his hartie prayer to God, that it might please him to giue victorie vnto the truth, with solemne protestation that he neuer vttered anie such words of king Edward of England, as his aduersarie charged him with. On the other side Pelton being troubled (as it seemed) with his false accusation, argued vnto the beholders his guiltie conscience. How were the sticklers in a readinesse, and the combattores with their weapons drawne fell to it, so that betwixt them were stricken fir or seven blowes right lustilie. But Hamilton being verie fiere and egre, vpon trust of his innocencie, constrained Pelton to giue ground almost to the end of the lists; and if he had giuen him to the end in deed, then by the law of armes he had wonne the victorie.

Pelton perceiving himselfe to be almost at point to be thus overcome, kept forwarde againe, and gaue Hamilton such a gash on the leg, that he was not able longer to stand, but fell therewith downe to the ground, and then Pelton falling on him, incon-tinentlie slue him with a dagger.

There were gentlemen present that knowing as they tolke it for certeine, how Pelton was the offender (although fortune had fauoured him in the combat) would gladlie haue ventured their liues against him man for man, if it might haue bene granted; but he chalenging the law of armes, had it granted by my lord Greie, who gaue him also his owne golwe beside his owne backe, and a chaine of gold which he then wore. Thus was he well rewarded how so euer he deserued: but he escaped not so, for afterwards as he was riding betwixt the borders of both the realms, he was slaine and cut in peces.
On the fourth of June, the towne of Waboth was burnt, and the castell wonne by force, where fourtene Scots were slaine, and thre hundred taken prisoners, amongst whome were these men of name; the maister of Hoxton, son in law to sir George Dotoglasse, the lord of Blengarnie, the lord of Medder-burne, and one Alexander Hume, a man of god reputation among them. The same daie the English hoisemen burnt all the mils round about Eberburgh, within the compasse of six miles on each side the towne. The seventh of June they burnt Haskelburgh. How after that my lord Greie had fortified Haddington, and furnished it with vittells, and munitions sufficient, the twelue of June he departed from thence homewards, leauing there in garrison about two thousand footmen, and five hundred hoisemen.

In this meane time, Henrie the French king succeeding his father Francis the first (who departed this life the last of March in the yere last past, to wit, 1547) made prouision of an armie, with a nauie of ships and gallies, to passe into Scotland to the aid of the quene and other of his faction. And first he had sent thither monsieur de la Chapelle de Biron, a gentleman of god account, to assist the gouernour with his aduise and counsell, which gouernour desirous to reouer the castell of Broughticrag, and loth to see it possessed by the Englishmen, raised a power of eight thousand men, and with eight peces of artillerie came before that fortreffe, meaning to win it by siege; but by the valiant prowes of sir Andrew Dudleie, and the hardie manhood of such English soldaers as serued there vnder him, the Scots were repelled, and driuen to leaue their siege with dishonor.

Yet not thus contented, the earle of Argile with an armie of his Irish Scots, of Hieland men (if I maie so call them) after this likewise came and belie-ged the place, but glad to take truce for a time with sir Andrew. Before the tearme of the same truce was expired, there came new succours to him, and thereupon the earle in the end was constrained to leaue his siege, and suffer the Englishmen to become maisters of a little hill not farre off from the castell, where afterwards they builded a fortreffe. But to returne to the French armie which was prepared to passe into Scotland, ye shall vnderstand that when their ships and prouisions were once readie, and the captains with their hands come downe to Brest in Britaine, where the nauie was rigged to receiue them, monsieur de Delle generall of all the armie, rehearsed to containe seven or eight thousand men, imbarked himselfe with all his people, and sailed forth on his iourne, till they arrived in the Forth, and there toke land at Lich the sixteenth of June.

Shortlie after, hauing got their great artillerie on land, and taken aduise with the lord gouernour and other of the Scottish nobilitie, whome they found at Edenburgh, how to proceed in prosecuting the war against the Englishmen, it was resolved that without delaye they shuld trie their forces about the re-uerie of Haddington, and go to besiege that towne, before they attempted anie further exploit. The go-uernour and other of the Scottish lords, hauing with them seven or eight hundred light hoisemen, offered to go with them, to the better aduancing forward of that enterprisse. Here vpon setting forward, and com-ming to Haskelburgh, the captains with a cer-teine number of hoisemen and footmen, as well of Scots as Frenchmen, were appointed to go before to view the said towne of Haddington. Upon their approch nere to the towne, there issued forth certeine Englishmen and Italians, that were of Tiberios band, which skirmished with them right stoutlie, till at length the Frenchmen and Scots retired backe to Lauret a little from Haskelburgh (where their armie incamped for that night) and the Englishmen and Italians returned backe to their fortreffe.

The next daie the Frenchmen and Scots with their whole power came before Haddington, where they were welcomed with a right sharpe and hot skirmish, in which was slaine with an harquebuse shot, one of the French captains called Willenuesue.
In the meane time whilst this skirmish continued, the Reinegrau with his Almans incamped himselfe on the one side of the towne, where the maister of the ordinance in the French armie, named monsieur Duno, caused trenches to be cast for the safe placing of the artillerie: the Englishmen still kept them occupied on each side the towne with skirmishing, to the annoiance of the aduersaries. So conclade, they incamped before the towne, cast trenches, lodged their ordinance, & laid their siege to the most advantage, so far as they might be suffered. Shortlie after that this siege was planted, there came to the aid of the French, the earle of Argile, with a great number of Irish Scots, and monsieur de la Chapelle brought an eight or nine hundred Scottish pioners, which began a trench on the left hand of the abbeie gate, and likewise a tranerle to couer their soldiers that should watch and ward, from danger of the shot out of the towne on that side.

The Englishmen with often issues gaue their aduersaries small rest, procuring manie hot skirmishes, as occasion serued. At one of the which skirmishes, Hiero Strozzi, colonell of thre ensignes of Italians, was stricken with a musket shot. Yet monsieur de Delle enforcing the siege to the bittermost of his power, caused one night with helpe of baskets filled with earth, six peces of artillerie to be planted in batterie fast at the towne side, which at the breake of daie began to shot off, and discharged that present daie three hundred and fortie shots. But after they perceived that they did little hurt to the fortifications of the towne in that place where this batterie was laid: the next night, the baskets & peeces of artillerie were removed lower, and not past three score paces from the ditches of the towne, where the next daie two hundred shots were discharged against the rampire. To conclude, they made such breaches in sundrie places for easie entrie into the towne, that it was greatlie marvelled wbie they durst not assaile to give a generall assault.

They lodged so neare within the verie ditches, that there were devised certeine plummetts of lead, tied with cords to a truncheon of a staffe, like to an handstaffe of a baile; wherewith the soldiers that watched and warded within the towne on the rampire, sue diuerse of the Frenchmen being their lodged within their ditches. Thus notwithstanding that the Frenchmen with their artillerie had broken downe the fortifications, so as the breaches were made verie reasonable and easie for them to enter; yet durst they not presume once to give the assault: for the Englishmen although their powder was spent, and that for want of matches they were constrained to teare their shirts, and use the same in stead of matches; yet they shewed themselves so valiant in defending the towne thus beaten & made weake on each hand, that there was no hope left to their aduersaries to win it of them by force. Although the French power on the one side, and eight thousand Scots on an other had so inuironed it, that the Englishmen within were dzien to most hard shifts, for want of things necessarie & requisite for their maintenance and defense of that towne.

But yet whilcst they remained thus in such distress and necessitie of things, two hundred Englishmen under the conduct of capteine Windham, Warham Seintleger, and John Car of Marke, found means one night to passe through all the watches on that side where the Scots laie, and entering the towne, and bringing with them great plenty of powder, and other necessities, greatlie relieved them within, & so encouraged them, that they seemed to make small account of their enemies forces. Whereupon within few daies after, the Scots (sue or six hundred light horsemen onelie excepted) brake vp their campe and returned home. After this, my lord Greie remaining at Berwike, ment to make a voyage himselfe in person for the reliefe of them that were thus besieged in Haddington. Now when all things were so farre in a readinesse as the next daie he ment to haue set forward, letters were brought that night from the court, willing him to perforce that seruice by a deputie, and to staie himselfe till the coming of the earle of Shrewesburie, who was appointed with an armie to come verie shortly as generall into those parties.

My lord Greie hereupon appointed in his stead sir Robert Bowes, and sir Thomas Palmer, to go thither, who coming to Dungalas, left there certeine bands of footmen, and with the horsemen being in number thirtene hundred (whereof seuen hundred lances were appointed under the charge of sir Thomas Palmer) they rode forward to accomplish their enterpryse: but the French capteins hauing knowledge of their coming, they provided the best they could to repell them, appointing foure ventins or ensignes of lanceknights to keepe a standing watch that night in the trenches, and the like number of French ensignes to watch about their campe. All the other of their bands were commanded to take rest, but yet with their armour on their backs.

Their generall monsieur de Delle himselfe, monsieur de Pailleraie admerall of their fleet, monsieur Dandelot cozenell of the French footmen, Piero Strozzi cozenell of the Italians, the Reinsgrau cozenell of the lanceknights, and all other the noble men and capteins of honour among them were all night long in armour, traueilling vp and downe, some on horsebacke, and some on foot, to visit the watches and scouts, set in places and waies by the which they suspected that the Englishmen ment to come. The lord Hume riding abroad to learne what he might of the Englishmens demeanour, earlie in the morning returned to the campe, and certified monsieur de Delle, that they were at hand. Where with were the Scottish and French horsemen that kept the scout called in, and monsieur Dandelot with great expedition ranged his battell of footmen in order, and so likewise did the Reinsgrau his Almans.

The Englishmen diuided into two bands came and shewed themselves in the sight of the towne, and charging such Scots and Frenchmen as came forth to encounter them, gave them the overthrow at two severall charges: but finallie presuming to farre vp on their good lucke thus chancing to them in the beginning, followed in chase those that fled before them, untill at length they were inclosed and shut up betwixt the French footmen on the one side, and the Almans on the other. And herewith the Scottish horsemen under the conduct of the lords Humes & Dune, & the French horsemen led by monsieur de Ctauges their generall, being assembled together effronces, after they had bene so repelled, were now ready to come forward againe: and perceiving their footmen so to haue inuironed the Englishmen, that they were not able to recover themselves, nor to get out of danger, but by disordering their ranks to take them to flight, followed amaine, so that those which escaped the Frenchmens hands were taken by the Scots that pursued them in chase, so that few were saved that were not either slaine or taken. My lord Greie lost threescore and twelue great horses, and an hundred geldings, with all the men upon them, armed with his lordships owne furniture, onelie foure or five of his men came home, of the which Thomas Cornwallis now growne porter to the quenes maiestie was one, and Robert Car elquier an other then page to my said lord Greie.

The vnadvised rashnesse of sir Thomas Palmer was thought to be the chiefe occasion of this distresse of those horsemen, who after they had done sufficientlie for that time, would needs haue them to give a new charge, and so were discomfited. After this overthrow and chase of our horsemen, the armie that was leuied to passe into Scotland was halfed forward with all speed possible: for although before the coming of the English horsemen, the French, by an aduertisement giuen that they meant to come, had plucked backe their great artillerie, and sent the same vnto Edinburgh, keeping onelie with them six field-pieces, and herewith removed their campe further off from the towne: yet by foresailing bitels and all other necessarie things from them within, they were dzien to such distresse, that they must of force haue left the towne to the enemies, if some power had not come within a while to remove the siege that laie thus to annoie them.

When therefore the armie was come to Newcastell, & the earle of Shrewesburie generall lieutenant of the same was there arrived, they passed forward to Berwike, and from thence marched straight towards Haddington. The number of the Englishmen and strangers was reported at the point of fiftene thousand, whereof three thousand were Almans brought

generall of
the armie.

der the conduct of a right worthy and expert chief taine, namede Conrad Hemming, commonlie called Costpenie. Beside this armie by land, there was also furnished forth a fleet by sea, under the conduct of the lord Clinton high admirall of England, and other capitaine of great experience in affaires and service by sea. This fleet was appointed to keepe course with the armie by land, that the one might be cuer in sight of the other. Monsieur de Delle aduertised of the cominge forward of this armie, durst not abide their cominge; but raised his field, and retired with his armie toward Edinburgh: howbeit they were no sooner dislodged, but that a great troupe of the English horsemen were got within sight of them, and coasted them all the waie as they marched for the space of seven or eight miles, in maner to as farre as Appleburgh, where the Frenchmen staid, and encamped in a place chosen forth to their most advantage.

The earle of Shrewsburie, and the lord Greie with the armie cominge unto Haddington, were instantly received of the capitaine and soldours within: where it might appeare how valiantlie they had defended that towne during the siege, being so destitute of all things necessarie for their reliefe; and the fortifications so weak, that if the noble provost of their worthy generall sir James Willford, and the incomparable manhood of the rest of the capitaine and soldours had not supplied all other wants, it was thought impossible that they should haue defended the place so long a time against such forces as had bene there imploied against them. But such was the bravado valour of that noble crue and garrison, that even the verie enemies themselves could not but praise high commendations to the capitaine and soldours for the hardie forwardnesse and manhood, which at all times they had found and tried in them at all points of service, when they came to deale with them. And verelie their same deserveth to be had in memorie for ever, not onelie for their worthy achieved exploits, done by force of hand, to the beating backe and repelling of the enemies, but also for their patient sustaining of hunger, thirst, continuall watching, nakednesse, sickness, and all other such calamities and miseries, as want of things necessarie for the reliefe and maintenance of mans life is wont to bring, to those that are inclosed in such wise by the enemie. All which extremities they were well content to susteine, so that it might turne to the benefit and renowne of their countrie, in comparison whereof they esteemed all things else verie vile and contemptible, were the same never so good, as the poet saith:

*Tantus amor patrie mortalia pectora tangit.
Natisque soli, pra quo bona cetera ferunt.*

The noble earle of Shrewsburie could not for-beare to see the teares, to understand and perceiue that such worthy soldours should suffer such great di-stresse, whose valiant hearts could not be quailed with any afflictions. Thus with mournfull imbra-cings intermixed with pittifull regards they met. The earle entering the towne, furnished it with new bands of men, good store of vittels, munition, and all other things convenient, and as then thought requi-sited. Thus having refreshed the towne, within two daies after he passed forth towards the enemies, appointing by the aduise of that noble chieftaine the lord Greie, certaine bands of horsemen to keepe themselves close together in ambush, and to send a sola to the French campe, to trie if they might traile the Frenchmen out of their strength. And as they wished, it partlie came to passe: for diuerse of their horsemen issued forth of their campe, and professed the skirmish. The Englishmen suffered themselves to be chased, untill they had got their enemies within danger of their ambush, and then whirling about, gave them the charge, inforcing them to make their carrie backe, with more than an easie gallop; so that having the Frenchmen thus in chase, they slue and toke diuerse, and among the prisoners were two capitaine, Pierre Longue, and one Lucinet.

The others that escaped, returned with this losse to their campe.

In the meane time, whilst these things were thus in doing, there came to the aid of the Frenchmen fourteen or fifteen thousand Scots, accounting herewith the Irish Scots which came with the earle of Argile. These Scots were scarce lodged, when suddenlie the earle of Shrewsburie and the lord Greie came with their armie divided into three battels of footmen, garded with two troops of horsemen, presented themselves before the faces of their enemies in the same place, where their anant curours the daie before had shewed themselves to draw forth the Frenchmen. Here the armie thus ranged in arraie of battell, staid above the space of an houre, looking if the enemies durst haue come forth to haue given battell: but when they perceived that by no means the Frenchmen meant to forsake their strength, they returned backe to their campe. The English naue being entered now into the fozth, was not idle: for cominge to Bzent Island they set fire on foure ships, which they found there, and after passing by Airth saluted them within the towne with cannon shot, and after intending to burne saint Spinet, were repelled from thence by the lord of Dune, and after returned to attend on the armie. The earle of Shrews-burie, and my lord Greie having executed so much as their commission would beare, and refreshed Ha-dington with all things needfull, departed home-wards; and cominge to Dunglas, began there to build a fortreffe. The English Almans as the armie passed by Dunbar, burned the towne. These Almans also, and certaine bands of Englishmen, as well horsemen as footmen, were left at Dunglas, untill the fozth there begun was in some strength. The earle of Shrewsburie with the rest of the armie came backe into England. My lord Greie remaining on the borders lieutenant of the north parts, after the earle of Shrewsburie was returned home, assenbled all the horsemen then lieng on the borders, and being backed with the Almane footmen, entered againe with the same horsemen into Scotland, burning and wasting in the countie of Tindall, and Aldredall, for the space of twentie miles, both house, coigne, haie, and all other things that came within their reach, and after returned without in-counter.

The ninth of October being tuesday, monsieur de Delle, with his Frenchmen and Almans, came in the morning long before daie to Haddington, meaning to haue toome the towne by stealth. And verelie the enterprize was governed in such secret maner, that the Frenchmen had killed the English scouts, and were entered the bafe court, per anie alarm was raised: and having slaine the watch, some of them ran to a place behind a church, where the Englishmen had their vittels and munitions, and some thrust vp to the towne gate, inforcing with great violence to breake it open, crying with noise and shouts, Victorie, victorie, whereof in deed they accounted themselves then assured. And questionles the Englishmen being thus awakened out of their sleps on the sudden, were in some great disorder; so that manie of them came running forth without either armour or apparell, their shirts excepted; & others ran they wist not well whither, nor where to take heed.
But yet as the Frenchmen were thronged together at the gate to breake it open, a Frenchman (as the writers do report that serued within the towne, but as other saie either to captaine of the Italians, with his match light gave fier to a double canon, that laie readie bent against the gate, so that the same shooting off, made such a lane among the Frenchmen, that they were glad to giue place, and with such a fearefull crye, that those which were behind, not understanding what losse their fellows before had sustained, brake their arraie and fled amaine.

Parliament.

The Englishmen herewith passed through a priuie posterne into the bafe court, and comming vpon them with their halberds, and blacke bills, slue of them great plentie, and drove the rest that escaped ouer the wall in such hast, that happie was he that could tumble ouer first. Monsieur de Wesse yet gathering them together againe, gaue that morning three sharpe assaults to the towne, but was repelled with great losse, for they caried awaie with them sixtene carts and wagons laden with hurt persons and dead carcasses, besides three hundred that were found in the bafe court, which they could not come to, after they were beaten out, to take awaie with them. And thus was monsieur de Wesse constrained to retorne, repenting himselfe of that his bold attempted enterpryse, hauing lost no small number of his Frenchmen and Almans, being slaine in the place. In this meane time, the kings maiestie summoned his high court of parlement, to be holden vpon prorogation at Westminster the fourth of Nouember, where it continued till the fourteenth of March next ensuing.

Dundee spoiled.

In the meane time, the proceedings for the Scottish wars was not forgotten, wherby in the deepe of the winter, there were conueied certeine bands of the English lancequenets, and some number of Englishmen, both horsemen and footmen by sea vnto Broughtierag; and passing from thence vnto Dundee, a two miles from thence, entered the towne, and began to fortifie it: but shortly after by the comming of the French armie with monsieur de Wesse, they left it, first spoiling the houses, and after set them on fire at their departure. The Keinsgraue colonell of the Almans, and monsieur de Etanges, being sent by monsieur de Wesse before, entered Dundee, and lodged within it. Within two daies after their comming thither, they toke certeine of their bands, and going forth did view and surueie the new fort, which the Englishmen had begun to make on the hill, a small distance from the castell. But the Englishmen and their Almans issuing forth against them, were at their elbowes yer they were halfe well aduised that they were got so neare them, whereby being diuven basillie to retire, they hardlie escaped out of danger, being so hotlie pursued, that if the Keinsgraue had not shewed his approued ballancie, guided with no lesse policie than manhood, the whole troope had bene (as was thought) vtterlie distressed.

The Keinsgraue constrained to retire.

In Christmasse this yere the castell of Hume was recovered out of the Englishmens hands, through treason of certeine assured Scots, that vsing to bring bittels to the Englishmen that kept it, had marked all the manner of the scouts and watches, with the places of the wall where the clime was most easie. Wherby in the night season, certeine of the Scots secretlie comming into the ditches, got by to the height of the wals, and entring the place, slue and toke vpon the sudden all that were within it. The firste of Januarie, sir Thomas Seimer baron of Sudleie, lord admerall, and brother to the duke of Summerfet lord protector, was arrested and sent to the towler, and after by authoritie of parlement he was attainted, and the twentieth of March next ensuing, in the third yere of this kings reigne beheaded at towler hill. Moreover in this parlement, the vse of the masse was cleerlie prohibited, and a booke for the vniformitie of diuine seruice, and right administration of the sacraments, was set forth and established.

As haue heard how the Frenchmen fortified the towne of Dundee, where monsieur de Etanges, with his companie of horsemen lieng in garrison chanced in a skirmish to be taken by the Englishmen that laie in Broughtierag, to the great relieving of them that toke him, and no lesse griefe of the French and Scots, for the tried ballancie that was throughlie knowne to rest in him. Moreover, the Englishmen that kept the towne of Haddington all this while against the enimies, could not come by anye bittels, but onelie by a conuioie of some contentment powre to gard the cariages that brought the same from the borders. And as it fortuned at one time when the conuioie came and passed by Dunbar, a skirmish was proffered by the French which laie within that castell in garrison. And as sir James Wellisford that was there amongst other vpon this occasion (according to his wonted ballancie) betwixt himselfe verie forward and egre against the enimie, he was inclosed by an ambush, which the Frenchmen had laid on each side the street within the towne, that he could by no means escape out of their hands, but hauing his horse there slaine vnder him, was taken prisoner euen by a Calceigne of the countrie of Balque named Bellique, that woone no small commendation for that his good hap, in taking such a prisoner, whose name for his often approued prowesse was verie famous euen among the enimies, who saw well inough a resolutenesse in the man rather by perillous aduentures to purchase the perpetuallitie of renowne, than by defect of courage or negligent seruice to lose both life and fame. Which persuasion should enter into the hart of euerie seruitor in the field, if they will be counted right balliant indeed, considering that he which in his life time doth performe nothing worthe memorie, is like a plaier entring vpon the stage, but shewing nothing either in spech or in action, as the poet verie fittlie saith:

Ediderint, obscuri homines migrare videntur Hinc, ut qui frustra nil dixerint histrio scena.*

Some haue written that he was taken through default of those that were appointed to follow him, sith he undertooke to charge the enimie, in hope that by them he should haue bene assisted. But suerlie those that had the charge of this conuioie, doubting by aduenturing too far, to put all in hazard, thought it wisdome rather to suffer the losse of one, than to ieopard the whole; not perceiving which waie to remedie the matter at that present. Now after that the generall of Haddington was thus taken prisoner, to the great griefe vndoubtedlie, not onelie of all the garrison there, but also of all such as tendered the aduancement of the kings maiesties seruice, sir James Crofts was thought a man most meet to supplie the place, and therefore by the lord protector, and others of the counsell was ordeined generall of that towne of Haddington, and the garrison there, in which rowe he bare himselfe so worthilie, as if he should not be suspected of flatterie, for that he liued yet, and in such credit (as the world knoweth) might moue my selfe matter to saie rather much than sufficientlie inough in his due and right deserved commendation.

The king by the aduise of his counsell meaning to prosecute the wars in Scotland, with great forces retained a new power of lancequenets, and other strangers, vnder the conduct of diuers sundrie capitaines: but in the meane time the French king mean-ring to breake with the king of England, thought to have stolen the fortreffe of Bullognberg, so that a chosen power of men of warre, to the number of seuen thousand, vnder the conduct of monsieur de Chatillon, being sent downe about that exploit on Paiedaie at night, came forward with their ladders, and all other furniture meet for the purpose, approaching about the houre of midnight nere to the fort, within the which were not at that time manie about thre hundred and fiftie soldiers, vnder the gouernement of sir Nicholas Arnalt knight generall of that piece, a capitaine of great courage, and no lesse billance in his charge.

And as it chanced, there were among the Frenchmen three or foure Englishmen, which hauing matched themselves in marriage with women of that countrey, after the peace was concluded betwixt France and England, were discharged out of the king of Englands wages; and remaining with their wiues, got interteinement among the Frenchmen, and were with monsieur de Chatillon, now committing towards this enterpryse. Whereupon one of the same Englishmen named Carter, that had a foretelling giuen intelligence to the said sir Nicholas of the Frenchmens doings, so farre as he might learne and vnderstand the same, would gladiie haue aduertised sir Nicholas Arnall of the Frenchmens purpose at this time: but monsieur de Chatillon kept the matter so secret, that Carter nor any of the other Englishmen had knowledge thereof, till they were now marching forward, so that Carter could not get a waie from them, till they were appoched within lesse than a quarter of a mile of Bullognberg, and then dipping aside from among them, came running so fast as he might towards the fort, crying; Bolwes, bolwes, as loud as his voice would serue, & so gaue the alarm to them within the fort.

One of the soldiers called Sporgaine Deaton, that chanced to be there at hand in scout with three or foure other, straight knew him, and brought him to the draw-bridge, where sir Nicholas Arnalt caused him to be drawn up betwixt two pikes, into whome he declared how the Frenchmen were at hand, meaning to assault his fort now upon the sudden, in hope to surprize it. Wherewith, it needed not to will sir Nicholas to bestirre him, to cause euerie man to make readie, and place themselves as was thought most expedient. And vndoubtedly the noble courage of that worthy gentleman, furthered much, to cause euerie capitaine and soldier vnder him, to put awaie all feare, and to haue a regard to do his dutie, for the relieuing of the entrenches: so as they seemed glad of the occasion, whereby they might shew proofe of their accustomed manhood against the enimie, that thus came to seale on them without warning, in purpose to kill euerie man that fell into their hands, if their intencion had taken place, making now such hast forward, that before the Englishmen could be well ready with their armour and weapons in their appointed places, the Frenchmen were got to the ditch, and appointing three thousand of their numbers, the most part gentlemen and double paies, with targets, battell ares, and pissols, to haue the first scale, saluted them within upon their verie approach, with seven hundred harquebuts shot at the first volie.

The Englishmen by order giuen by sir Nicholas, kept themselves close, till the Frenchmen by their scaling ladders, which they brought with them, and had quicklie raised against the walles, began to mount vp, and enter vpon them: at which instant, off went the flankers. Those of sir Nicholas Arnalts moneths discharged verie well at the first, but at the second voloe the morters burst. Albeit there were two balle pices that were planted aloft on the same mont, of the which the one discharged five & twentie shot by the maulier, and the other seven and twentie by his maiestie. Sir Nicholas Arnalt here being accompanied with his captains and soldiers about him, stood at defense so stoutlie as was possible, doing so valiantlie, that their fame doerueeth to lue for euer. Where were burd upon the faces of the enimies (ouer and beside the shot that was bestowed among them) to the number of fiftene hundred pikes and blacke bills. The Frenchmen becliee stucke to it to the bittermost, and did what late in the vertie last point of their powers to enter upon the Englishmen, sup-plyng still the places of their dead and wearie men with fresh succors.

Carer that came to bring word of their coming, with a pike in his hand, stood at the place of the bulworne where they thus gaue the assault, & fought right ballantine, giuing manie wounds, and receiving some againe: for he was hurt both in the thigh and arme, who furtleie of a priuat soldier (if he were priuat and ordinarie) seemed verie seruiciable at all assaies, considering into what desperat adventures and hazards he did as it were cast himselfe, esteeming lesse the losse of life and lim, than the reproch and dishonoz of his countrie, the glozie & renowne wherof (about all wooldie things which are but temporaryall) all men are naturallie bound with might & maine both to seeke and saue: as one berie well saith;

Nascimur ut patriam vitæque operâque iuvenimus.
Sir Nicholas Arnalt himselfe was hurt with a pike in the nose. Capteyne Warren standing on the same bulwourke with sir Nicholas, received two shots in his coscelet, and one of them broue two or three links of his chaine into his necke. Capteyne Broughton had there fiftene of his armed men, euerie of them hauing their coscelets perled through. The number of the Englishmen that were slaine, was reckoned to be fise and twentie, and hurt eight and fiftie. Of Frenchmen there were slaine a great number, beside those that were hurt, and at length through shot, casting dolone of stoncs and timber vpon their heads, scalding water and handbottes they were repelled, retiring out of the trenches shortly after the breake of the daie, hauing continued the assault from midnight till that time, killiueing their forces, in hope to atchieue their wisherpretie: but being thus beaten off, they gathered togither their dead men, and lading fiftene waggons with their carcasses, they returned backe, without making anye further attempt at that time.

And so by the high balliance of sir Nicholas Arnalt, and the other capitaines that serued in that fort vnder him, and chieflie by the assistance of almightie God, the giuer of all victories, the enemies were repelled, to their great dishonour, and the péece referred to the immortall renowne of the defendants. Within a daie or two after, the generall of the Frenchmen sent to know of prisoners taken; but sir Nicholas Arnalt answered the messenger, that he knew of no warre: and therefore if anie had attempted to make a surpris of his péece by stealth, they were serued accordingly to their malicious meanings. Indeed (said he) we haue taken none of your men, but we haue got some of your braue guilt armour & weapons. Well (said the messenger) it is not the cowle that maketh the monk, and no more is it the braue armour or weapon that maketh the man of warre: but the fortune of warre is such, sometime to gaine, and sometime to lose. Sir Nicholas receiuing him into the fort, made him good here, and gaue him fittie crownes in-reward, and so he departed.

But concerning the liberalitie of sir Nicholas, I might here speake further thereof, how bountifullie he he rewarded the souldiers for their great manhood shewed at that time, in defending so sharpe an assault, to their great honour, and no lesse confusion of the aduersaries. The daie after the said assault, there came to Bullognberg from Guines, a supplie of three or foure hundred men, vnder the leading of sir William Cobham, now lord Cobham and others. Within a while after, sir Nicholas Arnalt sent forth three hundred footmen, and five and twentie horsemen, conducted by the said sir William Cobham, capteine Hutton of the Old man, & capteine Hore of Bullognberg, with certeine cariages, to go by to a wood not farre off, called the Forth wood, to fetch sagots and hush, to repaire and mainteine the rampires.

These capteins with their bands being passed forward, about two miles in distance from the fort, met with certeine of their scouts that were sent forth that morning, who told them that they had discovered the tract of a great number of horsemen. Whereupon the Englishmen now being almost come to the wood side, retired with all speed: and here with the French horsemen brake out of the wood, and following them, fell in skirmish with them. The Englishmen casting themselves in a ring, kept them off with their pikes, where with they impaled themselves, and having their small troope lined with shot, they also galled the Frenchmen right sore therewith, as they still approached them. Nevertheless, those horsemen gaue three maine onsets vpon the Englishmen, with the number of a thousand horse at two of the first onsets, and the third they gaue with all their whole power, being esteemed a sixtene hundred horsemen in all.

distraite of the Englishmen
vnder the conduct of their noble capteins

But such was the valiant prowesse of the English souldiers, encouraged with the comfortable presence of sir William Cobham, and other their capteins, that conducted them in such order as stood most for their safeguard, exhorting them with such effectual words as serued best to purpose, that the enimie to conclude was repelled with losse of senentie of their great horses that laie dead there in the field, within the space of halfe a mille. There were also foure thousand French footmen that came forward, but could not reach, and so marching about the fort, returned in vaine; after they once perceived that the Englishmen were safely retired within their fort. The council thus perceiuing the French kings purpose, which he had conceived to worke some notable damage to this realme, as well in support of his friends in Scotland, as in hope to recouer those peeces which the English held at Bullongne, and in those marches, doubted also of some inuasion meant by him to be attempted into this realme, because of such great preparation as he had made, for leuieng of his forces both by sea and land.

The preparation for warre as well in England as France.

The council therefore made likewise provision to be ready to resist all such attempts, as anie waie forth might be made, to the annoiunce of the realme. But as things fell out, the same stood in good stead, not against the forren enimie, but against a number of rebellious subiects at home, the which forgetting their dutie and allegiance, did as much as in them laie (what soeuer their pretense was) to bring this noble realme and their naturall countrie into destruction. But first, for that it maie appeare, that the duke of Summerfet then protector, and other of the council, did not without good ground and cause mainteine the warres against the Scots, I haue thought good to set downe an epistle exhortatorie, as we finde the same in the great chronicle of Richard Grafton, sent from the said protector and council vnto the Scots, to moue them to haue consideration of themselves, and of the estate of their countrie, by joining in that friendlie bond and unitie with England, as had bene of the kings part and his fathers continuallie sought, for the benefit of both realmes, the copie of which exhortation here insueth.

Edward by the grace of God, duke of Summerfet, earle of Hertford, vicount Beauchampe, lord Scimer, vncle to the kings highnesse of England, gouernor of his most roiall person, and protector of all his realmes, dominions, & subiects, lieutenant generall of all his maiesties armies, both by land and sea, treasurer and earle marshall of England, gouernor of the Iles of Gernesey and Iersey, and knight of the most noble order of the garter, with others of the counsell of the said most high and noble prince Edward, by the grace of God of England, France, and Ireland king, defender of the faith, and in earth vnder Christ the supreme head of the churches of England and Ireland. To the nobilitie and counsellors, gentlemen and commons, and all other the inhabitants of the realme of Scotland, greeting and peace.

Considering with our selues the present state of things, and weeing more deepe-ly the maner and tearmes wherein you and we do stand, it maketh vs to marvel, what euill & fatall chance doth so disceur your hearts, and maketh them so blind and vnmindfull of your profit, and so still conciliate and heape to your selues most extreme mischiefs, the which we whome ye will needs haue your enimies, go about to take awaie from you, and perpetuallie to ease you thereof. And also by all reason & order of necessitie, it should be rather more conuenient for you to seeke and require moderate agtgements of vs, whome God hath hitherto according to our most iust, true, and godlie meanings and intents, prospered and set forward, with your affliction and miserie, than that we being superiours in the field, maisters of a great part of your realme, should seeke vpon you. Yet to the intent that our charitable minds and brotherlie loue should not cease, by all means possible to prouoke and call you to your owne commoditie and profit, even as the father to the son, or the elder brother to the younger; and as the louing physician would do to the mistrustfull and ignorant patient: we are content to call and crie vpon you to looke on your estate, to auoid the great calamitie that your countrie is in, to haue vs rather brothers than enimies, and rather countremen than conquerors. And if your gouernors or capteins shall reteine and keepe from you this our exhortation, as heretofore they haue done our prauat wealth & commoditie; not regarding though you be still in miserie, so they haue profit and gouernance ouer you, and shall still abuse you with feined and forged tales: yet this shall be a witnesse before God, and all christian people, betwene you and vs, that we professing the gospel of Iesus Christ, according to the doctrine thereof, do not cease to call and prouoke you from the effusion of your owne blood, from the destruction of the realme of Scotland, from perpetuall enimitie and hatred, from the snail destruction of your nation, and from seruitude to forren nations, to libertie, to amitie, to equalitie with vs, to that which your writers haue alwaies wished might once come to passe.

Who that hath read the stories in times past, and doth marke & note the great battels past fought betwixt England & Scotland, the incursions, robes, & spilles, which haue bene done on both parties: the realme of Scotland five times wone by one king of England,

Edward the sixt.

England, the Scottish kings some taken prisoners, some slaine in battell, some for verie sorrow and discomfort upon losse, dieng and departing the world: and shall perceive againe, that all nations in the world, that nation onelie beside England, speaketh the same language: and as you and we be annured and joined in one Island, so no people are so like in manners, forme, language, and all conditions as we are: shall not he thinke it a thing verie unmet, unnatural, and unchristian, that there should be betwixt us so mortall war, who in respect of all other nations, be and should be like as two brethren of one Island of great Britaine? And though he were a stranger to both, what should he thinke more meet, than if it were possible one kingdome to be made in rule, which is one in language, and to be divided in rulers, which is all one in countrie?

And for so much as two successors cannot con-carre and fall into one, by no other manner of meanes than by marriage, whereby one blood, one lineage, one parentage is made of two, and an indefensible right giuen of both to one, without the destruction and abolishing of either. If God should giue that what soever you would wish, other than that which now not by fortune hath chanced, but by his infinit mercie and most inscrutable prouidence, as carefull for you he hath giuen unto you. The which thing that you should also thinke to come of his disposition, and not by blind fortune, how unlike hath it bene, and how suddenlie hath it turned, that the power of God might be thewed: your last king being a prince of much excellencie and yong, whom you know after a promise broken contrarie to his honor, & misfortune by Gods iust iudgement following upon it, God either by sorrow or by some meanes otherwise at his inscrutable pleasure, did take awaie from you, had those children, did not almightie God (as it were) to shew his will and pleasure to be, that the long continued warre and enimitie of both the nations should be taken awaie, and knit in perpetual loue and amitie, take the two men-children of those babes being distant the one from the other, and in diuerse places, both as it were at one time, and within the space of four and twentieth houres, leauing but one maidenchild and prince.

When the most wise and victorious prince late our king and maister, king Henrie the eight, in other of his marriages not most fortunate, had by his most lawfull and most vertuous wife, queene Jane, his other two wives before that marriage departed this world, and neuer surmise nor question made of that marriage, since that time to this daie, nor so much as all his life time, name or motion to or of anie other wife, one prince of so high expectation, of so great gifts of God, the right and vndoubted heire of the realme of England and his maiestie onlie of male issue left behind him to succed the imperiall crowne. If nothing else had bene done, what can anie wise or anie christian man that thinke the world to be gouerned by Gods prou-idence and not by fortune, thinke otherwise, but that it was Gods pleasure it should be so, that these two realmes should ioine in marriage, and by a goodlie sacrament, make a goodlie, perpetuall and most friend-lie unitie & concord, whereby such benefits as of uni-tie and concord commeth, may through his infinit grace come vnto these realmes. And if anie man of you or of anie nation doubteth hereof, except you looked for miracles to be done herein, and yet if ye marke all the possibilities of the natures of the two princes, the children already had, the doubtfull chance, least each of them should haue a sonne, or both daughters, or not of meet ages, with other circumstances both of the partie of this realme of England, and that of Scotland, which hath not changed in eight hundred yeares, it must needs be reckoned a great maruell and a miracle.

But let it be no miracle, seeing that God doth not now speake in oracles, as amongst the Iewes he did: and present prophesies now abates be but either not certaine, or else not plaine: what more cer-teine can be had of Gods will in this case, than the before rehearsed doth bring? But if God himselfe should speake, what could he speake more, than he speake in these? Call you them prouidences or chances, if you be still afflicted and punished? What he not saie: I of mine infinite mercie and loue to your nation, had prouided a right heire and a prince to the one, and a right heire and prince to the other, to be ioined in my holie lawes, and by the lawe of nature and the world to haue made an uni-tie, concord and peace, in the which I see of both the realmes you refused it; you loved better dissention than unitie, discord than agreement, warre than peace, hatred than loue and charitie. If you do then therefore smart for it, whome can you blame but your owne election?

But because some of those, who make thereon to impediments, cannot but confesse, that there ap-peareth Gods prouidence herein, and oportunitie and occasion giuen to unitie of both the realmes, yet may hereafter say, and heretofore haue said, that the fault herein is, that we seeke not equalitie, nor the marriage, but a conquest: we would not be friends but the lords. Although our proclamation at the last warres doth inough declare the contra-rie, yet here we protest and declare vnto you and all christian people, to be the kings maiesties mind our matters, by our aduise and counsell not to conquer, but to haue in amitie; not to win by force, but to conciliate by loue; not to spoile and kill, but to saue and keepe; not to disseuer and diuorfe, but to ioine in marriage, from high to low both the realms, to make of one Isle one realme, in loue, amitie, concord, peace and charitie, which if you refuse, and daine vs to conquer, who is guiltie of the bloodshed?
Who is the occasion of the warre? Who maketh the battels, the burning of houses, and the deuasta-tion which shall follow?

Can it be denied but that we haue the great scale of Scotland granted by the parlement of Scotland, for the marriage which should be made, with assurces and pledges, vntill the performance? And thus in the time that the late king of most famous memoire our soueraigne lord king Henrie the eight did reigne, and in the time of the same your gouer-nour, who now is the earle of Arrane, who then being a chiefe ower and laborer therein, for the high and inestimable benefit of that realme, so soon as he was by the late cardinall of saint Andrews and others, with certeine vaine feares and hopes & gré-dineffe of dignitie peruerter, resolued from his first agreement, and put all the realme to the losse of such holds and fortresses as are now taken from you, and to the losse of a foughten field, for the which we are loie, if otherwise peace might haue bin concluded, for his owne priuat lucre and retchlesnesse of that noble realme. And what end can you loke for of these manner of proceedings, but such successe as heretofore hath bene experimented & assayed: We offer loue, we offer equalitie and amitie, we overcome in warre, and offer peace: we win holds, and offer no conquest: we get in your land, and offer England.

What can be more offered and more proffered, than intercourse of merchandizes, and interchange of marriages, the abolishing of all such our lawes, as prohibitteth the same, or might be impediment to the mutuall amitie. We haue offered not onlie to leaue the authoritie name, title, right or challenge of conquerour, but to receiue that which is the shame of men ouercommen, to leaue the name of the nation, and the gloie of anie victorie (if anie we haue had, or should haue of you) and to take the indifferent old name of Britains againe, because nothing should be left on our part to be offered, nothing on your part vnrefused, whereby ye might be inexcusable. And all the world might testifie all other meanes, not being able to do anie thing, after manie other waies and remedies attempted, battell of vs to be taken as an extreame refuge, to attaine right and reason among christian men: if anie man may rightfullie make battell for his spouse and wife. The daughter of Scotland was by the great scale of Scotland promised to the sonne & heire of England.

If it be lawfull by Gods laue to fight in a godd quarrell, and for to make peace, this is to make an end of all warres, and to conclude an eternall and perpetuall peace; which to confirme, we shall fight, and you to breake, is it not easie to discerne who hath the better part: God and the sword hath already, and shall hereafter (if there be no remedie) trie it. Who so willet the marriage to go forward; who so mindeth the peace and tranquillitie of both the realmes; who willet no conquest to be had, but a unitie and loue to go forward, we refuse no man: let him bring his name and his pledge of god seruice in this quarrell, he shall not onlie be receiued to the amitie; but shall haue sufficient defense against the aduersaries, and recompense of his liuing, if he susteine anie losse. We neither do nor intend to put anie man from his lands, taxes, or offices, vnlesse he will needs resist, and so compell vs thereinto.

It beie good, lawfull, and bountifull offer.

The case of the foresaid marriage still bigged.

What face hath this of conquest: We intend not to disherit your queene, but to make hir heires inheritors also to England. What greater honour can ye seeke vnto your queene, than the marriage offered: What more meeter marriage than this with the kings highnes of England: What more sure defense in the nonage of your queene for the realme of Scotland, than to haue England your patrone and garison: We seeke not to take from you your lawes nor customes; but we seeke to redresse your oppressions, which of diuerse ye do susteine. In the realme of England, diuerse lawes and customes be according to the ancient vsage thereof. And likewise, France, Normandie, and Gascoigne haue sundrie kind of orders. Haue all the realmes and dominions that the emperor now hath, one custome and one sort of lawes: These baue feares and fantasies of expulsion of your nation, of changing the lawes, of making a conquest, be diuen into your heads, of those, who in deed had rather you were all conquered, spoiled, and slaine, than they would lose anie point of their will, of their desire of rule, of their estimation, which they know in quietnesse would be seene what it were, as it were in a caline water.

The lord protector telleth
the Scots
who they be that put doubts into their heads, &c.

How in this tumult of disorder, when the realme is tossed vp and downe with waues and surges of battell, famine, and other mischieses which the warre bringeth, they thinke they cannot be espied; but loke on them you that haue wit and prudence, and consider the state of your queene and realme, you will not keepe hir sole and unmarried, the which were to you great dishonour. If you married hir within the realme, that cannot ertinguish the title which we haue to the crowne of Scotland. And what dissention, enuie, grudge, and malice that shall breed among you, is easie to perceiue. You will marrie hir out of the realme, our title remaineth, you be subjects to a forren prince of another countrie, and of another language, and vs ye haue your enemies, euen at your elbow, your succours farre off from you: and be we not in the bowels now of the realme: Haue we not a great part thereof, either in subiection or in amitie and loue: Who shall come into your realme, but he shall be met with, and fought with, if neede be, euen of your owne nation, who be faithfull and true to the realme of England in the waie of this most godlie vniou by marriage.

And if anie forren power, prince, or potentate, or whosoener be your aid to nourish still discord, send you an armie also; how shall they oppresse you, fill your houses, waste your groundes, spend and consume your vittells, hold you in subiection, & regard you as slaues, which without them could not liue, & will take your queene to bestow as they lust, & speciallie if their ruler or king (as perchance he may be) in other warres be otherwise occupied, to be a prey to vs, & a true conquest, then it should be too late to saie: We will haue a marriage and no conquest. We will with peace & amitie, we are wearie of battell and miserie. The stubborne ouercommen must suffer the victors pleasure, and pertinacitie will make the victorie more insolent, whereof you your selfe haue giuen the cause, if they send monie and capteines, but no souldiers. If it if they be capteines, who ruleth and whosoeth obeie: Who shall haue the honoy of the enterpryse, and if it be well atchined: But whether it be well atchined or no, which number is that which shall be slaine: Whose blood shall be shed: Their monie peradventure shall be consumed, & their commandements obeyed. But whose bodies shall smart for it: Whose lands shall be wasted: Whose houses burned: What realme made desolate: Remember what it is to haue a forren power within you, a strong power of your enemies vpon you, you (as it were) the campe & plaine betwixt them to fight on, & to be troden vpon, both of the victor, and of the ouercommen. And imagine you be before your eyes your wiues & daughters in danger of wantonnesse & insolencie of the soldiors, the proud looks of the capteines & soldiors, whom you call to helpe you, the contempt you shall bring your nation in, then take heed least indeed that follow which you feare, that is, that you shall be by them conquered, that ye shall be by them put from your holds, lands, taxes & offices, that your lawes by them shall be altered, that your nation shall be by them destroyed. Consider in this realme, did not the Britons call in the Saxons for helpe, & by them were put out: Where be the Britons, once a great nation betwixt you and vs: How did the nation of France put out the Galles out of all France: How got the Turk first all Grecia, & now of late all Hungarie, but being called in for to aid & helpe: And did not the Goths by like meanes get all Italie, and the Lombards one part thereof now called Lombardie: What loke you for more: See the soldiors, & haueing their weapons in their hands, and knowing that you cannot liue without them, what will not they command you to do: What will they not inuade vpon you: What will they not thinke they may do: And what will they thinke that you dare do: This forren helpe is your confusion, that succour is your detriment, the victorie so had is your scrattube: What is then to be thought of losse taken with them: The strangers and forren soldiors shall oppresse you with in, our power and strength without; and of your owne nation, so manie as loue quietnesse, godlines, and wealth of your realme, shall helpe also to scourge and afflict you. Is it not better to compose and acquiesce all this calamitie and trouble by marriage, to end all forrolous and battells by such and so honorable a peace: Hath not the emperor Spaine & Burgundie by title of marriage: How holdest the French king Britaine now latelie annexed to that crowne, but but by title of marriage? How have all the great princes of the world happie and with quiet of two kingdoms one, of diuerse lordships one, of nations alwaies at warre with themselves, or else in doubtful peace, one well governed kingdom, rule, and dominion, but by that gospie, most quiet, and most amiable composition of marriage? Two means there be of making one rule, wherto title is pretended, and perfect agreement betwixt two nations, either by force or superiortie, which is conquest; or by equalitie and loue, which is by parentage & ma-riage: you hate the one, that is, conquest; and by refusing the other, you enforce upon you hatred & malice.

You will not have peace, you will not have ali-ance, you will not have concord; and conquest commeth upon you whether you will or no. And yet if all things were considered, we feare it will appere that it were better for you to be conquered of vs, than succoured of strangers, lesse losse to your goods, lesse hurt to your lands, lesse dishonor to your realme; this nation which is one in tongue, one in countrie and birth, hauing so little diuersitie to occupie the whole, than other powers come in to you, neither like in language, nor yet like in behauior, who should rule ouer you, and take you to be but their slaues. But we esteeme and finally declare and protest vnto you, that although for the better furtherance of this god-lie purpose of uniting the realmes, and for the sure defense of them which fauour the marriage, we are compelled for the time to keepe holds, and to make fortifications in your realme: yet the kings mai-esties mind and determinat pleasure is, with our ad-uise and counsell to be as before is declared, that where fauour may be shewed, not to vse rigor, if by conditions you will receiue this amitie offered, not to follow conquest: for we desire loue, unitie, concord, peace and equalitie. Let neither your gou-ernors nor your hirkemen, nor those, who so often haue falsified their faith and promise, and by treache-rie and falshood be accustomed to prozoge the time, sed you forth with faire words, and bring you into the snare from whence they cannot deliuer you. They will peraduenture prouide for themselves with pensions in some other realme, and set soldiors strangers in your holds to keepe you in subiection, vnder the pretense to defend them against vs. But who promiseth pensions for you? How are you defended when they are fled away? Who conquereth you when the strange captiues haue your holds, when your land is wasted, and the realme destroyed, and the more part kept from you? Who will set by the marriage of the queene to giue a title with the war of England, to marrie the name, an other rightie king holding the land? If we two being made one by amitie, be most able to defend vs against all nations, and hauing the sea for wall, the mutuell loue for garrison, & God for defense, should make so noble and well agreeing monarchie, that neither in peace we may be ashamed, nor in war afraid of anie worldlie or forren power: why should not you be as desirous of the same, and haue as much cause to reioice at it as we? If this honor of so noble a monarchie do not moue you to take and accept amitie, let the griefe and the danger of the aforenamed losses feare you to attempt that thing which shall displease God, increase warre, danger your realme, destroy your land, vnder your children, wast your grounds, desolate your countries, and bring all Scotland either to famine & miserie, or to subiection and seruitude of an other nation. We require but your promised queene, your offered agreement of unitie, the iointing of both the nations, which God of his infinite clemencie and tender loue that he hath declared to beare to both the nations, hath offer-red vnto vs both, and in manner called vs both vnto it, whose calling and prouocation we haue, and will follow to the best of our powers, and in his name, and with his aid, admonition, exhortation, request, and ambassages, not being able to do it, and to find stableness in promises, we shall not willing, but compelled pursue the battell, chastise the wicked & malicious by the angrie angels of God, fire and sword.

Therefore we require and exhort you all, who haue loue to the countrie, pittie of that realme, a true hart to your queene and miserie, regard of your honors and promises made by the great scale of Scotland, and who fauour the peace, loue, unitie, and concord, and that most profitable marriage to enter and come to vs, and declaring your true and god-lie harts therunto, to aid vs in this most godlie purpose and enterprize. To be witness of our doings we refuse no man, temporall nor spirituall, lord ne-lard, gentleman nor other, who will aid this our purpose, and minish the occasion of slaughter and destruction, to whom we shall keepe the promises heretofore declared, and further see reward and recompense made according to the desert.

And for a more sure proue and plainer token of the good mind and will which we beare vnto you, that which neuer yet was granted to Scotland in anie league, truce, or peace betwixt England and Scotland, because ye shall haue proue of the beginning of loue and amitie of both the realmes: the kings highnes considering the multitude of them which are come to his maiesties deuotion, and of them that be well-willers and aiders of this godlie enterprize, hath by our aduise and counsell granted, and by these presents doth grant, that from henceforth all manner of merchants and other Scottishmen, who will enter their names with one of the wardens of the marches, there profess to take part with vs in this before named godly purpose, to his owne commoditie, & to serue all such as be of the same agreement, may lawfullie and without anie trouble and vexation enter into anie port, crake, or haven of England, and there vse their traffikes of merchandize, buie and sell, bring in the commodities of Scotland, and take and carrie forth the commodities of England, as liberallie and as frelie, and with the same and none other custome or payments therefore, than Englishmen and the kings subiects do at this present: min-ding further vpon the successe hereof to gratifie so the furtherers of this most godlie enterprize and vnion, that all the world may be witness of the great zeale and loue which his highnes doth beare toward you and your nation. And all this the kings high-nesse, by our aduise and counsell, hath willed to be declared vnto you; and giuen in commandement vnto vs, and all his lieutenants, wardens, rulers, and other head officers, ministers, and subiects, to see executed and done, according to the true purport, effect, and meaning thereof. Fare you well.

Although this admonition and wholesome exhortation might haue moued the Scots to haue regarded their owne state, yet it little auailed, as by the sequel it appeared. For hauing both great promises made by the French, and now considering therewith the hurle barlies and tumults that sprong vp in England, they continued in their obstinat purposes, not to yeld vnto such reasonable motions as had bene offered, if they would haue shewed themselves conformable thereto, and not haue so stubborne denied to submit themselves to that which of right they were bound vnto. So that herein they shewed themselves verie peruerse and willfull, reiecting not one-lie the god aduise that the duke gaue them, but also not so much as once thinking what might insue to their great mischance vpon their refusal, and what benefit

ambassages, not being able to do it, and to find sta-
pelled pursue the battell, chastise the wicked & ma-

well-willers and aiders of this godlie enterprize,
hath by our aduise and counsell granted, and by these
of merchants and other Scottishmen, who will enter
their names with one of the wardens of the marches, there profess to take part with vs in this before named godly purpose, to his owne commoditie, & to serue all such as be of the same agreement, may lawfullie and without anie trouble and vexation enter into anie port, crake, or haven of England, and
there vse their traffikes of merchandize, buie and sell,
bring in the commodities of Scotland, and take and
carrie forth the commodities of England, as libe-
rallie and as frelie, and with the same and none other custome or payments therefore, than English-
men and the kings subiects do at this present: min-
on, that all the world may be witness of the great
you and your nation. And all this the kings high-
declared vnto you; and giuen in commandement
vnto vs, and all his lieutenants, wardens, rulers,
and other head officers, ministers, and subiects, to
see executed and done, according to the true purport, effect, and meaning thereof. Fare you well.

Although this admonition and wholesome exhor-
tation might haue moued the Scots to haue regarded their owne state, yet it little auailed, as by the sequel it appeared. For hauing both great promises
England, they continued in their obstinat purposes,
not to yeld vnto such reasonable motions as had
bene offered, if they would haue shewed themselves
conformable thereto, and not haue so stubborne denied to submit themselves to that which of right they
selves verie peruerse and willfull, reiecting not one-
their great mischance vpon their refusal, and what be-

ness rebound to them by admitting the offer: naie, they were of opinion and belae, that if so haue a bottie might befall England, it would be an occasion of great ruth and tozchednesse to Scotland: as one of late hath affirmed in his poetickall supposal:

shae preda Britannia Cederet, omifera Scotia misirabile regnum, Genti infelici nihil est misirabile relium.

But now to let the Scots alone for a time, we will returne to the rebellion which followed in this yeare, to the whole disappointing of the plot laid by the counsell, for the present subduing of the Scots, as it was verie like that it should haue to come to passe, if none other let had come. So it was, that the kings maiestie, by the aduise of his uncle the lord protector, and other of the counsell, thought good to let forth a proclamation against inclosures, and taking in of fields and commons that were accustomed to lie open, for the behoofe of the inhabitants dwelling nere to the same, who had greivously complained of gentlemen and others for taking from them the vse of those fields and commons, and had inclosed them into parks and severall pastures for their priuat commodities and pleasures, to the great hinderance and vndoing of manie a poore man.

The meaning of the foresaid proclamation.

This proclamation tending to the benefit and reliefe of the poore, appointed that such as had inclosed those commons, should upon a paine by a date assigned late them open againe. But how well souer the setters forth of this proclamation meant, thinking thereby peradventure to appease the grudge of the people that found themselves greiued with such inclosures; yet verelie it turned not to the wished effect, but rather ministered occasion of a foule and dangerous disorder. For whereas there were set that obeyed the commandement, the vnruly people presuming vpon their proclamation, thinking they should be borne out by them that had set it forth rashly without order, toke vpon them to redresse the matter: and assembling themselves in vnlawfull wise, chose to them captians and leaders, brake open the inclosures, cast downe ditches, killed by the deare which they found in parkes, spoiled and made hauocke, after the manner of an open rebellion. First they began to plaie these parts in Summerfetshire, Buckinghamshire, Northamptonshire, Kent, Essex, and Lincolneshire.

Commotions in Summerfetshire, and other places.

Rebellion in Deuonshire. John Fox in Acts & Monuments.

The names of the captians of the rebels.

In Summerfetshire they brake by certeine parks of sir William Herbert, and the lord Starcon: but sir William Herbert assembling a power together by the kings commission, slue and executed manie of those rebellious people. In other places also, by the good diligence and policie vsed by the counsell, the rebels were appeased and quieted. But shortly after, the commons of Deuonshire and Cornewall rose by waie of rebellion, demanding not onelie to haue inclosures laied open, and parkes disparted: but also thorough the instigation and pricking forward of certeine poppish priests, ceased not by all sinister and subtil meanes, first vnder Gods name & the kings, and vnder the colour of religion, to perswade the people to assemble in routs, to chose captians to guide them, and finally to burst out into open rebellion. Their chiefe captians were these, Humfrie Arundell esquier, gouernour of the Mount, James Kologan, John Kologan, John Paine, Thomas Underhill, John Soleman, and William Segar. Moreover, of priests which were principall stirrers, and some of them chiefe gouernors of the camps, and after executed, there were to the number of eight, whose names we find to be as follow: Robert Bocham, John Thompson, Roger Barret, John Wolcocke, William Alfa, James Bourton, John Barrow, Richard Benet, besides a multitude of other priests which joined with them.

The whole companies of these rebels amounted little lesse than to the number of ten thousand stout and ballant personages, able indeed (if their cause had bene good and favoured of the Lord and giuer of victories) to haue wrought great feats. But being (as they were) ranke and malicious traitors, the almighty God confounded their deuises, and brought them to their deserued confusion. A strange case, that those mischacions and wicked traitors could not be warned by the crill successe of their diuillishly attempted outrage, in the yeare last past; at what time certeine seditious persons in Cornewall fell vpon one of the kings commissioners named master Bobie, sent thither with others for the reformation of matters in religion, in like manner as other were sent at the same time into other shires of the realme, for the which murder a priest being apprehended, arraigned, and condemned, was hanged into Smithfield, and there hanged and quartered the seauenth daie of Iulie, in the said last yeare before mentioned, to wit, 1548. Other of his complices and associates were executed and put to death in diuerse other parts of the realme.

But now touching these other that rose in this present summer. At the first they were in great hope that the other disordered persons, which stirred in other parts of the realme, would haue joined with them, by force to haue disappointed and vndone that which the prince by law and act of parlement, in reformation of religion, had ordeined and established. But afterwards perceiuing how in most places such mischacions mutinies and diuillish attempts, as the commons had begun, partly by force and partly by policie were appeased, or that their cause being but onelie about plucking downe of inclosures, and enlarging of commons, was distanced from theirs; so that either they would not, or could not ioine with them in aid of their religious quarrell: they began somewhat to doubt of their wicked begun enterprise. Notwithstanding now, sith they had gone so farre in the matter, they thought there was no thinking backe: and therefore determining to proceed, they fell to new deuises, as first before all things to bring into their hands all such places of force, wealth, and defense, as might in any respect serue for their aid and furtherance. Here vpon the second of Iulie, they came before the citie of Excester, incamping about the same in great numbers, and used all waies and meanes they could deuise how to win it by force, sometimes assailing it right sharplie, sometimes firing the gates, otherwhiles undermining the wals, and at other times (as occasions serued) procuring skirmishes.

Finally, nothing was left vndone which the enimie could imagine to serue his purpose for the winning of that citie. And albeit there wanted not lads & romachs among the citizens to withstand this outward force of the enimie: yet in proceesse of time, such scarcitie of bread and vittels increased, that the people wared wearie & loth to abide such extremities of famine. Notbeit the magistrats (though it greiued them to see the multitude of the citizens in such distress) yet hauing a speciall regard of their dutie toward the prince, and loue to the common wealth, left no waies vnbrought to quiet the people, & stalle them in their dutifull obedience to resist the enimies: so that comforteing the people with faire promises, and relieuing their necessities verie liberallie, so farre as their power might extend, did in such sort vse the matter, that euerie of them within resolved with one generall consent to abide the end, in hope of some speedie reliefe. And in the meane while, when their corne and meale was consumed, the gouernors of the citie caused brian and meale to be moulde by in cloth, for otherwise it would not sticke together. Also they caused some excursions to be made out of the citie, to take and fetch into the citie such cattell as were found pasturing abroad nere to the walls, which being brought in, were distributed among the poore. To conclude, into such extremitie were the miserable citizens brought, that albeit mans nature can scarce abide to feed vpon anie vnaccustomed food; yet these filie men were glad to eat horse flesh, and to hold themselves well content therewith. Whilke the siege thus remained before Excester, the rebels spoiled and robbed the countrie abroad, and laieing their traitorous heads together, they consulted vpon certaine articles to be sent vnto the king. Wherin such diuersitie of heads and wits was among them, that for euery kind of bzaine there was one manner of article: so that neither appeared anie consent in their diuersitie, nor yet anie constancie in their agreement. Some seemed more tollerable, others altogether vnreasonable, some would haue no iustices, some no state of gentlemen. The priests euer harped vpon one string, to ring the bishop of Rome into England againe, and to halloie home cardinall Pole their countreiman. After much a do, at length a few articles were agreed vpon, to be directed vnto the king, with the names of certaine of their heads set therevnto, the copie whereof here in such.

The articles of the commons of Deuonshire and Cornewall, sent to the king, with answers afterward following vnto the same.

Ist, forsomuch as man, except he be borne of water, and the holie-ghost, can not enter into the kingdome of God, and forsomuch as the gates of heauen be not open without this blessed sacrament of baptism; therefore we will that our curats shall minister this sacrament at all times of need, as well on the weke daies, as on the holie daies.

2 Item, we will haue our children confirmed of the bishop, whensoever we shall within the diocesse resort vnto him.

3 Item, forsomuch as we constantlie beleue, that after the priest hath spoken the words of consecration being at masse, there celebrating and consecrating the same, there is verie realitie the bodie and blond of our sauour Iesus Christ God and man, and that no substance of bread and wine remaineth after, but the verie selfe same bodie that was borne of the virgin Marie, and was giuen vpon the crosse for our redemption: therefore we will haue masse celebraed as it hath bene in times past, without anie man communicating with the priests, forsomuch as manie ruelie presuming vnworthilie to receiue the same, put no difference betwene the Lords bodie & other kind of meat; some saieing that it is bread before and after, some saieing that it is profitable to no man except he receiue it: with manie other abused termes.

4 Item, we will haue in our churches reseruacion.

5 Item, we will haue holie bread and holie water in the remembrance of Christs precious bodie and blond.

6 Item, we will that our priests shall sing or saie with an audible voice, Gods seruice in the quier of the parish churches, and not Gods seruice to be set forth like a Chistmasse plate.

7 Item, forsomuch as priests be men dedicated to God for ministering and celebrating the blessed sacraments, and preaching of Gods word, we will that they shall liue chaste without marriage, as saint Paule did, being the elect and chosen vessel of God, saieing vnto all honest priests; Be you followers of me.

8 Item, we will that the six articles, which our soveraigne lord king Henrie the eight set forth in his latter daies, shall be vied and so taken as they were at that time.

9 Item, we praye God saue king Edward, for we be his both bodie and gods.

For the pacifieng of these rebels, were appointed by the king and his counsell, sir John Russell knight lord priue seale, the lord Greie of Wilton, sir William Herbert after earle of Penbrooke, sir John Paulet, sir Hugh Paulet, sir Thomas Speake, and others, with a conuenient power of men of warre both on horsebacke and foot. Amongst others, there were certaine strangers that came with my lord Greie, as capteine Germane an Hennover, with a band of horsemen, most part Albanos and Italians. Also capteine Paule Baptiste Spinola an Italian boine of a noble house in Genoa, with a band of Italian footmen. But now the lord priue seals that was ordeined by the king and his counsell, generall of that armie, vpon his first approaching towards them, sent vnto them the kings maiesties proclamation: the effect whereof was, that all such persons as were vnlawfullie assembled, and did not within thre daies next after the proclaiming thereof, yield and submit themselves to the lord priue seale (the kings lieutenant) they should from thenceforth be deemed, accepted, and taken for rebels against his roiall person, and his impertall crowne and dignitie.

And further, the kings maiestie, for a more terror to the rebels, and the incouragement of such other his louing subiects, as should helpe and aid to apprehend anie of the said rebels, he by his said proclamation granted and gaue all the offices, fees, goods and possessions, which the said rebels had at and before their apprehension. This proclamation notwithstanding, the rebels continued in their wicked deuises & traitorous purposes, hastening to the hazards of their owne deaths & bindowings, as the poet saith of the foolish fish swimming to the hidden hook: Occultum visus decurrere piscis ad hamum.

Wherevpon yet once againe the kings maiestie, for the auoiding of the shedding of christian blood, sent vnto them a most gentle and louing message in writing, thereby to reduce them againe to their dutifull obedience: but all would not serue nor auail to moue their obstinate minds to leaue off their desperate and diuelish enterpryse. The message was as followeth.

The kings message to the rebels of Cornewall and Deuonshire.

Although knowledge hath bene giuen to vs, and our dearest uncle the duke of Summerfet gouernor of our person, and protector of all our realms, dominions, and subiects, and to the rest of our priue counsell, of diuerse assemblies made by you, which ought of dutie to be our louing subiects, against all order of law, and other wise than euer anie louing or kind subiects haue attempted against their naturall and liege soueraigne lord: yet we haue thought it met, at this verie first time, not to condemne and reiect you, as we might iustlie doe; but to vse you as our subiects, thinking that the diuell hath not that power in you, to make you of naturall borne Englishmen, so suddenlie to become enemies to your owne native countrie of our subiects, to make you traitors, or vnder pretense to relieue your selues, to destroye your selues, your wiues, children, lands, possessions, and all other commodities of this your life. This we saie, that we trust, that although ye be ignorantlie seduced, ye will not be vpon knowledge, obdurate.

And though some amongst you (as euer there is some cockle amongst good corne) forget God, neglect their prince, esteeme not the state of the realme, but as carelesse & desperat men delite in sedition, tumults & wars: yet neuerthelesse the greater part of you will heare the voice of vs your naturall prince, and will by wisdom and counsell be warned, and cease your evils in the beginning. whose ends will be euen by God almighties order your owne destruction. Wherefore as to you our subiects by ignorance seduced, we speake and be content to vse our princelie authoritie like a father to his children, to admonish you of your faults, not to punish them; to put you in remembrance of your duties, not to auenge your forgetfulness. First, your disorder to rise in multitudes, to assemble your selues against our other louing subiects, to arraie your selues to the war, who amongst you all can answer for the same to almighty God, charging you to obeie vs in all things? How can anie English god hart answer vs, our lawes, and the rest of our verie louing and faithfull subiects, who in deed by their obedience make our honour, estate, and degre?

Disorder in subiects.

Abusing of the kings name.

We vse our name in your writings, and abuse the same against our selfe. What iniurie herein do you vs, to call those which loue vs, to your euill purposes, by the authoritie of our name? God hath made vs your king by his ordinance and prouidence, by our blood and inheritance, by lawfull succession, and our coronation: but not to this end, as you vse our name. We are your most naturall soueraine lord & king, Edward the first, to rule you, to preserve you, to saue you from all your outward enemies, to see our lawes well ministred, euerie man to haue his owne, to suppress disordered people, to correct traitors, theues, pirates, robbers, & such like, yea to keepe our realmes from other princes, from the malice of the Scots, of Frenchmen, of the bishop of Rome. Thus god subiects, our name is written, thus it is honored and obeyed, this maiestie it hath by Gods ordinance, not by mans. So that of this your offense we cannot write to much. And yet doubt not but this is enough from a prince to all reasonable people, from a roiall king to all kindhearted & louing subiects, fro the puissant k. of England, to euerie naturall Englishman.

False causes.

Your pretense, which you saie, moueth you to do thus, and wherewith you seeke to excuse this disorder, we assure you is either false, or so vaine, that we doubt not, that after that ye shall hereby vnderstand the truth thereof, ye will all with one voice acknowledge your selues ignorantlie led, and by error seduced. And if there be anie one that will not, then assure you the same be ranke traitors, enemies of our crowne, seditious people, heretikes, papists, or such as care not what cause they haue to prouoke an insurrection, so they may do it, nor in deed can war so rich with their owne labors & with peace, as they can do with spoiles, with wars, with robberies and such like, yea with the spoile of your owne gods, with the liuing of your labors, the sweat of your bodies, the food of your owne households, wiues and children: such they be, as for a time vse pleasant persuasions to you, and in the end will cut your throates for your owne gods.

Baptisme.

You be borne in hand, that your children, though necessarie chance, shall not be christened but vpon the holie daies: how false this is, learne you of vs. Our booke which we haue set forth by free consent of our whole parlement in the English tongue teacheth you the contrarie, euen in the first lease, yea the first side of the first lease of that part which intreateth of baptism. God subiects (so) to other we speake not, looke & be not deceived. They which haue put this false opinion into your eares, they meane not the christening of children, but the destruction of you our christened subiects. Be this knowne vnto you, that our honor is so much, that we may not be found faultie of one tote or word: yeaue it, if by our lawes you may not christen your children when ye be disposed vpon necessitie, euerie daie or houre in the weeke, then might you be offended: but seeing you may do it, how can you beleue them that teach you the contrarie? What thinke you they meane in the rest, which moue you to breake your obedience against vs, your king & soueraine, vpon these so false tales & persuasions in so euident a matter? Wherefore all you which will acknowledge vs your soueraine lord, and which will heare the voice of vs your king, may easilie perceiue how you be deceived, and how subtilie traitors and papists, with their falsehood seeke to achieve and bring their purpose to passe with your helpe. Euerie traitor will be glad to dissemble his treason, and see it secretlie: euerie papist his poperie, and nourish it inwardlie, and in the end make you our subiects partakers of treason and poperie, which in the beginning was pretended to be a commonweale and holiness.

And how are you seduced by them, which put in your heads the blessed sacrament of Christs bodie, should not differ from other common bread? If our lawes, proclamations, and statutes be all to the contrarie, why shall anie priuat man persuade you against them? We do our selfe in our owne hart, our counsell in all their profession, our lawes and statutes in all purposes, our god subiects in all our doings most highlie esteeme that sacrament, and vse the communion thereof to our most comfort. We make so much difference thereof from other common bread, that we thinke no profit of other bread, but to mainteine our bodies: but this blessed bread we take to be the verie food of our soules to euermoring life. How thinke you, god subiects, shall not we being your prince, your lord, your king by Gods appointment, with truth more preuaile, than certeine euill persons with open falsehood? Shall anie seditious person persuade you that the sacrament is despised, which is by our lawes, by our selfe, by our counsell, and by all our god subiects esteemed, used, participated, and daily receiued? If euer ye were seduced, if euer deceived, if euer traitors were beleued, if euer papists poisoned god subiects, it is now. It is not the christening of children, nor the reuerence of the sacrament, nor the health of your soules that they shot at, god subiects: it is sedition, it is high treason, it is your destruction they seeke. How craftie, how pitiouslie, how cunninglie so euer they do it, with one rule iudge ye the end, which of force must come of your purposes.

Almighty God forbiddeth vpon paine of euermoring damnation, disobedience to vs your king, and in his place we rule in earth. If we should be slow, would God erre? If your offense be towards God, thinke you it is pardoned without repentance? Is Gods iudgement mutable? Your paine is damnation, your iudge is incorruptible, your fault is most euident. Likewise are ye euill informed in diuerse other articles, as for confirmation of your children, for the masse, for the maner of your seruice of mattins and euen song. Whatsoeuer is therein ordered, hath bene long debated, and consulted by manie learned bishops, doctors, and other men of great learning learning in this realme concluded, in nothing so much labour and time spent of late time, nothing so faulie ended. As for seruice in the English tong hath manifested reasons for it, and yet perchance seemeth to you a new seruice, and yet in deed is none other but the old. The selfe same wordes in English which were in Latin, saving a few things taken out, so fond that it had bene a shame to haue heard them in English, as all they can iudge which list to report the truth.

The difference is, that we ment godlie, that you our subiects should vnderstand in English, being our naturall countrie tong, that which was heretofore spoken in Latine, then seruing onelie them which vnderstand Latine, & now for all you that be borne English. How can this with reason offend anie reasonable man, that he should vnderstand what anie other saith, and so to consent with the speaker? If the seruice in the church were good in Latine, it remaineth good in English: for nothing is altered, but to speake with knowledge, that before was spoken with ignorance: and to let you vnderstand what is said for you, to the intent you maie further it with your owne deuotion, an alteration to the better, except knowledge be worse than ignorance. So that whosoeuer hath moued you to mislike this order, can giue you no reason, nor answer yours, if ye vnderstand it.

Wherefore you our subiects, remember we speake to you, being ordeined your prince and king by almighty God, if anie wise we could aduance Gods honour more than we do, we would do it, and see that ye become subiects to Gods ordinance. Obieie vs your prince, and learne of them which haue authoritie to teach you, which haue power to rule you, and will create our iustice, if we be prouoked. Learne not of them whose fruits be nothing but wilfulnesse, disobedience, obstinacie, & destruction of the realme. For the masse, we assure you, no small studie & travail hath bene spent by all the learned clergie therein, and to auoid all contention thereof, it is brought enen to the verie use as Christ left it, as the apostles used it, as holie fathers deliuered it: indeed somewhat altered from that which the popes of Rome for their lucre brought to it. And although you maie heare the contrarie of some popish and euil men, yet our maiestie, which for our honoz maie not be blemished nor stained, assureth you, that they deceiue you, abuse you, and blow these opinions into your heads for to furnish their owne purposes.

And so likewise iudge you of confirmation of children, and let them answer you this one question. Thinke they that a child christened is damned, because he dieth before bishopping? Sparke god subiects, what inconuenience hereof commeth. Our doctrine therefore is founded vpon true learning, and theirs vpon thamelesse errors. To conclude, beside our gentle manner of information to you, whatsoever is contained in our booke, either for baptisme, sacrament, masse, confirmation and seruice in the church, is by parlement established, by the whole clergie agreed, yea by the bishops of the realme deuised, & further by Gods word confirmed. And how dare you trust, yea how dare you giue eare without trembling, to anie singular person to disallow a parliament; a subiect to persuaide against our maiestie, or anie man of his single arrogancie against the determination of the bishops, and all the cleergie, anie intended argument against the word of God?

But now yea our subiects, we resort to a greater matter of your unkindnesse, a great unnaturalnesse, and such an euill, that if we thought it had not bene begun of ignorance, and continued by persuation of certaine traitors amongst you, which we thinke few in number, but in their doings busie, we could not be persuaided but to ble our sword and do iustice: and as we be ordeined of God for to redresse your errors by auengement. But loue and zeale yet our cometh our iust anger, but how long that will be, God knoweth, in whose hand our heart is; and rather for your owne causes, being our christened subiects, we would ye were persuaided than vanquished, taught than ouerthrowne, quietlie pacified than rigorously persecuted. We require to haue the statute of six articles reuinded. And know you what ye require? We know ye what ease ye haue with the losse of them: They were lawes made, but quicklie repented; to bloudie they were to be borne of our people, yet at the first in deed made of some necessitie. Wh subiects how are ye trapped by euil persons? We of pitie, because they were bloudie, toke them awaie, and you now of ignorance will aske them againe. You know full well that they helped vs to extend right, and gaue vs cause to braue our sword vertie often.

And since our mercie moued vs to write our lawes with milke and equitie, how are ye blinded to aske them in bloud? But leauing this manner of reasoning, and resorting to the truth of our authoritie, we let you wit, the same hath bene aduulled by parliament with great reioice of our subiects, and not now to be called in question. And dareth anie of you with the name of a subiect, stand against an act of parliament, a law of the realme? What is our power if lawes should be thus neglected? What is your suertie if lawes be not kept? Alasce you most foolish, that we of no earthlie thing vnder the heauen make such reputation as we do of this one, to haue our lawes obied, & this cause of God to be thoroughly maintained, from the which we will neuer remoue a heares brydth, nor giue place to anie creature liuing; but therein will spend our whole roiall person, our crowne, treasure, realme, and all our state, whereof we assure you of our high honoz. For herein resteth our honoz, herein do all kings knowledg vs a king. And shall anie one of you dare breathe or thinke against our kingdome and crowne?

In the end of this your request (as we be giuen to vnderstand) ye would haue them stand in force till our full age. To this we thinke, that if ye know what ye spake, ye would not haue vttered the motion, nor neuer giuen breath to such a thought. For that thinke you of our kingdome? We we of lesse authoritie for our age? We we not your king now as we shall be? Shall ye be subiects hereafter, and now are ye not? Haue we not the right we shall haue? If ye would suspend and hang our doings in doubt vntill our full age, ye must first know, as a king we haue no difference of yeares, but as a naturall man and creature of God we haue youth, and by his suffrance shall haue age. We are your rightfull king, your liege lord, the soveraigne prince of England, not by our age, but by Gods ordinance; not onelie when we shall be one and twentie yeares of age, but when we were of ten yeers. We possesse our crowne not by yeares, but by the blood and descent from our father king Henrie the eight. If it be considered, they which moue this matter, if they durst bitter themselves, would denie our kingdome.

But our good subiects know their prince, and will increase, not diminish his honoz, enlarge his power, not abate it, knowledg his kingdome, not deferre it to certeine yeares. All is one, to speake against our crowne, and to denie our kingdome, as to require that our lawes maie be broken vnto one and twentie yeares. We we not your crowned, anointed, and established king? Wherein be we of lesse maiestie, of lesse authoritie, or lesse state, than our progenitors kings of this realme, except your unkindnes, your unnaturalnesse will diminish our estimation?

The authoritie of a parliament.

We haue hitherto since the death of our father, by the good aduise and counsell of our deare and intirely beloved vncle the duke of Summerset, and gouernor and protectour, kept our estate, maintained our realme, preferred our honour, defended our people from all enemies. We haue hitherto bene feared and dread of our enemies, yea of princes, kings, and nations. Yea herein we be nothing inferiour to anye our progenitors, which grace we acknowledge to be giuen vs from God, and how else, but by god obedi-10 ence, god counsell of our magistrates, and by the au- thoritie of our kingdome.

England hitherto hath gained honour during our reigne: it hath wone of the enemy, and not lost. It hath bene maruelled that we of so yong yeares haue reigned so noble, so roiallie, so quietlie. And how chanceth that you our louing subiects of that our countrie of Cornewall and Devonshire, will giue occasion to stander this our realme of England, to giue courage to the enemy, to note our realme of the euill of rebellion, to make it a piete to our old en-20 mies, to diminish our honour which God hath giuen, our father left, our god vncle and counsell preferred vnto vs: What greater euill could ye commit, than euen now when our forren enemy in Scotland, and vpon the sea seeketh to invade vs, to do our realme dishonour, than to arise in this maner against our law, to prouoke our wrath, to aske our vengeance, and to giue vs an occasion to spend that force vpon you, which we meant to bestow vpon our enemies, to begin to haie you with that sword that we drew forth against Scots, and other enemies, to make a conquest of our owne people, which otherwise should haue bene of the whole realme of Scotland.

Thus farre we haue descended from our high maiestie, for loue to consider you in your simple ignorance, and haue bene content to send you an instruction like a father, who of iustice might haue sent you your destructions like a king to rebels. And now we let you know, that as you see our mercie abundant-lie, so if ye prouoke vs further, we sweare to you by the liuing God, ye shall see the power of the same God in our sword, which how mightie it is, no subiect knoweth; how puissant it is, no priuat man can iudge; how mortall, no Englishman dare thinke.
But fuerlie, fuerlie, as your lord and prince, your or-lie king and maister, we saie to you, repent your selues, and take our mercie without delate: or else we will forthwith extend our princelie power, and execute our sharpe sword against you, as against in-fideles and Turks, and rather aduenture our owne roiall person, state, and power, than the same should not be executed.

And if you will proue the example of our mercie, learne of certeine which latlie did arise, as they per-ceiuing pretended some griefes, and yet acknowledging their offenses, haue not onelie most humble their pardon: but seele also by our order, to whome onelie all publike order appertineth, present redresse of their griefes. In the end, we admonish you of your duties to God, whome ye shall answer in the daie of the Lord, & of your duties toward vs, whome ye shall answer by our order, and take our mercie whilest God so inclineth vs, least when ye shall be constrained to aske, we shall be too much hardened in heart to grant it you. And where ye shall heare now of mercie, mercie, and life, ye shall then heare of iustice, iustice, and death. Written the eight of Julie, in the thirde yeare of our reigne.

Although the rebels receiued this princelie message, & wholesome admonition from the kings maiestie, yet would they not reforme themselves, as dutyfull subiects ought to haue done, but stood still in their wicked begun rebellion, offering to trie it at the weapons point. There wanted not pikes and other busse bodics among them, such as by all waies and meanes possible sought to kindle the coles of malice and hatred betwixt the king and his subiects; which as the maner is among all the like wicked disposed people, contriued to raise and strete abroad false forged tales, and feined rumors, giuing it out, that the people should be constrained to paie a rattable taske for their sheepe and cattell, and an excise for euerie thing that they should eate or drinke. These and such other slanderous bytutes were spread abroad by those children of Beliall, whereby the cankered minds of the rebels might the more be hardened and made stiffe from plieing vnto anye reasonable persuasion, that might be made to moue them to returne vnto their dutifull obedience, as by the lawes both of God and man they were bounden: and so it came to passe. For the rebellious rout were growne to an obstinacie, seeming so far from admitting persuasions to submission, that they became resolute in their pestilent actions; willfullie following the worst, which they knew full well would redound to their detriment; and auoiding the best, which they doubted not might turne to their auantage, agreeable in sense and meaning vnto that of the poet:

Qua nocere sequar, fugiam qua profere credam.

Herevpon when no hope was left to procure them by any quiet meanes to laie downe armes, the lord 30 pryncie seale, and the lord Greie, with their forces, although not comparable with the rebels in number, about the latter end of Julie set vpon them, and by great manhood put them from their ground, notwithstanding they fought verie stoutlie, & gaue it not ouer for a litle: and although they were thus driuen to giue place at this first onset, yet they got togither againe, and aboad a new charge, defending their ground, & doing what they could to beat backe and repell those that came to assaile them. But ne-uertheless through the power of the almightie God 40 fauouring the rightfull cause, the rebels were distressed, and followed in chase with great slaughter for the space of two miles. This was about the beginning of August.

Their chiefe captiues, to wit, Humfreie Arundell, Whinsland, Holmes, and Burie, were taken and brought by to London. There were taken also others of their captiues, as Thomas Underhill, John Soleman, William Segar, Cempson, and 50 Barret, which two last were priests; also Woier and Henrie Le, two matozs, all the which were executed in one place or other, as they had well deserved. The said Woier being matoz of Bodmin in Cornewall, (as Grafton reporteth) had bene a busse fellow among the rebels, to set them forward in mischief: howbeit some that loued him sought to excuse him, as if he had bene forced hereto against his will by the rebels, who would haue killed him, and burnt his house, if he had not consented to them. But how-60 soeuer it was, sir Anthonie Kingston that was prouost marshall in the kings armie vnder the lord pry-ncie seale, wrote his letter vnto the said matoz, signifieng to him, that he and other with him should come and dine with him such a daie. The matoz seeming to be glad thereof, made the best purueance he could to receiue them, and at the time appointed, sir Anthonie Kingston came with his companie, and were right hartlie welcomed of the matoz. But before they sat downe to dinner, calling the matoz aside, he told him that there must be execution done in that tostone, and therefore willed him that a paire of gallowes might be framed and set by with speed, so that they might be readie by that time that they should make an end of dinner.

Sir Antho-Kingston pro-uolk marshall.

The maior with all diligence caused the same to be done: so that when dinner was ended, sir Anthonie calling the maior to him, and asking whether the gallies were set up accordinglie as he had willed, the maior answered that they were readie. Wherewith sir Anthonie taking the maior by the hand, desired him to bring him to the place where they stood, and comming thither and beholding them, he said to the maior: Thinke you maister maior that they be strong enough? Hea sir, quoth he, that they are. Well then said sir Anthonie, get you euen by vnto them, for they are provided for you. The maior greatlie as-bashed herewith, said: I trust you meane no such thing to me. Sir said he, there is no remedie, ye haue bene a busse rebell, and therefore this is appointed for your reward: and so without respect of state, there was the maior hanged.

The maior of Kingston hanged

At the same time, & nere the same place dwelled a miller that had bene a great doer in that rebellion, for whom also sir Anthonie Kingston sought: but the miller being thereof warned, called a good tall fellow that he had to his seruant, and said vnto him: I haue businesse to go from home, if anie therefore come to aske for me, saie thou art the owner of the mill and the man for whom they shall so aske, and that thou hast kept this mill for the space of three peares, but in no wise name me. The seruant promised his maister so to do. And shortly after came sir Anthonie Kingston to the millers house, and calling for the miller, the seruant came forth, and answered that he was the miller. How long, quoth sir Anthonie, hast thou kept this mill? He answered three peares. Well then said he, come on, thou must go with me, and caused his men to late hands on him, and to bring him to the next tree, saieing to him: Thou hast bene a busse knaue, and therefore here shalt thou hang. Then cried the fellow out, and said that he was not the miller, but the millers man. Well then, said sir Anthonie, thou art a false knave to be in two tales, therefore said he, hang him by: and so incontinentlie hanged he was in deed. After he was dead, one that was present, told sir Anthonie; Sorelie sir this was but the millers man. What then said he, could he ever haue done his maister better seruice than to hang for him?

Many other were executed by order of the marshall law, & a great part of the countrie abandoned to the spoile of the souldiers, who were not shewfull to gleane what they could find for the time their libertie lasted. Thus far the report of this rebellious boile, whereupon it first kindled, by what meanes the same sparkled and became a flame, and what deuises were used to ertingniss & quench it. Wherein we see how prone the people are to rise by routs upon occasions of discontentments; how hastie and readie to undertake dangerous enterprises, how willfull and obstinate to persist in their pernicious proceedings, how cold-hearted and hopelesse when they see the course of their plots of perilous policie either interrupted, undermined, or ouerthrowne; and finally, what a reprochfull reward redoundeth both to the ringleaders in rebellions, as also what falleth to the shares of all such as shake hands and become confederats to the furthering and strengthening of riots, mutinies, insurrections, commotions, and hurleburles. Whereby the state is disquieted, & that more is the prince drawne into a conceipt of suspecting his subjects loialties; besides a twiced president to posterities, without feare of shame, remorse of conscience, regard to allegiance, or foresight of afterclaps, to attempt the like. Now it resteth, that for the further truth and knowledge hereof, we adde a new report (new I meane, in respect of the publication, hauing not heretofore bene printed) though old enough, and sufficientlie warranted by the reporter, who upon his owne notice hath deliuered nalesse in writing, than himselfe upon verie good and infallible grounds obserued, and hath left testified in the discourse following; wherein there is not one

The description of the citie of Exces-ter, and of the sundrie assaults giuen to the same: collected and gathered by Iohn Howell (alias Hooker) gentleman and chamberleine of the same.

Excester or Excester is a famous and an ancient citie, being the metropole and Emporium of the west parts of England, situated and lieng in the prouince sometime called Dumnonia, that is to saie, the countrie of ballies: for whereas are manie hilles (as that countrie is full of hilles and mounteins) there are manie ballies. But in a corruptie it is named Denonia, or Denonshire, and not Daneashire of the Danes, as some would haue it.
Of the first foundation thereof, by reason of the sundry inuasions of foren nations, who with their hostilities and cruell warres did burne and destroye the same, there remaineth no certaine memorie, neither among the records of the said citie, ne yet in anie one other writer.

Dumnonia, the

But most certaine it is, that it was first builded and founded by the Britons or Brites. For the names which they gaue and vied, are yet at this present had in remembrance, as well among the chronographers of this land, as also among the Cornish people, who were sometimes one with this prouince; but now in a countie of themselves, and next bordering to this, and in the same diocesse. And they are the remanent of the blood of Brutus. For when Canwallader king of this land, by reason of a great famine and pestilence was driven to forsake the same, & to flie into little Britaine named Armodica, which is now vnder the dition of the French king: diuers & the most part of his people fled, some into Wales, and some into Cornwall, where euer since they and after them their posteritie haue remained and continued.

50

The old chonographers, searchers, and writers of antiquities doe find, that this citie was called Corinia, and thereof the cathedrall church of the same was (as Bale saith) named Ecclesia Corinensis: which name, if it were first giuen by Corinus (as Leland writeth) who after the arriual of Brutus into this land, was made the first duke of this whole west countrie of Denon and Cornetwall, which were both comprised vnder the name of Corinia, and whereof this citie euer hath bene and is the metropole, and alwaies parcell sometime of the kingdome, then of the duchie, and after of the earledome, and now againe of the duchie of Cornwall: then out of doubt this citie is of no lesse antiquitie than the said names do import. It was also called Augusta. Of this name there were diuerse cities, so named by the Romans; but this onelie was named Augusta Britannorum, and so called (as some thinke) by the Romans at the conclusion of the peace made at the siege of this citie be-twene king Arutragus and Trespasian colonell of the Romane armie vnder Claudius Augustus. The Britons in their tong or language do call this citie by sundrie names: the first and eldest in remembrance is call Denhulgoile, that is to saie, the properous perons this se tolvne in the wood, as doth appere by Geffric of Monmouth, and Ponticus Viruuius. It was also called Pennehaltecaire, that is, the chiefe citie of tolvne upon the hill; as doth appere in a trauerse betwene the bishop, deane, and chapiter of this citie of the one partie; and the maior, bailiffe, and communalitie of the other partie, concerning their liberties. But the names which the Cornish people do at these presents remember & retein, are special-lie these, Pennecaire, Caire ruth, Caireiske. Pennecaire signifieth, and is to saie, the chafe citie. Caire ruth signifieth the red or reddish citie, so called and taking the name of the ground and soile whereupon it is situated, which is a red earth. Caireiske is the citie of Iske, being so called of the riuer, which the Britons name Iske, and doth fast by the same. And of this name Houeden in his chronicle maketh mention, saying thus: Anno Domini 877 exercitus Dana-rum ab Wareham nocte quadam, federe disrupto, ad Exan-cestre diuerterunt, quod Britannice dicitur Caireiske.

Ptolomeus the famous astronomer, who was about the yere of our Lord 162, Cocell being king of this land, nameth this citie Isca; and the riuer Iscaca. And Bale the searcher of antiquities following the same opinion, doth also name the citie Isca, and the inhabitants therein Iskans. But vnder correction be it spoken, a man maie well thinke that Ptolomeus being in Alexandria, and so farre distant from this land, was misinformed, or the print mistaken. For it is most likelie that the riuer should be named Isca according to the British speech, wherein it was called Isca; and which name by transposing of the two middle letters, doth at this present re-maine being now named Isca or Exa. But whatsoever the censures and opinions of Ptolomeus and of Bale, who wrote onelie vpon report, be herein, it is certeine, that the names which the Brites or Bri-tons gaue, were of longest continuance. And this citie was called by their denominations, by the space of fiftene hundred yeres, vntill the coming of the Saxons, the Pias, and the Scots into this realme, which was about the yere of our Lord foure hundred and fiftie. For they, where, and whensoever they preuailed in any place, did for the most part alter and change the names of all places & tolvnes, accounting it a great renoume, as also a perpetuall memoiall of their chivalrie, to giue new names, either of their owne deuises, or of their owne native countries; for so is it written of them: Picti, Scoti, An-gli, Daci, & Normanni in hac insula rerum potiti, cuncta immutarunt, pro trophæis habentes, loca à se deuictis noua impone-re nomina. The Saxons therefore as of all other cities & tolvnes (few excepted) so of this also they changed and altered the old names and called it Sponketon; and by which name it was so called by the space of three hundred and od yeres, and vntill the time of king Athelstane: for he about the yere of our Lord nine hundred thirtie and two, being much grieved and vniquieted with the rebellion of the Cornish people, because they refused and denied to acknowledge him for their lawfull king, did bend his force, & conduct his armie against them. And hauing subdued and preuailed ouer them, he returned to this citie: and while he rested here, he repaired the same; and the walles which before were but mightie ditches of earth, and the banks set with great poles of timber now destroyed, he builded all of square stone, as it is recorded: Hanc urbem primis Athelstanus in potestatem Anglorum fugatis Britonibus reductam, turribus muni-uit, & muræ quadratis lapidibus tandem cinxit. And then he altered and changed the former names; and called it after the name of the riuer Essetera or Exeterra, that is to saie, Exeter. For so is it written, Est Exonia viles Deuonie: comitatibus, sedo præcelsa ad accidentem versus posita: abluuntur flumine Exi, à quo nomen habet.

Others name it of the riuer flowing by it, which they saie is named Excestria, & thus they write: Clarissima urbium est Excestria, quæ ab anni Excestro qui eandem præterfluit est sic nuncupata. I find it also written in an old chronicle, that it is named Exancestria or Exancestrie: which shuld seme to be so called by the Saxons. For the most part of the cities, tolvnes, & forts, which they builded or reedified, did end in cestre; as Clocestre, 10 Lecestre, Panchestre, Winchestre, Dicestre, Wol-cestre, Colcestre, Cicestre, Icestre, Bicestre, & this citie of Excestre with others. For Caire in British & Cestre in Saronish are one thing, & do signifie in English a fort, towre, or castell. This citie (as is before said) being walled about with stone by king A-thelstane is not altogether foure square, but decli-neth somewhat toward a roundelle, and containeth in circuit or compasse sixtenc hundred whole pa-ses, after due fast to a pise; which accounting after the Italian maner one thousand pases to a mile, it is a mile and halfe about, & somewhat more. The situation of this citie is verie pleasant and delicate, being set vpon a little hill among manie hilles. For the whole countrie round about is mounteinous and full of hilles. It is pendent towards the south and west parts, after and in such sort, that be the streets neuer so foule or filthie, yet with a shoure of raine they are cleasde and made sweet. And albeit hilles are commonlie drie, yet nature is so beneficiall to this litle hill, that it is in euerie quarter full of water springs: & by that meanes the whole citie is throug-lie furnished with welles and stirpits; the great god benefit and commoditie whereof hath well appeared in sundrie times of necessitie, and especiallie in the time of the late commotion, which was in the yere of our Lord 1549. For albeit the enimie, by breaking and spoiling of the pipes or canales, whereby water was conueied to the founteins of the citie, from cer-teine springs distant not a mile from the same, did abridge them of that water: yet most comfortable they did inioy without impeachment the welles and stirpits within the walles, which abundantly flowed with waters to the satisficing of all people therein.
There are also within this citie certeine founteins or conduits, whereunto, throug certeine canales or pipes of lead, the waters from certeine springs, rising in the fields not far from the citie, are brought and conueied. And these waters are of most price, because by the carriage thereof they are purified, and made lighter than are the other waters springing within the citie: and by that means more meet for dressing of meats. Of these conduits two are speciall, the one of them standeth and is within the cemiterie or churchyard of the cathedrall church of the said citie, and is called saint Peters conduit: the other being of great antiquitie standeth in the middle of the citie, at the meeting of foure principall streets of the same, and thereof sometimes it toke his name, being called the conduit at Quatrefois 60 or Carfor; but now the great conduit.
At the higher end of this citie is a verie old and ancient castell, named Rugemont, that is to saie the red hill, taking that name of the red soile or earth whereupon it is situated. The site or situation of it is eminent and aboue both the citie and countrie adioining: for they do all lie as it were vnder the lee thereof. It hath a goodlie and pleasant prospect towards the seas: for betwene that and it is no hill at all. It is strongly ditched round about, and was first builded (as some thinke) by Iulius Cesar; but rather and in truth by the Romans after him when they had their recourse to it for their defense, refuge, and abode, manie yeres. The same was sometimes the palace of such kings, as vnto whom the king-built by the Romans.

At the lower end and part of this citie, without the wals, floweth a goodlie and a pleasant river, which the Britons called Alis; Ptolomeus by misinformation named it Isaca: but the other old writers named it Elfe, Exe, Exa, or Excessum: and these names be retained at these presents. It hath his head or spring in a certeine moze or desert distant from the citie nere about foure and twentie miles, called Ermoze. It floweth into the maine seas about eight miles from the citie, at a place named Ermoze, and by the waie it is increased with sundrie rivers, brooks & lakes, the chiefe of which are Erredie and Collome. It is well stored and is plentifull of samon, trout, peale, dace, pike, and other like freshwater fishes: which albeit they be verie good and delicate, and especiallye the samon and pike: yet they are the lesse esteemed, because the seas being so nere do furnish the citie & countrie verie abundantlie with sundrie kinds of sea fishes most delicate.

The maine seas are not distant from the citie above eight miles, out of which cometh an arme serving for the port of the same: which (as doth appeare by certeine old and ancient records) did sometimes flow up to the verie wals of the citie, where boats and vessels were wont to be laden and unladen of all kind of wares and merchandizes, at a proper place appointed for the same: which at these presents keepeth his old and ancient name, and is called the watergate. The decaye thereof hapned about the reare of our Lord 1312, by one Hugh Courtneie the third of that name, and earle of Deuon: who being offended and incensed against this citie, his wrathfull humors could not be satisfied, untill by some means he did impaire and annoie the state of the commonwealth of the same. And seeing that among other commodities, the use of the haven and watercourse to the citie to be one of the chiefest, he was never quiet untill he had destroyed the same: wherefore minding to performe what he had conceived, he did in the yeare of our Lord 1313, the first yeare of king Edward the second, enterpryse & begin his pretended devile and mischief.

And first whereas the ladie Isabella de Fortibus, countesse of Armerle and of Deuon, his ancestrie had builded certeine wiers upon the river of Exe (the propriete and seignorie whereof did appertene to the citie) the one of the west side of the river of Exe in Erminster parish, and the other of the east side of the same river in the parish of Topesham; leaving betwene the said two wiers a certeine aperture or open space of thirtie foot, thozough which all boats and vessels without let or hinderance might have and had their usuall passage and repassage, to and from the citie unto the seas: the said earle to abridge and destroye this great benefit and commoditie, did leaue and build a newe wiere in the said aperture or open come, stopping, filling, and quiering the same, with great trees, timber, and stones, in such sort, that no vessel nor vessels could passe or repasse.

After him Edward Courtneie earle of Deuon, and nephew to the said Hugh, did not onelie maintain and continue the doings of his ancestoz, by his daileie reparing and defending the same: but also to worke an utter destruction for ever, of anie passage or repassage to be had thenceforth to and from the said citie; under pretense to build and make certeine mills, did erect two other wiers, the one at saint James overthwart the whole river, and the other at Lampresford: by means thereof not onelie the citie did susteine the whole losse of the haven, but the whole countrie also was surrounded about it, and in process of time altogether, and as it is at these presents covered with salt waters. For which griefs and injuries upon complaints made thereof, diverse sundrie writs and commissions of inquirie were awarded and granted by the king; and the said earles by sundrie inquisitions and verdicts found guiltie. And yet notwithstanding, such was their power and authority, and such was the iniquitie of those daies, as no iustice could take place, nor law have his due course against them.

Furthermoze also the foresaid Hugh, to increoch the gaine and commoditie of the lading & unloading of merchandizes within the port & river to himselfe, did build a keie and a crane in the river at his towne of Topesham, distant from the citie about thre miles; and by power did enforce and compell all manner of merchants arriving within that port to unlade & lade all their wares and merchandizes brought within that port (to be laden and unladen) there onelie. And from thence, ever since, all wares and merchandizes have bene caried and recaried to and from the citie by horse, cart, and waiane, though to the gaine of the earle and his tenants, yet to the great trouble and hinderance of the citie and merchants of the same. Nevertheless, the port hath evermoze and yet doth keepe his old and ancient name, being called the port of the citie of Exceller: and alwaies hath bene and presentlie is paid a tribute unto the citie, by the name of the towne custome, for all kind of wares and merchandizes, discharged within that port or river, or the members thereof.

And although the watercourse thus being destroyed can hardly be restored to his old piffinate and naturall estate; for that thozough long continuance the old course can not be discerned: yet now at length after manie attempts and with great expences, a watercourse and passage begun in the yeare 1564, is recovered, and by certeine success, boats and vessels of fiftene or sixtene tons are conveyed and brought up to the citie, and there discharged at the old and ancient place, called the watergate: & where is builded a verie faire large keie or wharfe, as also an engine called a crane fit for the purpose. Within the citie were somtimes but few parish churches, untill the time of Innocentius the third: who when in the yeare 1198 he had established the doctrine of transubstantiation, and had made it an article of the symbole, as appeareth in the decretals, Titulo de summa trinitate, canone Firmiter: then his next successor Honorius the third, in the yeare 1218 did not onelie confirme the same, but also by decree did establish reservation, candlelight, and praier for the dead, as doth appeare, Decret. tit. de celebratione missarum, canone Sane cum, & Sane cum creatura: by which meanes the number of sacrificing & massing priests did not onelie increase, but churches also and chapels began in all places and everie where to be builded and erected.

And among others in this citie in the yeare 1222 and the first yeare of king Henrie the third, the parish churches were limited, and increased to the number of ninetene churches within the citie and suburbs, and were called by the name of the christianitie even to this daie. Curie of which in times past was a sufficient and competent living to mainteine a massing sacrificer; for such and so great was the blind devotion of the people then in that Romish religion: but the same now being abolished, and the gospel preached, the livelihoods are so small, as not sufficient for the most part to mainteine a poore clerke or scholar, & by reason thereof, the most part of them doe lie void and vacant, without incumbent.

A monasterie of saint Benets order builded in Excester.

King Ethelred the first founder of the monasterie. King Edgar founder of a religious house in Excester. The cathedrall church was first a monasterie and founded by king Athelstane. Chronica ecclesie.

Besides these parish churches, there was also a monasterie, sometimes of monks of saint Benets order, but since a cathedrall church, being of a verie faire and sumptuous building of freestone and with beautifull pillars of grate marble. It standeth and is situated in the east part of the citie; and (as some report) was first founded and built by king Ethelred, the third sonne to king Ethelwolphus. Some thinke that king Edgar did it. True it is that euerie of them builded a house for religious persons within this citie, of which the one was spoiled and burned by the Danes, and the other in procelle of time was vnted to the monasterie, which is now the cathedrall church. But the cathedrall church it selfe was founded & builded by king Athelstane, the sonne to king Edward the elder: for so is it recorded in the historie of the same church, the words whereof are these: Athelstannus subingatus Cornugualensibus, reuersus est ad ciuitatem, qua antiquitus Monkton vocabatur, nunc autem Exeter: ac ibi sedens, anno Dom. 932, non tam lacerata eiusdem ciuitatis moenia reparabat, quin et mansum quoddam dedit ad fundandum monasterium pro monachis, Deo et sancto Petro famulantibus.

This king besides his great charges and expenses in building of this church, which at the first was but small, and that part which is now called the Ladie chapell, he placed therein monkes of S. Benets order, provided liuelihoods for them, and appointed a ruler or gouernour ouer them, and who was called by the name of an abbat, towards whose diet and liuelihood he gaue sporeshull and Tresuroys beere: and which at these presents doe remaine to the said church and are annexed to the dignitie of the treasurer-shipp of the same. The church being thus begun, kings, princes, & noble men were from time to time gladlie and willinglie verie liberall contributors to the absolving and finishing of the same. For about foure score years after king Athelstane, king Kanoght who was also named Cahutus or Canutus, at the earnest sute of one of his dukes named Athelred, did confirme and grant to Athelwood then abbat of the said church, and to his successors manie and sundrie priuileges and liberties, vnder his letters patents, dated the second yeare of his reigne, Anno Domini, 1019.

King Edward the confessor remoued the monkes into westminster, and made this a cathedrall church. Leofricus the first bishop of Excester.

After him about thirtie yeares, king Edward the confessor remoued the monkes into Westminster, and made this church a cathedrall church, and remoued the bishops see which was then at Crediton into this citie, making Leofricus bishop thereof, and whom he and his wife quene Edith did put in possession of the same, as appeareth by his letters patents dated the eight yeare of his reigne, Anno Dom. 1050. Whoboeit the monke of Wurie, Polydorus, and others doe affirme and write, that this should be done about the twelue yeare of William the conqueror, for thus they doe write: Habitum est Londini sub Lanfranco, antistitum et sacerdotum comitum, in quo decretum est, quod aliquot sedes episcopales, que in oppidulis et pagis antea fuerant, in urbibus et locis celeberrimis collocarentur, unde factum est ut bathonia, Lincolnia, Sarisburia, Exonia, Cestrina, et Ciceria urbes, huiusmodi nouis episcoporum domicilijs sunt nobilitate.

The charter of the church.

But the reuerence of these writers referred, this cannot be true concerning this church, because the words of the charter thereof doe witnesse the contrarie, and declare expresselie, how that king Edward and quene Edith his wife did put Leofricus the first bishop in possession, the one by the one hand and the other by the other hand, leading him betwene them vp to the high altar, and there put his hands vpon the same: And yet it may be true, that at the first said councell, this remouing and placing of this bishop might be ratified and confirmed. Likewise William the conqueror, in the third yeare of his reigne 1069, did not onelie confirme the former charter, but also at the instance and request of William Warewest, then his chapleine, but afterwards bishop of the same see, did giue vnto it the seigniories of Plimpton, Hampton, and S. Stephens in Excester, which the said William Warewest being afterwards bishop did distribute, giuing Plimpton to the religious canons, whome he placed there: Hampton was annexed to the deanerie, but S. Stephens was reserved alwaies to the bishop, and to his successors, whereby they are barons, and so lords in the parliament house.

It was also enlarged from time to time with great possessions, reuenues, buildings, riches, priuileges, and sundrie other commodities, by kings, princes, prelates, bishops, and sundrie others. And this one thing is to be noted, that albeit there were about foure hundred yeares distant from the first foundation and building thereof, vnto the ending and finishing of the same; yet it is so vniuersellie and decentlie compact and builded in one mould, as though it had bene done at one instant. The bishop is distinct from the chanons both in house and reuenue: his liuelihoods being no part nor parcell of that which apperteineth to the deane and chapter. It was sometimes of great reuenues and large possessions, but the more part thereof hath bene consumed and exhausted by a wastfull bishop. The bishop and chanons haue verie faire houses, which are situated about the church & cimiterie, and are inclosed euerie night by shutting fast of certeine gates, by which occasion it is called a close, A claudendo: and which gates are to be shut euerie night (except at certeine times) and to be opened euerie morning at certeine hours appointed, as it appeareth by a composition made for the same betwene the communalitie of Excester, and the bishop and deane of the same. In the middle of the cimiterie or churchyard is a verie faire fontaine or conduit of water conueyed by certeine pipes of lead from out of the same felde, as is the cities conduit. And albeit the springs of both waters are in the same felde, and not farre distant: yet this doth excell the other. Out of this well or fontaine waters are conueyed to sundrie of the chanons houses, as also of late vnto the bishops house, and yet it serueth besides the whole close and citie. The citie it selfe is verie populous, and was sometimes chiefele inhabited with clothiers & clothworkers of broad clothes, seruing much for the Spanishe and south countries; and which in those daies were of such goodnesse & substance, that the names of them doe remaine in those countries: but now it is chiefele inhabited with merchants, kerrie-clothiers, and all sorts of artificers, among whom the merchants are the chiefe & welthiest.

The gouernement of this citie was sometimes by foure bailiffes, which before the conquest were called portgreues, that is, the chiefe lords or rulers of the towne: for porta is taken for a towne, and greue in Saronie is Dominus or maior: but after the conquest they were after the French tongue named Præfides, that is to saie Præfides or rulers, and now shewards. Not long after the conquest there was ordered and constituted a senate of six and thirtie persons, but of later yeares by king Henrie the seventh of foure & twentieth persons, out of which number yearelie there was and is chosen one to be the chiefe gouernour for the yeare following; and is called by the name of a maior, whome the barons called Speregreue, that is, Mayor dominus, or the chiefe ruler. This maior associated with the foure prouds of bailiffes, hath the hearing, decerning, and determining in all ciuill causes betwene partie and par-tie, and for which they keepe wexellie upon euerie mondaye a court in the Guildhall of the said citie: but the bailiffes retaining their old and ancient cus-tome, do keepe the like courts, and in the like causes distincall from the mayo: by themselves, at all time and times (the mondayes and festiuall daies excepted) as it shall please them to assigne, and with their court is called by the name of the priuost court.

Thus the mayo: and bailiffes both iocallie and se-nerallie haue iurisdiction to decerne and determine in ciuill matters. But if the matters do touch and concerne the prince, the irrdone, the common peace, and criminall matters, or the publike state of the ci-tie and common-wealth of the same, then the same are decided by the iudges, and iudices, or by the mayo: and common counsell, or by the mayo: himselfe, or by some other officer or officers, according to the nature and qualitie of the cause and offense. But because it requireth a large and speciall course, to describe the gouernment of this citie and common-wealth of the same, the charge of euery officer, the diuision of officers, their seuerall iurisdiccions, and a number of other things incident vnto their charges: there is a particular booke imprinted, and at large the same is set out, in such order as is requisite, and appertaining to the gouernment: whereby euery man may know his office and charge, and what to him doth appertene. And let it suffice, that partie through good gouernment, and partie of a good inclination, the people of this citie haue bene alwayes dutifull and obedient to the king and the lawes: and haue in great awe and reuerence their gouernours and magistrats for the time being. And this one thing is not so strange as worthe to be noted, that euen from the beginning, from time to time they haue bene carefull for their common-wealth, and vigilant for the preseruacion of the same. And as in times of peace and quietnesse the same hath bene well gouerned: so in times troublefome and un-quiet, it hath bene most valiantlie defended against the inuasions and assaults of the enimies, as by sundrye histories it may appeare: whereof for example these few may serue.

First Aruragus king of this land, then named Britaine, minding to staie the land in his ancient estate, freedom and libertie, did withold and denie to paie vnto the Romans the tribute which they did require and demand: wherefore Claudius the emperour sent Trespasian then duke of the Romane armie, into this realme with a great host, either to recouer the tribute, or to subdue the land. This Trespasian is he, who in the foure and twentieth yeare after this his iourneie, did destroye Ierusalem. Wherefore this duke landing in Dorsetshire, then named Totonesum litus, came to this citie, laid siege vnto it, and gaue continuall assaults therevnto, for eight daies continuallie together. Aruragus the king, being then in the east parts of the land, and hearing of this, with a great armie and powere marcheth towards this citie to remoue the siege, and incountereth with the enimie.
The Romane after long fight, and not able to preuaile, is contented to come to parley, and in the end a composition was concluded, as if doth appeare, and is set downe and written by sundrie historiographers. The chronicle of the cathedrall church of the said citie hath these words: Anno Domini 49, Vespasianus cum Romano exercitu ciuitatem nunc vocatam Exeter, octo diebus obsedit, sed minime preualuit, Arurago rege ciuitatis auxilium prestante.

Geffreie of Monmouth hath these words: Vespasianus a Claudio missus est, ut Aruragum vel pacificaret, vel romane subiectioni restitueret. Cum igitur in portu in Rutapi applicare voluisset Vespasianus, obuiauit ei Aruragus, atque prohibuit ne portum ingrederetur. Retraxit itaque se Vespasianus a portu illo, retortisque velis in litore Totonesio applicauit. Nactus deinde tellurem Caier Penbulgoite, que nunc Exonia vocatur obseditur; eandem adiuit, cumque octo diebus eandem obsedisset, superuenit Aruragus cum exercitu suo, praeliumque commisit: die illa, valde laceratus fuit vtro-rumque exercitus, sed neuter est victor, potius, mane autem facto, mediante Genissa regina, concordie effecti sunt. Mathieu of Westminster writeth: Aruragus Britannorum rex in tantam prolapsum est superbia, quod Romane potestatis voluit diutius subiectionem parere. Vespasianus igitur a Claudio missus cum in Rutapi portu applicare incepisset, Arura-gus illi obuia prohibuit ne ingrederetur. At Vespasianus retoris velis in Totonesio litore applicauit, et ciuitatem qua Britannice Caier Penbulgoite, nunc autem Exonia appellatur obsedit: elapsis inde septem diebus Aruragus superuenit, praeliumque commisit, et vtriusque exercitus valde lacerato, mediante Genissa Claudi filia, duces amici facti sunt.

Flores historiarum.

In the historie intituled, Noua historia de gestis Anglorum a Britonibus vsque ad Henricum sextum, is written the like in effect: Vespasianus a Claudio missus est ut Aruragum pacificaret, vel romane ditioni restitueret, cui obuians Aruragus, prohibuit ne terram suam ingrederetur, timens Vespasianus armorum cohortem, retraxit sese, retortisque velis in Totonesio litore est applicatus, atque urbem Exonia obsedit, post septem dies superuenit Aruragus, praelium committitur, laceratusque vtriusque exercitus, sed neuter potuit victoria, demum mediante Genissa regina, reconciliati sunt. It was also in manie troubles and great perplexities, in the vncertaine and troublesome states of this realme, when sometimes the Romans, sometimes the Picts, sometimes the Scots, sometimes the Saxons, and sometimes the Danes made their incursions and warres within this land, by reason whereof the records and memorials in those daies for the most part were lost and confu-med.

And yet Matthew of Westminster writeth that it was besieged by Penda king of Mercia, in the yeare of our Lord 632, in the time of Cadwallin one of the last kings of the Britons. The historie is this, Edwin the Saxon king of the Northumbers, lauing wars against Cadwallin: Cadwallin, did preuaile and had such conquests ouer him, that Cadwallo was driven to forsake his realme of Wales, and to flee into Ireland, where he being, was bene carefull and pensifull how to recouer his countrie again. Wherefore he repareth his armie and gathereth a new force, and gaue sundrie attempts to at-chue to his purpose: but all was in vaine, for he could neuer set foot on land in his countrie.
Edwin was alwayes at hand and in a readinesse to uop and resist the same, for this Edwin had about him in his seruice a man named Pellitus, who was a magician and verie skilfull in necromancie, and who by his art and science did foreteth and declare vnto Edwin what things were a doing and attempted against him.

Pellitus a witch doth foretell to king Edwin of things to come.

Cadwallin hauing continuallie euill successe, was in bitter despaire and distrust to preuaile against Edwin, and therefore as one giuing ouer all, saileth ouer the seas into Armoica now called little Brit-taine, vnto Salomon the king thereof, and vnto him doth disclose his miserable estate and fortune, as also greatlie complaineth of Pellitus and of his force-ries. When these two kings had thoroughlie consulted and debated the matter, it was at length concluded and thought best, that some one man being bold and swift should be sent ouer to the court of king Edwin, to giue the aduenture to kill Pellitus. Where-vpon the matter being discovered to Pellitus nephew to king Cadwallo, he taketh vpon him to enterpise

wallo saileth

terpise the matter, and to coner himselfe from all suspicion, apparelleth himselfe in a poze beggers weed, and so sailleth ouer into England, and traueleth forthwith towards king Edwins court, who then laie at Poike, and there iouneth and accompanieth himselfe among the poze people, whose custome and maner was, to lie about the kings gates at dinner and super times, waiting for the almesse usuallie giuen and wont to be distributed amongst the poze.

Wilemus hili-lith Pellitus.

Pellitus being the kings almoner, and hauing the charge to distribute the said almesse, commeth forth and setteth the poze folke in order. Wilemus being there and amongst them, watcheth his time to worke his purpose, and thrusting himselfe in the middle of the presse of the people, suddenlie with his pointado or weapon which for the purpose he had prepared, thrusteth Pellitus into the bodie, & gaue him a deadlie wound whereof he died, and forthwith (the thing in such a thrust not perceived) thrusteth himselfe auaite priuillie, and through woods, hils, thickets, and dales out of the common waie, commeth to this citie of Excester, & declareth vnto the citizens (who were then Wiltons) what he had done; whereof they were verie glad and iollull, and in good hope that their king Cadwalllo should yet againe returne; and therefore vpon good aduise doo prepare and make ready both themselves and the citie, as well for the resisting of the enemie, as for the receiuing, succouring and aiding of their king.

King Wenda
besiegeth Excester.

King Wenda aduertised of this murder, and vnderstanding the whole course of the matter and practice, taketh in grieffe the iniurie thus done to his neighbor, and countriman king Edwin. And therefore to reuenge the same mustreth his subjects and gathereth a great armie; and vnderstanding that Wilemus was come to this citie marcheth towards the same, and in the end laieth his siege round about it, minding the bitter subuersion thereof. But the citizens manfullie withstanding his force, did defend and keepe both themselves and their citie, untill that king Cadwalllo, who before was aduertised both of the fact of Wilemus and of this preparation of Wenda, did with his force and armie come to the citie, who did not onelie rescue the same; but also ioining the battell with his enemie gaue him the ouerthrow, and so deliuered his countrie, and recouered himselfe and his kingdom.

Polyd. lib. 5

It was also in greater troubles in the time of king Alured or Alfred the fourth sonne to king Ethelwulfus. For Polydorus and others do write, that in the fift yeare of the said kings reigne, the Danes concluded a peace with the said king, and gaue hostages for the true keeping thereof. And yet notwithstanding most perfidiously and falselie contrarie to the same, they assembled themselves, and vpon a sudden marched to this citie, and perforce entered and toke the same: Daci etenim qui religionem & fidem pro suo commodo postponendam ducunt, Londino se mouent, & maximis itineribus Exoniam proficiscuntur, urbem per vim capiunt. But long they inioied not the same, for after that winter passed, the king to be reuenged marcheth with a great power to this citie, which the Danes vnderstanding and thinking themselves too weake to withstand the k. as also utterlie distrusting the citizens, thistred themselves auaite, of which some fled vnto Dartmouth and there toke shipping, and who for the most part were drowned in a tempest at the seas. Some fled to Chipenham or (as some saie) to Bissolow, but the king followed and pursued these so sharplie, that he neuer left nor gaue ouer, untill he had overcome and slaine the captains Hubbert and Hungar.

likewise in the nineteenth yeare of the reigne of the said king, the Danes contrarie to their faith, pledges, and promises, did againe come to this citie, and laie siege to the same: Danorum exercitus anno nona d'octu 877 ab Wicheam nocte quadam gressu dirupto, ad Exoniam castrum, quod Britannie dicitur Caer Eborac, diuertunt, at audito regis aduentu ad puppes fugerunt, in mari praedantes manebant.

It was also besieged by the said Danes in the nineteenth yeare of king Egfred, in the yeare of our Lord 1001. For the Danes, which were in sharmandie, being aduertised of the good lucke, successe, and great spoiles which their companions and countermen in England had, and their feet set on edge therewith, suddenlie prepared shipping, and came ouer the coasts and landed in Deuon, and forthwith marched and toke their course, towards the citie of Excester; thinking to haue found the citizens napping; & to haue taken them suddenlie and vnawares; Sed ciuitibus uigiliter resistens non fecerunt. The people commons of Deuon, Cornewall, Summerfet & Dorset, aduertised hereof, assembled themselves, & minding to rescue the citie, as also to encounter & aduerture the fight with the Danes, met with them at a place nere the citie called Pinncho, and ioined battell with them, betwene whome the fight was cruell and the slaughter great. And thus doth Houeden testifie, whose words be these: Memoratus paganorum exercitus de Normannia in Angliam reuersus, ostium fluminis Exe ingreditur, & mox ad extinguendam urbem Exoniam stre egreditur, sed dum murum illius destruere moliretur, ac ciuitibus urbem uiriliter defendentibus repellitur, unde nimis exasperatus more solito villas succendendo, agros depopulando, hominesque cadendo per Domnoniam vagatur, quare Domnonenses in unum congregati, in loco qui dicitur Pinnho certamen cum eis inueniunt.

King Sweno being in Denmarke, and aduertised hereof, as also giuen to vnderstand how king Egfred alias Ethelred or Egfred had caused all the Danes in the realme to be suddenlie slaine in one night, being much grieued therewith, did prepare and provide a great armie for the reuenge thereof. And in the yeare of our Lord 1002, he landed in sundrie and diuerse parts of this realme, being great hostilitie, and making great spoiles, and brought the whole land to an vnspokeable miserie and distresse; but at length, receiuing a tribute for a peace, he returned home into his owne countrie. Howbeit the citizens of Excester hearing of this crueltie used in the east parts, made themselves strong: and doubting of so mightie an enemie, did make themselves ready, and prepared the citie to withstand him, if he should haue attempted anie force or hostilitie against them.

But the Dane being gone and returned home, and knowing nothing of this preparation, one Hugh then earle of Deuon (as princes lacke no fauourers) sent his letters into Denmarke to king Sweno, certifieng him both of the state and wealth of this citie, as also of the great preparation which had bene made to withstand him, persuading him not to suffer such an iniurie. And as coles will be some kindled: euen so the Dane vpon this aduertisement was in a great heat, and forthwith arreareth his armie, and repareth all things in readinesse to crosse the seas aneto to worke his will against this citie. And accordinglye when time serued, in the yeare following, being the yeare of our Lord 1003, he toke the seas and landed vpon the coasts of Deuon and Cornewall, and marched forthwith to this citie, and laie his siege against the same in the beginning of the halends of September: during which time were sundrie sharpe, fierce, and cruell assaults giuen by the Dane, and as valiantlie resisted by the citizens.

But in continuance of time, when they saw themselves

selues dalle moze and moze to be weakened, bittels to falle, the fire round about them, their walles beaten downe, themselves slaughterd and murdered, and the crime to increase and be strong, and in all these distresses, their king Edward being fled into Normandie, to haue no care of them, nor to prepare anie rescue, aid, or helpe for them: it was not to be marvelled, if in so heauie a distress they were amazed and astonished. And yet considering with themselues that Sweno was a Dane, a cruell enemie, a bloudie murderer, an vsurping tyrant, having no other title to the crowne of England, but the sword, did with one consent agree and conclude, neuer to yeld nor giue ouer whilste anie were left liuing able to withstand the same, wishing rather to die manfullie for their common wealth, than to liue in reproch and infamie; and by death to reape an immor-tall fame, than by life to become ignominious & infamous, and in the end also to be the miserable slaues of a cruell and vsurping tyrant.

When therefore after manie assaults, all of the most part of the ablest men were spent and consumed, and none or few left alieue to withstand so might-ie and so manie enimies: the Dane on the seuen and twentieth daie of August, with force entered the citie, And after that he had serued and satisfi'd his bloudie appetits, in deflowring the women, murdering the children, and making haucke of all the people, hee spoiled the citie, burned the houses, rased the walles, bet downe the temples, and left nothing to be done which might by fire, sword, and spoiles be consumed: and this is so witnessed by sundrie writers, Reinolph of Chester writeth thus: Daci cum suo rege Sweno Exce- striam venerunt, & urbem funditus destruxerunt, nullare incolumi relicta, que aut ferro aut igni vastari poterat: & omnia spolia cineribus tantum relictis secum deportauerunt. Huntington hath these words: Daci in ea exarserunt sicut ignis quem vellet aliquis sanguine exinguere: aduolantes igitur quasi multitudo locustarum, quidam Excestriam venerunt, & urbem funditus destruxerunt: & omnia spolia cineribus tan-tum relictis secum deportauerunt.

Houeden thus saith: Rex Danorum Sweni peritium & proditiem Normannici comitis, quem Emma Dommanie profecerat, civitatem Exon infregit, spoliavit, & murum ab orientali usq; ad occidentalem portum destruxit, & cum in-genti preda naues repetit. It was also besieged by William the Conquerour in the first yeare of his reigne Anno 1068, for when he first entered this land, and by dint of sword sought the conquest thereof; the citizens of this citie, and the noble and gentlemen of all the countrie about, entered into one common league, conclusion and promise, to ioine together and to withstand the enimie to the uttermost. And this confederacie being confirmed by a publike oth, preparation on all parts was made accordinglie, for the accomplishing of the same. But the conquerour having prevailed, and subdued in a manner the whole land, was advertised that this citie stood upon their gard, and would not yeld nor submit themselves unto him. Whereupon he sent his armie from London and besieged the same: and percelling the siege to continue, marched and came himselfe vnto the same, but rather came no farther than Salisbury. In the meane time the citizens were advertised how the whole realme had yielded, and seeing also how their confederats did dalle thinke awaite from them, and by that meanes they to grow weaker & weaker, and therefore the lesse able to withstand so great a force, and to keepe out so puissant an armie as was round about them; and considering also, that small mercie or fauor should they find if the citie by force were taken; did by way of intreatie offer submission, and desire peace; which in the end they obtained: and so pacing a grieuous fine, they and the citie were restored.

But yet in token of his conquest, the king altered and changed the gates of the castell, and took an oth of all the citizens to be his liege and true subiects.

Houeden in his historie maketh mention, that Githa king Harolds mother should be within this citie, during the time that this siege and assault lasted: and percelling the bent of the people to submit and yeld themselves, secretlie conuied herselfe awaie. For these be his words: Hyeme minuente, rex Wilhelmus de Normannia in Angliam redijt, & Anglis importabile tributum imposuit: deinde in Dunmoniam hostiliter profectus est ad civitatem Excestriam, quam cines & nonnulli Anglici ministri contrailum retinebant: & obsedit, & infre-git. Githa vero comitissa, mater scilicet Haroldi regis Anglo-rum, & soror Swani regis Danorum, cum multis de civitate fugiens, evasit & Flandriam petijt, cines autem dextris accep-tu regi se dederunt. Also in the second yeare of king Stephen Anno 1137, the lords and peeres of the realme, remembryng the oth which they had before made to king Henrie the first, to whom they swore to be true to Gadow the kings onelie daughter and heire, and to hir heires, and yet contrarie to the same had swozne themselves to king Stephen, began to repent themselves, & consulted how to restore Gadow the emperesse, and to erpell Stephen. Wherefore they assembled themselves in armie, & divided themselues into sundrie cities, towne and castles.

Among whom one Balowin Ribouers then erle of Denon, with force entered and took this citie.
But the king so Harpelie followed and pursued him, that he drave him from hence into the Ile of Wight, which was then his lordship. But the king when he had receiued the citie into his faith, marched with his armie to the said Ile, & took the same, as also the earle himselfe, whom he sought with bar-thelied. But Gadow the emperesse afterwards remembryng this citie for such their service as the well liked, did enlarge the liberties of this citie, for whom yearelie euer after was an annuallie kept at the charges of the citie.

It was also in great troubles in the eleventh pere of king Richard the second, Anno 1387. For a con-trouersie being fallen betwene the king & his two uncles, the dukes of Yorke & Gloucester, none were then so highlie in the kings fauour, as were Robert Cere marques of Dublin, and Michael de la Pole earle of Suffolke, & others of their faction. So these the king gaue in commandement, to collect and muster an armie, as it were for his defense, against his said uncles: which when they had partlie done, whether it were because they mistrusted their owne parts, or whether they doubted of the sequelle of their doings, they left their iourneie towards London, as it was first appointed, and came towards this citie.
The two dukes who stood upon their owne gard and defense, hauing aduertisement hereof, followed and persuaded them with all haste and speed: and hauing oueraken them at this citie, they ioined the fight with the marques and the earle. But they trusting more to their feet than to their hands, secretlie gaue the slip and fled awaie, making no staie before they came to Scotland; and from thence into Flanders, where they died.

It was moreover in troubles in the tenth pere of king Edward the fourth Anno 1469, when the states of this king, and of king Henrie the first were doubtfull, and the whole realme diuided: some following king Henrie, and some king Edward. In time of which troubles the duchess of Clarence, the lord Dineham, the lord Fitzwarren, and the baron of Carew, who followed and took part with king Henrie, came to this citie, being accompanied and dispa-ted with a thousand fightingmen. The duchess was great with child, and lodged in the bishops palace, but the lords were in other houses within the close among the chanons, and here staid themselves. But sir Hugh Courtneie knight, who then favoured and was on the part of king Edward, hearing of this assemblie, raiseth an armie of his friends and allies, approacheth therewith unto this citie, besiegeth it, breaketh the bridges, and stoppeth all the waies leading to the same, and by which means no vittels could be brought to the markets: and being thus incamped about this citie, sendeth to the maior, requiring him either to open the gates and to giue him entrie, or to deliuer unto him the gentlemen that were therein. On the other side, the gentlemen which were within, they either mistrusting the maior and citizens, or not willing to stand to his courtserie, and be vnder his gouernement, required the keies of the citie gates to be deliuered vnto their custodie, and that all things to be done by their order and appointment.

In these doubts and perplexities consulting what were best to be done, they did at length resolute & conclude neither to yeld to the requests of them who were without, nor yet to satisfie the demands of them which were within the citie: but pacifieng both parties with such good words, and in such good order as they might, did reserue to themselves the keeping and safe custodie of the citie, being the chamber of the king, & parcell of the reuenues of the crowne, to the onlie vse of the king and crowne, as to them in dutie and allegiance did appertene. And therefore forthwith they rampired by the citie gates, fortified the walles, appointed souldiers, and did set all things in such good order as in that case was requisite; leauing nothing vndone which might be for the preservation of the state & commonwealth of the citie.

But yet for want of forescasting, in procelle of time the provision within the citie waied short, and vittels to be scant; whereof it was doubted there would insue some famine, which the common people neither could nor would indure, if some remedie were not in due time had and prouided. The magistrats did their best indeuor euerie waie, as well by diligence in following, as by counselling, in perswading euerie man to continue firme and true to the publike state, and their owne private commonweale. And albeit the common people were impatient to abide troubles, and loth to indure the present state of want and famine; yet they had that respect to their owne truth, faith, and safetie, as euerie man yelded himselfe contented to abide and indure the time of their deliuerance: and by the good will of God it followed, and the same took god effect.

For about twelue daies after this sturre begun, by waie of intreatie and mediation of certaine chanons of the cathedrall church of this citie, the siege was remoued and raised; whereupon verie shortly after did insue the field of Edgecourt, where the duke of Clarence and the earle of Marwicke being put to the worst, did flee vnto this citie, and made their entrie into the same the thirde daie of Aprill, 1470, and laie in the bishops palace for a few daies, vntill they had caused to be prouided ships at Dartmouth for their passage ouer into Calis.

The king being aduertised which waie his enemies were gone, followed and pursued them with an armie of fortie thousand men, and came to this citie the fourteenth of Aprill 1470, hauing with him in his companie sundrie & diuerse great lords and estates, as namelie the bishop of Ely lord tresoror of England, the duke of Norfolk earle marshall of England, the duke of Suffolke, the earle of Arundell, the earle of Wiltshire son to the duke of Buckingham, the earle of Shrewsburie, the earle Gloucestre, the lord Hastings, the lord Greie of Codner, the lord Audleigh, the lord Saie, the lord

Sturton, the lord Dacres, the lord Spountoie, the lord Stanleie, the lord Ferris, & the baron of Dudley, with a number of knights and gentlemen. But they all came too late, for the duke and the earle were both departed and gon to the seas before their comming.

Wherefore the king, after that he had rested and reposed himselfe here three daies, he departed and returned to London. It was also in great troubles, being besieged in the twelue yeare of king Henrie the seventh: by one Berkin Warbecke, 1470, who in the beginning of the moneth of September came to this citie, and incamped about it with his whole armie with ordinance battered the walls, fired the gates, vndermined it, and with mightie ladders scaled them, and left nothing vndone which might be to compasse their attempt: thinking and supposing that small would be the resistance against them. But such was the noble courage and valiant stomach of the citizens, that they manfully resisted and defended those forces, and indured the same to the vttermost, vntill that the king being aduertised thereof, did send the lord Edward Courtneie, earle of Denon and the lord William his sonne, with sundrie others well appointed, who came and rescued the citie: but in certeine conflicts the said earle and others were hurt; notwithstanding the enimie had the repulse, and was dyuen to raise his campe and to depart.

Finallie & last of all, it was besieged in the thirde yeare of king Edward the sixt, 1549, by the commons of Deuon and Cornewall: the historie whereof, for so much as hitherto it hath not bene fullie and at large set forth by anie man, & wher at I John Hooker the writer herof was present, and I Iohannes of things then done, I will somewhat at large discourse & set downe the whole course & maner of the same. It is apparant and most certeine, that this rebellion first was raised at a place in Deuon named Sampford Courtneie, which lieth westwards from the citie about sixtene miles; vpon mondaie in the Whitson weeke being the tenth daie of Iune 1549. The cause thereof (as by the sequelle it did appeare) was onelie concerning religion; which then by act of parlement was reformed, and to be put in execution on Whitsondaie the ninth of Iune. The which daie being now come, and the statute made for the same to be put in execution throughout the whole realme: it was accordingly with all obedience received in euerie place, and the common people well inough contented therewith euerie where; sauing in this west countrie, and especiallie at the said Sampford Courtneie.

For albeit at the daie appointed by statute, they had heard and were present at the diuine seruice said, and had according to the new reformed order, and could not in anie respect, find fault, or fault lie reprehend the same: yet (as old bottles which would not receiue new wine) would rather wallow in the old dreggs and puddels of old superstition, than to be fed and refreshed with the wholesome and heauenlie manna. Wherefore they confederated themselves, bitterlie to renounce, reiect, and cast off the same, not onelie to the great offense of God, whome they ought in all truth and veritie to reuerence and honor; and to the great displeasure of the king, whome in all dutifullnesse they ought to haue obeyed: but also to the raising of open rebellion, the cause of the spoile of the whole countrie, and the vndoing of themselves, their wiues, and children; as in sequelle and in the end it fell out and came to passe.

And here doth appeare what great detriments did come and insue to the church of God, and what great troubles trouble to the publike and commonweale: when as learned preachers do want to teach and instruct the people; and well persuaded magistrats to gouerne the common state. For these people lacking the one, & not stored with the other, were left to themselves, and to their owne dispositions: and thereby partlie of ignorance, but moze of a froward and a rebellious disposition, they do now vtterlie condemne to accept, and do openlie resist to receiue the reformed religion, now put, and to be put in tye and execution. For vpon the said mondaie, the priest being come to the parish church of Sampford, & preparing himselfe to saie the seruice according to the booke & reformed order set forth, & as he had done the daie before: some of the parishioners, namelie one William Underhill a tailor, and one Segar a laboer, and others who had consulted and determined before of the matter, went to the priest, and demanded what he ment to do, and what seruice he would saie: Who answered that according to the lawes set forth, he would saie the same seruice as he had done the daie before. Then they said, that he should not so do, saing further, that they would keepe the old and ancient religion, as their forefathers before them had done; and as king Henrie the eight by his last will and testament had taken order, that no alteration of religion should be made, vntill king Edward his sonne were come vnto his full age. And therefore, for so much as he was now but a child, and could do nothing, they also would not haue any change.

In the end, all the parishioners joining and taking parts together, were all of the same mind, willing and charging the priest that he should vse and saie the like seruice as in times past he was wont to do: who in the end, whether it were with his will, or against his will, he relied to their minds, and yielded to their wills: and forthwith ranseth himselfe in his old popish attire, and faith masse, and all such seruices as in times past accustomed. These newes, as a cloud caried with a violent wind, and as a thunder clay sounding at one instant through the whole countrie, are caried and noised euen in a moment through out the whole countrie: and the common people so well allowed and liked thereof, that they clapped their hands for ioie, and agreed in one mind, to haue the same in euerie of their seuerall parishes.

The iustices of peace dwelling not far from Sampford, being aduertised how disorderlie, & contrary to the lawes, things had bene done in the church of Sampford; and how that the common people were clustered and assembled together, to continue and to mainteine their lewd & disorderd behaviour: such of them, namelie, sir Iugh Polard knight, Anthonie Barue, Alexander Wood, and Gharke Slader esquiers came & met at Sampford, minding to haue had conference with the chiefe plaiers in this enterlude, as well for the redresse of the disorder already committed, as also to persuade and pacifie the rest of the people. But they partlie understanding before hand of the iustices coming, were so addicted and wholly bent to their follies, that they fullie resolved themselves, wilfullie to mainteine what naughtilie they had begun. And therefore, when the iustices were come to the place, and requested to talke with them, they refused it; unless the said gentlemen would leaue all their men behind, and go with them into a certaine seuerall close not far off; and so they would be contented to conferre with them.

The gentlemen, albeit they and their men were the greater number, and sufficient to haue repressed the small companie of the commoners then & there assembled: yet whether it were because they thought in such a case to vse all the best & quietest waie for the pacifying of them; or whether some of them being like affected as they were, did not like the alteration, as it was greatlie suspected: they yielded, and according to the motion made, they left their men in the towne, & went into the foresaid close, & there hauing had conference a pretty while together, did in the end depart without anie thing done at all. Whereof as there appeared some weakenesse in the said iustices which were so wholy liuered, as they would not, or durst not to repress the ragges of the people (which they might haue done) so therof also ensued such a scab as passed their cure, and such a fire as they were not able to quench. For the commons hauing now these willes, were set vpon a pin, that the game was theirs, and that they had wone the garland before they had runne the race; nothing forsaiking what might ensue, nor yet accounting what folke it is to triumph before the victorie. Wherefore they assemble & confederat themselves throughout the whole shire in great troops and companies, and do assocat and flocke vnto them the Cornish people, minding to ioine together, and foolishlie to mainteine what rashlie they had begun.

The king and counsell then occupied in the weightie causes concerning the state of Scotland, being aduertised of this towards rebellion, & respecting the speedie redresse thereof, sent forthwith for sir Peter Carew knight, who then was in Lincolnshire, and for sir Calwen Carew, who was then attendant at the court: and to them commandement was given, that forthwith, and with all speed they should hasten and depart into Deuon, and there to vse, by the aduise of the iustices, all the best means and waies that they might for the appeasing of this rebellion, quieting of the people, and pacifying of the countrie; and to cause euerie man quietlie to returne to his home, and to refer the causes of their griefs and complaints (if they had anie) vnto the king and counsell: and if they then refused so to do, they to vse such other good means and waies as might be for the suppressing of them. And the counsell being daillie moze and moze aduertised, that these begun rebellions did moze and moze increase; and doubting of the sequels thereof, by reason that in other places of the realme the like tumults were begun, though not for the like causes; do direct and giue an order to the lord Russell, then lord priuie seale, and after earle of Wiltford, that he also should follow and dispatch himselfe into Deuon; and he had a commission to deale in such order as he might best do for the pacifying of the said tumults and byzozes.

The foresaid two knights, hauing receiued their commission vnder the kings hand, came in post into the countrie, and making their repaire to this citie, do forthwith send for sir Peters Courtneis then shiriffe and the iustices of the peace of the countrie; and vnderstanding, that a great companie of the commons were assembled at Crediton, which is a towne distant about seauen miles from Excester, and that among them were the Sampford men: & who were the chiefe of them toke counsell & aduise what was best to be done, and what waie meetest to be taken. In the end it was concluded, that the said sir Peter and sir Calwen with others should ride to Crediton, & there to haue conference and speeches with the said commons, and to vse all the good waies and means they might to pacifie & appeale them, they then supposing, and being persuaded, that by good speeches and gentle conferences they should haue bene able to haue compassed and persuaded the said commons. But the people being by some secret intelligence aduertised of the coming of the gentlemen towards them, and they fullie resolved not to yeld one iote from their determinations, but to mainteine their cause taken in hand, do arme and make themselves strong, with such armors and furnitures as they had; they intrench the high waies, and make a mightie rampire at the towne end, and fortifie the same, as also the barnes next adjoining to the said rampires with men and munition, hauing peried the wallies of the barnes with lopes and holes for their shot.

The foresaid gentlemen knowing nothing hereof, rode on their iourneie, and being come almost to the towne, they were aduertised how the waies were stopped and rampired, and that they could not ride into the towne. Whereupon they alighted from their horses, and after a little conference had, they agreed to go into the towne on foot, nothing thinking lesse that they should be stopped or denied to go in on foot. But when they came to the rampires they found the contrarie: for they not onelie were denied to come nere the rampire, but vtterlie were refused to be talked withall: no offers of persuasions nor motions of conference at all could be allowed. For the sun being in cancer, & the midsummer mone at full, their minds were imbued in such follies, and their heads caried with such vanities, that as the man of Athens they would heare no man speake but themselves, and thought nothing well said but what came out of their owne mouths.

The gentlemen vpon such checks, taking the matter in euill part, to be so vnreuerentlie and discourteouslie intreated, with one consent doe agree to make waie ouer the rampire. But in the aduerture thereof they were so galled both by them which kept the rampires, and specialtie by such as were within the barnes, that they were faine to retire and giue place, with the losse of some, and the hurt of manie. In which distresse, a certeine seruiceman named For, and retaining to sir Hugh Pollard, suddenly set one of the barnes on fire: whereupon not onelie such as were therein, but all they also which were in the rampires fled and ran awaie. And then the gentlemen having recovered the rampire went into the towne; but there they found none except a few pore and old people, the residue trusting better to their heeles than to their armes were fled to a further place: and then they returned againe to Excester without anie thing done.

The noise of this fire and burning was in poss hast, and as it were in a moment carried and blazed abroad throughout the whole countrie; and the common people vpon false reports, and of a gnat making an elephant, noised and spread it abroad, that the gentlemen were altogether bent to ouer-run, spoile, and destroye them. And in this rage, as it were a swarme of wasps they cluster themselves in great troops and multitudes, some in one place, and some in an other, fortifying and intrenching themselves as though the enimie were readie to inuade and assaile them. And among other places one was at a village belonging to the lord Russell named St. Marie Clift distant from Excester about two miles, where the commons of the countrie thereabout had begun to fortifie the towne for their defense & safetie.

The cause and pretense of their doings herein, was not onelie the burning of the barnes at Crediton aforesaid, which all the commons generallie did vse for a cloke of this their rising and rebellion: but this one thing also increased their disposition. It happened that a certeine gentleman named Walter Raleigh dwelling not far from thence, as he was vpon a sabbath daie riding from his house to Excester, ouertooke an old woman going to the parish church of saint Marie Clift, who had a paire of beads in hir hands, and asked hir what she did with those beads? And entring into further speeches with hir concerning religion, which was reformed, & as then by order of law to be put in execution, he did persuade with hir that she should as a good christian woman and an obedient subject yeld the rebento; saying further, that there was a punishment by law appointed against hir, and all such as would not obteie and follow the same, and which would be put in execution vpon them.

This woman nothing liking, nor well digesting this matter, went forth to the parish church, where all the parishioners were then at the seruice: and being vnpatient, and in an agone with the speeches before passed betwene hir and the gentleman, began to vphraid in the open church verie hard and vnseemlie speeches concerning religion, saying that she was threatened by the gentleman, that except she would leane hir beads, and giue ouer holie bread and holie water, the gentlemen would burne them out of their houses and spoile them, with manie other speeches verie false and vnttrue, and whereof no talke at all had passed betwene the gentleman and hir. Notwithstanding she had not so soon spoken, but that she was beleued: and in all hast like a fox of wasps they sling out of the church, and get them to the towne which is not far from thence, and there began to intrench and fortifie the towne, sending abroad into the countrie round about, the news aforesaid, and of their doings in hand, flocking, and procuring as manie as they could to come and to ioine with them.

And they fearing or mistrusting, least the gentlemen which were then at Excester, would come vpon them, they first fortified the bidge, which lieth at the end of the towne towards the citie, and laid great trees ouerthwart the same, as also planted certeine peeces of ordnance vpon the same, which they had procured and fetched from Topham a towne not far from thence. But before they came into the towne, they ouertooke the gentleman maister Raleigh aforesaid, and were in such a choler, and so fell in ragies with him, that if he had not shifted himselfe into the chappell there, and had bene rescued by certeine mariners of Emouth which came with him, he had bene in great danger of his life, and like to haue bene murdered. And albeit he escaped for this time, yet it was not long before he fell into their hands, and by them imprisoned and kept in prison in the towne and church of saint Sidwelles, without the east gate of the citie of Excester, during the whole time of the commotion, being manie times threatened to be executed to death. But to the matter.

These the doings of the commons being aduertised to sir Peter Carew, who then was in Excester, assemblye all the iustices & the gentlemen, & conferreth with them what were best to be done; and in the end, concluded & agreed that he, sir Saluen Carew, sir Thomas Denis, sir Hugh Pollard, and sundrie others should ride to Clift, and there to vse all the best meanes they might, for the pacifying and quieting of them. And accordingly in the next morning being sundaie they all rode thither: and being come almost to the bidge, they perceived the same to be rampired, & no waie to be open for them to passe into the towne. Whereupon sir Peter Carew alighted from his horse, and mistrusting nothing, was going on foot toward the bidge. But such was the rancor and malice conceiued against him, partlie for religion, and partlie for the burning of the barnes at Crediton, which was laid altogether to his fault, that the gunner whose name was John Hamon an alien and a smith, and dwelling then at Woodburie, not far from Clift, by the procurement and abetting of

of some there, hauing charged his pece of ordinance there lying, leuelled the same, to haue shot and discharged it at him: which he had done, if one Hugh Whorne seruant then to sergeant Wydeor had not let him and staied his hand.

The gentlemen perceiuing they could not passe into the towne, doo send in a messenger vnto the towne, aduertising them that they were come to talke friendlie with them, as also to satisfie them if they had any cause of grieffe, or were by any bodie misused. They at this message and motion staggered a while and cast manie doubts: but in the end they sent word that they were contented, that if sir Thomas Denis, sir Hugh Pollard, and Thomas Ward esquier, would come into the towne to them and leaue their men behind them, as also would take order, and giue their faith and promise that no hurt should be done or offered to be done vnto them, whiles they were thus in conference together: that then vpon these conditions they would be contented to talke with them. Vpon which promise made and assured vnto them, the foresaid three gentlemen went into the towne about ten of the clocke in the forenoone, and there taried and spent the most part of the daie in much talke and to no purpose: as in the end it fell out.

The other knights and gentlemen, which in the meane while taried without, and waited a long time euen vntill the daie did draw toward night, began to mislike of the matter, some speaking one thing and some an other; yea and some of them in plaine speeches said they would ride ouer the water and issue into the towne. But the friends and seruants of the two knights, respecting the promise made before their entrie into the towne, but especially their masters safetie, which by breach of promise might be put in perill, did utterlie mislike and were grieved with those speeches, and thereof began a little quarrelling among themselves, but forthwith pacified and quieted. And yet some one or two of the companie rode to the waters side, & with their haues searched the depth thereof: for at that brydge the water at euerie tide (by reason that the seas are so nere) swelleth vp and reboundeth. Which thing when they in the towne did see, forthwith cried out alarm, and made much a doo; and some of them began and grew into such rages, that the gentlemen within the towne began to distrust their safetie.

Nevertheless the conference and talke heretofore ended, and they came aboate; who as soone as they were come to sir Peter Carew, they were demanded what they had done, and how they had sped: who answered, Well inough: & giuing no other answer they rode all together to Excester, deferring the disclosure of their doings vntill their coming thither. The same night they supped all together, & after supper ended, and all the seruants were auoided out of that roome, sir Peter Carew demanded of them what they had done, and what agreement they had made: who answered that the commons had promised, and were contented to keepe themselves in god & quiet order, and to proceed no further in their attempts: so that the king and the counsell would not alter the religion, but suffer it to remaine and varie in the same state as king Henrie the eight left it: & vntill the king himselfe came to his full age. Sir Peter Carew and all the residue nothing liking this answer, being farre from their expectation, were for the time in a great dumpe or studie; but in the end misliked and discommended both the matter and the manner of their dealings: inso much that sir Peter Carew, and sir Peter Courtenie, then shiriffe of Devon, openlie, harpelie, and in plaine termes trusted against them for their hendert, or rather sinister dealings in so weightie a cause: wherein they all ought rather to haue vsed all meanes to haue suppressed their outrages, than to haue maintained their follies: and therefore as there was a blame in them, so was there a plaine rebellion in the other.

But though the two knights would haue excused the matter, and haue purged their sinceritie herein; yet on eche side words were so multiplied, that they brake asunder without any further dealings, and euerie man thifted for himselfe, some one waite some an other waite. The commons vnderstanding hereof stop all the high waies, casting great trenches, and lasing great trees ouerthwart the same, and doo watch & ward the same: and by that meanes sundrie gentlemen suspecting no such matter, and making waie to their appointed places, were intrapped, taken, and put in prison; and manie of them kept in durance, during the whole time of the commotion, & abode great hardnesse, and were in perill of life and limme: manie were taken because they would be taken, & found fauour; & manie forsaking their houses and home, were driuen to sequester and hide themselves in woods & secret places. In the citie none or berie few remained or taried, saving sir or seuen persons then knowne of: for by conference had before with the maior, it was knowne that the citie was vnprouided of sufficient vittels, meet for such a companie as the foresaid gentlemen were.

The gentlemen which taried and remained in the citie; namely, sir Roger Bletwet knight, John Beauchampe, Bartholomew Forsethote, John Courtneie, & John Peter customer, esquiers, and others, did berie god seruice as well in their persons, as in their good aduises and counsels, saving such as secretlie kept themselves close in certeine houses then vnknowne. Sir Peter Carew berie earlie in the next morning took his horse, and the high waies being then not stoped he escaped and rode vnto George Henton, a place of sir Hugh Daules in Summerfetshire: where was the lord Russell, being then newlie come from London, and vnto him he came to vnderstand, how all things had passed: who forthwith dispatched and sent him a waite to the king and counsell to aduertise them of the same. The king at the first hearing of the matter, was berie much grieved, & in great perplexitie in two respects: the one because at this instant the like tumults and rebellions (though for an other cause) were now raised and begun in other places; the other was because he was inforced to leaue and giue ouer the appointed attempt for the conquest of Scotland, and to imploy now those soldiors and strangers, whom he had retained for that seruice, for the quenching of this fire kindled at home.

Nevertheless minding to follow to the first, and to appease the last, he sent berie courteous letters, gracious proclamations, and manie mercifull offers vnto all the commons of those parties, to haue pacified and satisfied them, if they had had so much grace so to haue accepted it. The commons being now entered in their follies, and hauing driuen the gentlemen to the flight; doo openlie shew themselves traitors & rebels: and therefore assembling themselves doo appoint out capitaines to direct & order both themselves, and all their proceedings; and as the common plouer be, like lips like lettuce, as is their cause, so are the rulers; the one being not so bold and still, as they wicked or worse. The capitaines then are these: Underhill a tailor, Gaunder a thornaker, Seager a labourer, and Aylcredge a fishpouer, with sundrie other such like, the worst men and the refuse of all others, thought most meet in this seruice. Howbeit it was not long before, that certeine gentlemen and yeomen of good countenance and credit both in De-don and Cornwell were contented, not onely to be associats of this rebellion: but also to carrie the crosse before this procession, and to be captains and guiders of this wicked enterpryse, as namelie in Devon Sir Thomas Pomeroie knight, John Warte and one Coffin gentlemen: & in Cornwell Ham-frie Arundell and Wirneclade esquiers, & Holmes a peoman, with sundrie others, who for the most part were in the end executed and put to death: and their facts to the memorie of their perpetuall infamie recorded in chronicles.

The principall & chiefe captains in Devon being fullie resolved by their owne power and authoritie to mainteine & continue the religion, according to the Romish church, & utterlie to impugn the reformation therof, established by act of parlement: & to support the authoritie of the dool of Rome (whome they neuer saw) in contempt of their true and lawfull king, whome they knew and ought to obeie: these I fate sent their messengers unto the maior of this citie, whose name was John Blackaller, to move and pte him to ioine with them, they thinking that they hauing by these meanes the libertie to haue free access to and from the citie, and the helpe of the citizens, should not want monie or armoz, or any thing else to serue their turne: the maior forthwith aduertised unto his brethren this motion. And albeit some and the chiefe of them did like & were well affected to the Romish religion: yet respecting their dutie to God, their obedience to the king, their fidelitie to their countrie, and safetie of themselves, gaue their full resolute and direct answer, that they would not ioine nor deale with them at all.

This answer was nothing liked, and therefore sent they their second messenger, requiring and commanding them to mainteine the old catholike religion with them, and to do as they did, or else they would besiege them, and perforce compell them therunto. The maior and his brethren returned their former answer, adding moreover that they in their domings were wicked & bad men; & they did & would repute them for enemies and rebels against God, their king, and countrie: and so renounced them. The one side therefore as they prepare to besiege the citie, and to worke all the extremities they can, by force to take that which by words they can not obtaine: so on the other side the maior and his brethren upon god aduise, garded and watched the citie with sufficient men, armed both by day and by night. The rebels (according to their determination) relying themselves upon a vaine hope, thinking that notwithstanding the answer before made; yet because the most part of the citizens were of their opinions, and of the like affections in religion, would not resist them: as also that they had many friends within the citie, more ready to ioine with them, than to follow the maior, if they might haue the choise what to do: they came being in number about two thousand persons, to the citie, upon the second of Iulie 1549, first making proclamation that if the citie would not yield, and ioine with them, they would enter with force and take the spoile of it, & so then they upon the deniall compassed the same round about; and gained unto them at the first all the suburbs.

And hereof they conceived such a vaine hope to haue their full desire upon the citie, that notonely the number in hope did double more & more increase, but also many of them brought their iuines, horses, and paniers; persuading themselves, and promising them, by such a date and upon such a date to enter into the citie, and then to measure beluets and silks by the bow, and to lade their horses home with plate, monie, and other great riches. The maior and his brethren forecasting the perils which might in such a case insue, do promise all things necessarie and meet therewith to defend themselves, and to annoie the enimie. The citie therefore is bewed for armoz, men are mustered, soldiers are retained, captains in euerie ward appointed, warders for the day and watchmen for the night assigned, great peces of ordinance laid in euerie gate, and placed in all convenient places of the wals; mounts in sundrie places erected, as well for lateng of ordinance, as for saving of the soldiers & watchmen from the enimies shot: and nothing was left undone, which in any respect that present state and necessitie required.

The rebels likewise intrench the high wates, plash downe trees, breake downe bridges, keepe watches and wards in euerie place; so that no man could passe to or from the citie without their sufferance. The markets are stopped, vittels are kept from it, and all dealings and intercourses shut and cut off: and hauing (as they bragged) penned and shut up the townsmen in a cope or mew, they plant their ordinance against euerie gate, and in all other such places as best to serue their turne, and to hurt them within: they burnt the gates, they brake up the pipes and conduits, aswell for the taking auaie of the water comming to the citie, as also to haue the led to serue for their shot and pellets. But for the burning of the gates, there followed rather a benefit than a hurt thereof: for forthwith there were made certaine rampiers within the gate, which were farre stronger and of more defense than the gates, as also there were fiers continually kept euerie night betwixt the rampiers and the gates: and as for water, the citie so standeth upon a little hill, that it is full of springs in euerie quarter within the same, and by that means full and plentiful of euerie good and sweet waters. Also they in sundrie places did undermine the wals, minding thereby with gunpowder and with other matters fit for her to haue blowne up the wals; and so to haue entered in that wate: but herein they were also prevented by this means and in this manner.

The citie it selfe (as is before said) is set upon a little hill, and lieth herie sleeping towards two of the gates. And at one of these named the west gate, the said rebels had undermined on the one side, and filled the place with certaine barrels of powder, pitch, and other stufte, meet and apt to receiue fier, and had appointed the night when the same should be set on fier, and so to haue blowne the wals up. At the same time there was a certaine tinner in the citie, whose dwelling was at Weingemonth, named John Belcombe, who depended much upon the goodwill and friendship of maister William Hurk one of the aldermen of the citie, and he understanding of such an undermining to be in working, aduertised the same to maister Hurk, and maketh him priuie how he would prevent the same, which was done in this manner. For whereas he by a noise under the ground did suspect the undermining to be in working, he toke a pan of water, & did put the same on the ground, & by shaking of the water in the pan, he by removing the pan from place to place, came at length to the verie place, whereas the miners were working, and forthwith he countermined against the same, and brought so nere unto it, untill that he might and did see & looke into it. What done, he caused all the wals and streets in the citie towards euerie street, having a fall that wate to be drawne at one time, and euerie man to fill therewith a great tub of water. At his foredoze, which being done, he caused them all at one instant to be cast out and emptied, which water running in great abundance towards the said west gate, was conuered into the place countermined, & so entered and drowned the place, which before was mined:

mined: at which time also by the goodnesse of God, there fell a great shewe, as the like for the time had not bene seene manie years before, and which at that instant greatly serued this turne.

The rebels perceiuing themselves disappointed of their purpose, gaue ouer to deale any further in those attempts: howbeit otherwise they left nothing undone which might be to annoie the citizens. For sometimes they made alarmes, as though they with all might and maine would haue giuen the scale: and indeed they had prouided ladders for the same purpose. Sometimes they by policies would make to come to the gates to burne them, and herein they used this stratagem. They prouided carts laden with old haie, & vniuing the wheles before them would come to the gate without danger, and so set fier in the gate. But notwithstanding they escaped not scotfree, for both at the west gate and at the south gate, their commings being perceived, the great port peeces were charged with great bags of flint stones and halleshot: and as they were approaching unto the gates, the gates were secretly opened, and the said port peeces discharged, and so they were spoiled diuerse of them, & by that means they had small pleasure to follow those deuises: as also the citizens to preuent the same, did from thenceforth keepe the gates open. Likewise they would keepe themselves close in sundrie houses, in the suburbs nere the wals, and would so watch the garrets, that if any within the citie would looke out at the garrets, was in the danger of their shot, and some thereby were killed, and manie hurt. Upon which occasion the citizens set some part of the suburbs on fire, and some part which was next to the wals they beat and brake downe, and so drane the rebels out of those holes. Besides this, they had in sundrie places their great ordnance, so set and placed, that in certeine streets and places none could go but in perill and danger of their shot, which their deuises were checked, by making of certeine mounts to shadowe the streets from the same. Diuerse other deuises they practised to the continuall annoiance of the citie, which though they were greuous and dangerous, yet not to be compared unto the perils which were within the wals among themselves, and whereof had insured the confusion of the whole citie, had not the Lord God of his goodnesse kept and preserved the same. For the serpent of diuision, and the fier of malice, was entered into the citie, manie being inuicomed with the one, but more scalded with the other.

10 sometimes by secret conferences ouer the wals, sometimes by priuat letters priuillie conueied to and fro, by messengers lurking and attending for the same, sometimes by open speeches in times of truce, and manie times by bills and letters bound fast about arrows, and so shot to and fro: and by these and other such like means they discovered ech one to the other their purposes and wicked deuises and practises: all which tended to this effect, to betraie the citie, and to set by the religion.

20 Howbeit, these things were not so secretlie done, but the same were knowne, & manifest arguments and proofes thereof did appeare. And among sundrie some one of them being one of god credit and countenance, and of the number of the common council, whose name was John Wolcot a merchant, was so farre enchanted herein, that vpon a certeine daie he being (as his course came about) a capteine for the daie, and to ward one of the gates that daie, presuming that partlie by reason of his charge that daie, and partlie for that he was one of the common council, he might do more than in deed did apperteine to him, he vpon his first comming to the west gate in the morning met with certeine of his confederats, and after conference had with them, went suddenlie out at the wicket of the gate (which gate as then was not rampired) and carrying the keyes with him, went unto the rebels, and had a long conference with them. But it toke small effect, for he promised (as it after appeared) more than he could performe, which turned to his great discredit: both for that he himselfe verie hardlie escaped their hands who were bent to haue kept and reteined him, as they did the two others, who went out with him: as also when he came in, was both checked and blamed for his doings.

30 At an other time the maior vpon an occasion assembled all the commoners unto the Guildhall, & merie man being in his armor, and the papists being then the greater number, some one of them named Richard Tailor a clothier, thinking by making of a tumult or an vprore they should be too hard for the others, and so attaine to their purposes, hauing his bowe bent, did vocke his arrow, minding to haue striken the man to whom he leuelled the shot: but gaing his hand, and misting his marke, he strooke his owne and best friend John Peter the kings cashier, a gentleman of god countenance and credit, who had died thereof, had not the arrow lighted vpon one of his ribs bones: a great murthering was like to haue ben a tumult, but the matter knowne it was appeased.

40 Also at an other time there was a practise made with the souldiers, who had the charge and custody of the castell, that they should receiue in at the posterne of the said castell, a certeine number of the rebels; wherevnto the said souldiers through corruption had giuen their consent. The daie and time were appointed for the same: but whether the same by secret advertisement were discovered, or whether the matter were mistrusted, or whether it pleased God to moue the hearts of certeine men to take the view of the castell, & of the maner of the souldiers wages there: it is most certeine that by the repaire & resort of certeine men, vnder the colour to walke and see the trecherie, it was espied, and the practises discouered.

50 The magistrates and chiefe persons of the citie, albeit they were not as yet fullie resolued and satisfied in religion, yet they not respecting that, but cheslie their dutifullnesse to the king and commonwealth, nothing like the rebellion, nor beate with the same, but they do all things to defend the citie and themselves against their rebellious attempts, and likewise do their best indour to keepe their owne citizens in peace and quietnesse. Wherevpon the fauourers of the old Romish religion, being inwardlie grieued, that they could not haue their will, nor obteine to haue the gates to be opened, that those god and religious men (as they termed them) might come in, they used priuat conferences with them, sometimes by secret conferences ouer the wals, sometimes by priuat letters priuillie conueied to and fro, by messengers lurking and attending for the same, sometimes by open speeches in times of truce, and manie times by bills and letters bound fast about arrows, and so shot to and fro: and by these and other such like means they discovered ech one to the other their purposes and wicked deuises and practises: all which tended to this effect, to betraie the citie, and to set by the religion.

60 Howbeit, these things were not so secretlie done, but the same were knowne, & manifest arguments and proofes thereof did appeare. And among sundrie some one of them being one of god credit and countenance, and of the number of the common council, whose name was John Wolcot a merchant, was so farre enchanted herein, that vpon a certeine daie he being (as his course came about) a capteine for the daie, and to ward one of the gates that daie, presuming that partlie by reason of his charge that daie, and partlie for that he was one of the common council, he might do more than in deed did apperteine to him, he vpon his first comming to the west gate in the morning met with certeine of his confederats, and after conference had with them, went suddenlie out at the wicket of the gate (which gate as then was not rampired) and carrying the keyes with him, went unto the rebels, and had a long conference with them. red, and their whole deuises preuented. Likewise manie houses, and often there were traces made, and sundrie parles and conferences had with the rebels, which were procured to the onlie end that they might compass their deuises. And this was a common practise with them, that when soeuer the parle was appointed, there should be hostages or pledges put in on both parties: and they as men upon whom the greatest weight of the matter did depend, would require to haue the best and most chosen citizens, to be hostages with them, in stead and for the safetie of those which they would send to the parle for them, who for the most part were the refuse, the scumme, and the rascals of the whole countrie, and yet such they were in this case, as who ruled the roose and bore the whole or chiefe stoke; and the worse the man, the greater his authoritie among them, which was good enough for so wicked a matter taken in hand, according as the common adage is: Dignum patella operculum, like lips like lettice.

The chiefe rulers & captains among the commons were the worst men.

Great practise bled to procure the citizens to ioinc with the rebels.

The faithfull and flat determination of the citizens to refuse the communicating with the rebels.

The last and perillous practise of the rebels.

A perillous practise.

But during the time of these truces and parles, there being then a time and scope of libertie to talke and conferre with them euerie man at his pleasure, there wanted no deuises under colour of frendlie conferences, to deuise how to compass their intents: howbeit it pleased the eternall God, so to carrie and rule the hearts of the magistrats, that albeit being taught in the Romish religion they were affected therewith, yet they so much respected their dutie to their prince, and the safetie to their commonwealth, that they openly professed they would neuer yield the citie so long as they liued, and were able to keepe and defend the same.

For the maior himselfe master William Hurst, master John Buller, master John Whitnall, master William Periam, & others of the ancientest of the citie, were by sundrie means, waies, deuises, and reasons, perswaded to containe themselves in this rebellion with the commons. They all with one mind and one voice gaue a flat answer that in the citie they had been brought by, there they had gotten their liuings, there they had sworne their fidelitie and allegiance to their king and prince, there they had faithfully hitherto serued him, and there would so continue so long as they could to the uttermost of their powers; all which their promises & anowyses (the Lord be praised) they performed.

But to the matter, Sundrie other trecheries & deuises were practised, which particularlie to recte were verie tedious & to no purpose. The last but the most perillous practise was this. When these malecontents saw themselves to be preuented in all their deuises, which before they had but secretlie and privately practised, then they comforting themselves together, do openly shew and declare the misdoings, being perswaded that because they were the greater number, and that also the most part of the poore people were wearie, and for want of hitteles would not indure to be pinned in any longer, that therefore manie would ioinc against a few, and that the game would go on their side.

And so on a sundae, being but two daies before the deliuerie of the citie, about eight of the clocke in the forenoon, a compaign of them in euerie quarter of the citie, hauing their consorts in a readines to followe & serue with them (if need so required) got into the streets, walking with their weapons about their girdles, as to fight with their enemies, and cry out, "Come out those heretikes and thieues, those bohemians, where be they? By Gods iudgement a blow we will not be pinned in to serue the iurme, we will go out and haue in our neighbors, they be honest, good, and goodlie men. Their pretense and meaning being then, that if any of the contrarie side had come out, they would haue quarrelled with them, and haue taken occasion to set upon him and to raise a new tumult.

But by the providence and goodnesse of God it so fell out, that some being in their houses, and some at their parish churches, the maior and magistrats were first aduertised herof, before the others heard any thing of the matter: and they according to their wisdoms pacified the matter, and sent John Vincent, John Sharke, and others, the bretherers of this cloke into their houses. Where in the south gate street and at the south gate, there was a little stir, which being soon stopped there ensued no hurt therof, other than a broken pate or two: for as it fell out, the wardens of that gate at that time were against them and of the greater compaign. These and manie other like practises were daily and continually vsed on the one side, which in the end came to no effect, because the Lord kept the citie.

The others on the other side being also together bent to honor God, obeye the king, and to serue in their commonwealth, were fullie resolu'd to keepe and defend the citie, whose cause being iust and good, was sufficient of it selfe to keepe them in that mind: and yet their courage was the more, for that they saw the god bent of the maior and magistrats; who, howsoeuer they were affected otherwise in religion, yet they were wholly bent and determined to keepe and defend the citie: and therefore they seeing the industry, carefulnesse, service and painefulnesse, of these men, do favour, incourage, and countenance them, and (to saie the truth) by the industry and god service of them, the citie was cheefly kept and preserved.

For there was no seruice to be done within, nor exploit to be aduentured without upon the enimie (as manie times there were sallies given) but these were the chiefe and commonlie the onlie doers: for which cause the contrarie side marvelously maligned at them, and sought by all means how to impeach and indanger them. Which thing being badly perceived more and more by sundrie arguments, and as wise men seeking how to prevent the same, did manie and sundrie times confer among themselves here in, and in the end made a covenant and a faithfull promise among themselves (being then about the number of one hundred persons) that they would stand firmelie and faithfully to the defence and keeping of the citie to their uttermost powers.

And if it so fell out, that the rebel and enimie should haue access and entrie into the citie, that then they should all meet at the lord Kasseles (now the earle of Bedfordes) house, and there to issue out at the poierne of the garden, and to giue the aduerture to passe and to escape a waie, as also if they were besieged that then they should stand together to their defense. And for this purpose they had then named some one man to be their captaine for this enterprise. And in the meane time, to do all things extrinsie for the preservation of the citie, & by a particular covenant among themselves, did take order, that during the whole besieging of the citie, and their abode therein, a certaine number by course and besides the ordinarie set watch, should watch, ward, and walke about continually both by daie and night, by which means no sleight nor treacherie could be practised, but that they should haue an inbelling, and vnderstanding thereof, and that in deed stand and came to such effect that it was the chiefe (if not the onlie) cause of the preservation of the citie for that time: for there was no seruice, no diligence, no care, nor any thing wanting, or left vnborne, which by these men was not done.

among these men, whereof had ensued a great detriment to the common state, and an overthrow to themselves, had it not in due time bene prevented. There were two gentlemen within this citie, and both of this companie, the one was borne of a honorable house and parentage, named John Courtneie a younger sonne to sir William Courtneie of Doverberham knight, and a man of verie good knowledge and experience in service. The other also was a man of verie good service, practise, and experience, his name was Barnard Duffeld, & servant to the lord Russell, and keeper of his house in Excester. Both of these were verie forward and carefull in this present service against the rebels. But there fell an emulation betwene them, which albeit it be verie commendable in good things, & he praiseworthy who can best excell therein: yet when the same shall tend to a division of a publike state, the dissolution of a commonwealth, the breach of common societie, or the maintenance of any euill, it is bitterlie to be shunned and lamented.

It happened upon an occasion offered, that certaine of this companie upon a time issued out at the foresaid pofferne and made a sallie upon the enemies, and had such good successe, that some of them they slew, some they tooke prisoners, as also spoiled them of their goods, and brought a waite with them some of their ordinance, namely basses and slings: howbeit they all escaped not scottfree, for some of them were taken, some also were hurt, as namely John Drake, who the yeare before was the receiver of the citie was shot through the cheeke with an arrow, which he brought into the citie with him, and one John Simons a coke was so hurt that he died thereof.

But among them all one John Goldsmith being of that companie and servant to Richard Belierd of the same goldsmith, and a Fleming borne, had the best successe: for in the same skirmish he was taken prisoner by one of the rebels, who offered in taking of him with his bill to have slaine him. With that this John Goldsmith fell downe & yielded himselfe, having then in his hand his peece of handgun charged, & suddenly the other not mistrusting no; marking the same, he discharged into his verie bellie and so slew him, toke the spoile of him, and brought the same into the citie with him.

This skirmish though it were not clere gaines to this companie, yet it so encouraged them, that from time to time they consulted, and in the end determined to make a fresh sallie and to give a new adventure: whereupon there fell and grew a disagreement betwene the two foresaid John Courtneie & Barnard Duffeld, the one affirming that the same was not to be permitted in anye sort of citie, which stood upon defense of gard, without a verie speciall order of the generall of chiefe capteine, or some urgent necessity, especiallie in that present distresse and extremitie, wherein the citie as then did stand. But Barnard Duffeld being verie loth to lose anye part of his credit, or to desist from that he with others had determined, could by no meanes be persuaded to the contrarie, but plainelie affirmeth that what he had determined should be performed.

Whereupon the foresaid John Courtneie resorteth to the maiors, aduertiseth unto him the matter, & dealeth so fullie and with such persuasions with him, that the maiors assembleth his brethren, and sendeth for the foresaid Duffeld: who being come, the matter was at full debated and discoursed, and in the end concluded that it was verie hurtfull and dangerous to that present state, that anye such issuing out should be granted or permitted: and therefore prayed the said Duffeld to staie his determination, and to be contented. But he being impatient, & thinking his credit to be stained, if he should be debarred or denied to do that which he had faithfullie promised, did bitterlie refuse to yield to this the maiors request, as also by continuing of talkes, fell out in foule and disorderd speeches. Whereupon to avoid a further inconvenience, he was commanded to ward. The daughter of this Duffeld, whose name was Francis, hearing that hir father was in ward, and taking in greafe that so great an iniurie (as she feared it) should be done to hir father, came more hastily than aduisedlie unto the maiors, somewhat late in the evening, & required to haue hir father out of the ward. Which thing being denied unto hir, shee waied so waime, that not onelie she used verie vnseemelie tearmes and speeches unto the maiors, but also contrary to the modestie and shamefastnes required in a woman, speciallie young and unmarried, ran most violentlie upon him, and strake him in the face. This was taken in so euill a part, and fearing that it had bene a set match of some further inconveniences, the common bell was forthwith rung out: and also a rumour spread that the maiors was beaten, or killed.

The whole commons immediatlie in great troops, & the most part in armes, ran to the Guildhall, where the maiors was, who though he was safe, yet were they so greued with this iniurie, that they would in all hast haue run to the lord Russells house, where he was then gone, and haue fetched hir out: but the maiors forercalling what inconveniences might ensue, and respecting the necessitie of the present state, was not onlie contented patientlie to wape up these iniuries, but also earnestlie requested the commoners to do the like: who being so pacified, he went home, and they conducted him into his owne houses. The chorons of the cathedrall church which at that time were resident in their houses within the close there, namely archdeacon Dollard, treasurer Southyon, chancellor Luson, and master Holwell, with others of the said church, who joined with the maiors and citizens in this service for the safeguard of the citie, and did keepe both watches and wards, and their men readie at all times to serue in euerie alarm and skirmish: they at the hearing of this disorderd part were verie much greued therewith, and they likewise forthwith assembled all their men, and being well armed and appointed, they went to the maiors, who was then gone home to his house, and then and there verie friendly did comfort him, and offered to stand by him and to assist him in all the best service they were able to do for his defense, and safetie of the citie.

The said archdeacon offered, that in proper person he would herein stand in his behalfe against all persons whatsoeuer, that would attempt or offer to do him anye wrong. And in the end, after sundrie friendly and good speeches, they departed to their homes. And the said archdeacon, euerie daie after, would either come or send to the maiors. This maiors being a merchant, and onelie exercised in that trade, had small reach in matters of policie or martiall affaires: he was maiors of the citie thre times, and in euerie yeare there grew some troubles in the citie, but he had such a speciall care & regard to his charge and government, that he would neuer attempt nor do anye thing therein, but by the aduise and counsell of wise, graue, and expert men: and God so blessed him that he prospered and had good successe in all his doings.

Besides these and sundrie other former perils, the which the citie manie and oftentimes stood in, and by the goodnes and prouidence of God still overcome, there befell and happened a third one, which exceeded all the rest, and whereof the greatest danger and perill was feared: and this was famine, or penurie, which of all other turmoils and perils is most dangerous, & no other plague to be compared to it. For no force is feared, no lawes observed, no magistrate obeyed, nor common societie esteemed, where famine ruleth. For as the poet saith: Nescit plebs ieiunia timere. The store of bittels within the citie, for want of prouision in due time, and by reason of the restraint of the markets, vpon a sudden was verie slender and small, and the same in verie short time spent and consumed. And albeit there were good store of drie fish, rise, pynes, rafins, and wine, at verie reasonable prices, yet bread which as the prophet saith, Confirmat cor hominis, Strengtheneth mans hart, that wanted: neither was anie to be had. And in this extremitie the bakers and householders were duen to seeke by their old store of pusses and bean, wherewith they in times past were wont to make hordleshead, and to feed their swine and poultrie, and this they moulded up in clothes, for otherwise it would not hold together, and so did bake it up, and the people well contented therewith. For (as Plutarch writeth) Fames reddit omnia dulcia, nihilq; contemnit esuriens: Hunger maketh all things sweet, and the hungrie bellie thynneth nothing.

But when this also was spent, and nothing now left, and the common people being not acquainted with so hard a diet as famine prescribeth, were ve-rie impatient to endure the continuall barking of their hungrie bellies, and therefore they were verie sone & easie to be persuaded, or rather of themselves contented to yeld vnto the enimie, to be fed for a time with the stollen fat of his flesh pot, than to abide for a short time a little penurie in hope of a deliuerie, and then to be filled with saturitie and plentie. But the magistrats and graue senators, who in all other causes had shewed themselves wise, careful and discreet; and who hauing receiued sundrie injuries, did yet without rigour, reuenge or malice, wape the same up, respecting rather the common state than their owne priuat cause; so in this matter also being of a great importance do verie wiselie & politikelie deale with the said people: who the poore they were, the better they were considered, and the more carefullie prouided for. First, there was a generall collection set and rated throughout the whole citie for their reliefe, and thereby they were liberalle euerie weeke considered: which thing being some increase to their stocke and store, was the better to their content. When all such bittels as were to be had within the citie, they either had it fraile, or for a verie small price.

Besides this, manie times when anie cattell came nears vnto the walles of the citie, some thiff was made to haue them, or by skirmishing & issuing out for them, or by some other means. And this also what so euer it was, was altogether diuided among them.
And as for the prisoners fast fettered in the gaols, they had also their portions, as farre as it would stretch: notwithstanding in the end, for want they were fed with hordles, which they liked and were well contented withall. For as the proverbe is, Hunger findeth no faults but all things are sweet. Besides, if anie wrong were offered or iniurie done to anie of them, it was forthwith vpon complaint re-dressed: but if anie of them did disorder themselves, it was borne withall, and they in all gentle and cur-teous meanes intreated: as also from time to time persuaded with good words patientlie to abide and be contented: not mistrusting but that God shortly would send a deliuerance.

And thus, and by these means, in hope almost against hope, they continued dutifull and obedient, from the second daie of Iulie 1549, vntill the first daie of August then following, the same bringing whole weekes, vpon which daie they were deliue-red by the comming and entrie into the citie of the lord Russell: and which daie in our morall for euer to endure is kept for a high and holie feast amongst the citizens yearelie vpon the first daie of August. Im-mediatlie vpon which deliuerance of the citie, the first care that euerie man had, was to thiff and to make prouision for bittels, wherof some hungrie bellies were so greedie, that ouercharging their empty stomachs to hastilie, they died therewith.

Thus hauing declared something of the state of the citie, and of the doings therein during the time of this rebellion, though much more might be therein said, let vs now retorne to the lord priuie scale, who after the departure of sir Peter Carew to the court, remoued from George Henneron, and came to Honiton, minding from thence to haue passed vnto Excester, if waie had bene open. But being aduertised that the citie was besieged, and that all the waies leading thitherwards were stopped, he remained still in Honiton. Sir Peter Carew in the meane time, according to the former order betwene them taken, was ridden to London, and being before the king, declareth the whole matter at large. Which the king, not liking the distastie of his people, promised to seeke a speedie remedie: and so commanded him to the counsell for the same: and being before them, and hauing at full discoursed the state of the matter, the duke of Summerfet being much grieved with the matter, would haue reiected the whole on sir Peter, charging him that by reason he had caused the houses to be burned at Crediton, it was the onelie cause of the commotion. But therevnto he answered the ne-cessitie of that seruice, as also declared that he had done nothing but by a good warrant, and therewith shewed forth the kings letters vnder his hand and priuie signet.

The lord which then lord chancelor replied and said, that the kings letters were no sufficient warrant, unlesse he had his commission vnder the hode seale; and therefore if he had right, he should by the lawes be hanged for his doings. But to this sir Peter answered so stoutlie, and charged the duke so depelle, that in the end he was willed to retorne into the countrie, being promised that sufficient helpe both of men & monie should be with speed sent downe into the countrie. And to this effect he had both the kings and the counsels letters vnto the lord priuie scale, and so toke his iourne backe againe into the coun-trie, and deliuered his letters to the said lord Russell, who in hope of the supplie promised, staid and remained sometimes at Woburnesotre, but most common-lie at Honiton, still looking for that supplie and furniture that was promised. But hauing long looked for the same in vaine, he was daillie more and more forsaken of such of the common people, as who at the first serued and offered their seruice vnto him. And hauing but a verie small gard about him, he liued in more feare than he was feared: for the rebels daillie increased, and his companie decreased and thynke awake, and he not altogether assured of them which remained.

Wherefore distrusting himselfe, & by a false rumour being aduertised that the citie was taken, & in the possession of the rebels; as also how that there was a new stirre or rebellion begun about Sarisburie; he toke aduise and counsell of the gentlemen and such as were with him what were best to be done. The gentlemen of Dorsetshire were of the mind, and gaue him aduise, that it were best for him to retorne into Dorsetshire, and there to remaine for a time; because it was a place of a more safetie, vntill such time as he were better prouided. And accordingly

the lord

long himselfe, as to his demeanor from out of the lord

Russell is returned backe again.

Sir Peter Carew then being at Hoozofoton, and advertised hereof, took his horse and came against the said lord Russell, & met him upon Blacke downe, where was a long conference betwene them both: and in the end he so perswaded the lord, and with such pitie reasons he caried him, that leauing his former determination, he dooly returne againe into Honiton; & there he continued thenceforth, sauing one night spent at Oterie saint Marie, where as it fell out he was in moze feare than perill. At his being in Honiton, and dailie waiting and looking for the promised helpe and supplie which came not; he was in an agonie, & of a heauie chere: not onelie for the want of the men & monie which he had long in vaine looked for, but also because he had spent all that he had brought with him, and could not tell how otherwise to helpe and provide to supplie his present need: but as it fell out all happened for the best.

For it chanced that there were then three merchants of the citie, following and attending upon him; Thomas Brestwood not long before maior of the citie, John Bodlie, and John Perlam, men of great wealth. These men vnderstanding of the heauinesse and grieve of his lordship, make their resort vnto him, and promise to helpe and relieue his agonie and want: and forthwith did procure vpon their credit from the merchants of Wiltow, Linne, Saluerton, and elsewhere, such a masse of monie, as which when he had receiued, his grieve was eased. For forthwith he so provided and furnished himselfe with such necessities, and with a greater number of men; that he was now in the better safetie, as also the better able to incounter with the enimie: and it was not long after, but that he had a further supplie from the king, euen to his content. And being now somewhat reuiued, newes was brought vnto him, that the rebels vnderstanding of his distressed state, were comming, and marching toward Honiton to assaile him; and were come as far as Fenington bydge, which is about three miles. Whereupon, he took aduise with sir Peter Carew, sir Galwen Carew & others that were best to be done. And in the end, after manie speeches, it was concluded that they should march towards them, and giue the onset vpon them, & accordinglie, without further delays or much talke, it was done out of hand. For vpon the next morning being a holie daie, they set forth, and came to the bydge aforesaid, where the rebels were indeed: some at the bydge, but the greatest company in a medow beneath the bydge: who, as some as they persecuted the lord Russell and the gentlemen with all their troope to be come, they make themselves readie to the fight. But the ruler & the bydge being betwene them, the lord Russell vseth all the policies that he can, how to reconer the bydge; which by bold aduenturing he did in the end: but with the hurt of sundrie of his companie, amongst whome sir Galwen Carew was one, being hurt with an arrow in the arme.

And hauing recovered the bydge, and the river, all the rebels (such as were escaped) were gathered together in a medow nere adjoining in the lower side of the bydge, vpon whome they so fiercely followed, and gaue the onset; that though not without good losse of blowes and bloodshed, they in the end gaue the enimie the ouerthrow, and had the upper hand. And thinking that the victorie was cleare with them, and that the enimie was cleane gone, the soldiers and seruingsmen gaue themselves all to the spoile; and being in the middle of their game, and they nothing thinking less than of any moze entmies to be comming towards, euen suddenly march towards a newe crue of Cornishmen, to the number of two hundred, of two hundred and forty persons, vnder the conduct of one Robert Smith of saint Germans in Cornewall gentleman; and who taking these spoilers napping, manie of them paid dearlie for their waies. The lord Russell forthwith setteth all his companie in god arise, as the others did the like, and gaue the onset vpon them: betwene whome the fight for the time was verie sharpe and cruell. For the Cornishmen were verie lustie and fresh, and fullie bent to fight out the matter: nevertheless in the end they were ouerthrowne, and their capteine, whose combe was cut, thelwith a faire paire of heeles and fled awaie. In these two fights, there were reported to be slaine about three hundred rebels, which were verie tall men, lustie, and of great courage; and who in a god cause might haue done better seruice.

The lord Russells companie followed the chase nere three miles, & he himselfe then throughlie minded and bent to haue passed through to the citie. But one Joll his sole, who was then in hast come from Honiton, and where he had heard, as also by the waie as he came did heare bells ringing in sundrie parish churches, and supposing the same to be alarum, came with a soule mouth to my lord, and cried that all the countrie behind him were vp, and comming vpon him. Which his report (considering the cruell fights past) was credited, and thought that a newe companie was in preparing to follow the former quarels. Whereupon they all retired and returned againe to Honiton; and from thence his lordship sent his comfortable letters secretlie by a boy appointed and accustomed for the same, vnto the maior of his successe, as also aduertising him of his determination that he would be shortly with him for the deliuerance of the citie. Which letters (the citie being then but in a doubtfull and dismayed estate) came in verie good season; and yet in the end scarcelie credited by some men, because his comming was not so speedie as was looked for.

Within verie short time after this ouerthrowe was giuen, the lord Greie of Wiltow with a crue of horsemen, and one Spinola an Italian with three hundred shot, came to my lord; who being aduertised of the ouerthrow of the enimie, and that there were slaine about three hundred persons of them, they were in a great chafe, and much bewailed their euill lucke, that they had not come sooner to haue bene partakers of that seruice. My lord being now of a verie good comfort & courage, aswell for the good successe which he had ouer the enimie, & that his long looked supplie was come, sendeth his other letters to the maior, comforting him, as also as before promising him to be with him verie shortly; willing him that he should now take but a little patience for a little time. And accordinglie about six daies after, on saturdaye the third of August, in god order he set forth out of Honiton, and marched towards Excester, his companie being about a thousand of god fightingmen; and leauing the direct high waie, draweth ouer the downs towards Widdurte, and there lodged and pitched his campe that night, at a windmill appertaining to one Gregorie Cartie gentleman. Which when the rebels of saint Marie, which heard of, forthwith, with all their force and power came forth, and marched on wards, untill they came to the foresaid mill where they offer the fight: and notwithstanding they were of verie stout for-machs, & also verie valiantlie did stand to their heels, yet in the end they were ouerthrowne, and the most part of them slaine.

Where after the victorie thus gotten, the lord Russell Couerdale then the preacher, and attending vpon my lord in this iourne made a sermon, and caused a generall thanksgiving to be made vnto God: but before all was ended, there began a new alarm; and forthwith euerie man to horse & to harnesse againe. The rebels which remained in the towne of saint Marie Clift, hearing of the euill successe befallen to their neighbours, and they doubting that their turne would be next to receiue the like; do spread abroad the newes, and request to be aided and assisted. Whereupon, forthwith in great tropes reioyced vnto them a number of their companions out of euerie quarter, to the number (as it was said) of six thousand men: and in all hast, they make themselves and all things in a readinesse to abide the brunt. Upon the next morning being sundaie, my lord minding to follow on his course, commandeth the trumpet to sound, reuerie man to make readie to march forwards. And about nine of the clocke in the same morning, they come to Clift; where the armie is diuided into three parts, and in three severall places do appoint to make entrie into the towne. For in so manie places they had fortified the towne, and made great rampires for their defense.

These rampires were after some bickering recovered, and sir William Francis of Summerst-hire was named to be the first that gaue the aduenture, & made the entrie. The commons being driven from the said rampires, ran all into the towne; and there toine themselves together to abide the pulse. And as the kings armie was in good order marching into the towne, one of the chiefe captains of these rebels, named sir Thomas Pomeroie knight, kept himselfe in a furze close, and perceiving the armie to be past him, and hauing then with him a trumpeter, and a drumme, commanded the trumpet to be sounded, and the drumme to be stricken by. At which sound, the lord priole seale, and his companie were amazed, supposing verelie that there had bene an ambush behind them to haue intrapped and inclosed them. Whereupon, they forthwith retire backe in all the hast they may: which when they in the towne perceived, they follow after, and neuer staied vntill they came to the wagons then being in the high waie; & which now by fleeing and retiring of the armie, are the foremost and next to the towne. And these being laden with munition, armour, and treasure, they take and bring into the towne, where they rife as much as they could, sauing the peces of the ordinance, which with the shot and poulder they bestowed in places conuenient, and employed the same against my lord and his companie.

The armie hauing recovered the hill, did there pause a while, and finding themselves to be deceived, march backe againe towards the towne: but before they came thither, it was aduertised vnto my lord, that the towne and euerie house therein was fortified and full of men; and that it was not possible for ante to passe that waie without great perill and danger, except the towne were set on fire. Whereupon order was giuen, that as they passed and entered into the towne, notwithstanding it was my lords owne, they should set the houses on fire. Sir William Francis being in the foreward was for- mist, and leauing the waie which he toke before, toke another and other waies, which waie was both deepe and narrow. The enemies being vpon the banks vpon euerie side of the waie, with their stones to beat him, that they stroke his headpece fast to his head and whereof he died. The armie being come into the towne, they set fire on euerie house as they passed by. But the rebelles containing themselves in the middle of the towne, do stand at their defense, where the fight was very fierce and cruel; and bloodie was that daie: for some were slaine with the sword, some burned in the houses, some flitting for themselves were taken prisoners, and manie thinking to escape over the water were drowned: so that there were dead that daie one with an other about a thousand men.

The towne thus being recovered, and the over-throw giuen, the lord Greie desireth to passe over the riuer, and to be in the open field, which is a great heath named Clift heath: & this he could not do, but that he must passe over either the water or the bidge, both which were somewhat dangerous, for the water was somewhat mirie and muddie, as also at that time be- rie depe, by reason of the flowing of the seas, which causeth the same at euerie tide to swell. Howbeit one John Pardo a gentleman, and who had dwelled thereabouts, knowing the said water, gaue the first aduenture over, and found waie nere vnto a mill about the bidge; and after him others do followe. But this was not for all the rest of the armie, who must needs passe over the bidge, which as then they could not do, by reason that the same was so over- laid with great trees and timber, as also there stood the gunner with his peece readie charged. Whereupon proclamation was made, that whosoever would aduenture and make waie over the bidge, should haue foure hundred crownes for his labo: When one forthwith moze respecting the gaine, than foreseeing the perill, gaue the aduenture: but the gunner rewarded him, for he discharged his peece vpon him, and slue him. And then before he could againe charge his peece, one of the companie, who before was passed over the water, came and entred the bidge at the further end, and comming behind him slue him; who forthwith calleth companie vnto him, and causeth aside all the trees and timber, and maketh the bidge cleere, and so the whole armie passeth over the bidge into the heath.

The lord Greie as soone as he was passed over the water, he rode forthwith to the top of the hill, which is in the middle of the heath; and from thence did make a view of all the countrie about him: and looking backe towards Woodburie, he saw and espied vpon Woodburie hill a great companie assembled; & marching forward, & suspecting that they were a new supplie appointed to follow and come vpon them, and aduertised the lord Russell therof. Whereupon it was concluded, that the prisoners whom they had before taken at the windmill and in the towne, who were a great number, and which if they were netwile set vpon, might be a detriment and a perill vnto them, should be all killed: which forthwith was done, euerie man making a dispatch of his prisoners; and then the night approaching, there they incamped themselves for that night.

The rebelles, which were and late about Greesfer, were aduertised out of hand of this the euill successe of their neighbours; wherefore they with as manie as they could get, in all hast came to Clift heath: and in the lower side thereof next to the high waie, do intrench and fortifie a place fast by a hedge, and so crettie there, in the night, do place their ordinance, & make themselves in readinesse to abide the brunt: and as soone as the daie light serued, discharge and shot off their peces vnto the armie incamped about the top of the hill. The lords and captains to end the quarrell, do determine to giue the onset vpon them; and according to the nature of warres, do politelie diuide themselves into three parts, and euerie one hath his place assigned and order appointed vnto him.

The lord Russell, hauing no waie open before him, causeth his pioneers to make waie over the hedges & inclosed grounds, and by that means doth at length recover vpon the backe of the enemies: and they were so intrapped on euerie side, that they could not by any means escape, but must yield or fight. The one they would not, and in the other they prevailed not. For notwithstanding valiantly and stoutly they stood to their tackle, and would not give over as long as life and limb lasted: yet in the end they were all overthrowen, and few or none left alive. Great was the slaughter, and cruel was the fight; and such was the valor and stoutness of these men, that the lord Greie reported himselfe, that he neuer in all the wars that he had been in did know the like.

This fight being done, and all things set in good order, the whole armie marched unto Topsham, which was about a mile off, and late in that to come all that night, and carried with them in a hostler the bodies of corps of sir William Francis, and from thence carried it to Excester, where it was buried in martiall manner verie honorable in the bodie of the cathedrall church of saint Peters. When the rebels who late about the citie heard how their neighbors had sped, and from time to time had the worse side, and were still overthrowen: then as men despairing to prevail, secretly gave over the siege and ran awaye euerie man his waie. The gentlemen, which were kept prisoners in the churches and in other places about the citie, being now at libertie, came straight to the walles about midnight, & gave knowledge thereof to the watch; and they forthwith did the like unto the maior. The ioie and comfort thereof was so great, and the desire of fresh vittells so much pressed, that manie not abiding till the daie-light, gat and shifted themselves out of the gates, but more for vittells than for spoile, and yet they were glad of both: howbeit some did not long enioie the same, for manie being more greedy of meat than measurable in feeding, did so overcharge themselves in surfeiting, that they died thereof.

The next morrow being tuesday and the first of August, the lord priue scale thinking it long before he came to the citie, commanded the trumpets verie earlie to sound, and euerie man to make readie and to prepare alwaie. And accordinglie all things being done, he marcheth towards Excester, and about eight of the clocke being tuesday the first of August 1549 he came to the same, to the great ioy & comfort of the long captiued citizens, who were no more glad of their deliuerie, than was his lordship and all good subjects full of his victorie. But at his coming he entered not into the citie: for being aduertised from the maior that the citie was altogether furnished of vittells, order was taken that no stranger, nor one nor other should enter into the citie, but lie in the campe for a time. When his lordship pitched his tents without the wals in St. Johns fields, next to Southing haie, & upon the cities wals next to the posterne of his house was the kings standard of the red dragon set up. As soon as he was entered into his tent, the maior & all his brethren in most seemelie & decent order went unto him, who most louinglie embraced them, most thankfullie accepted them, and most highlie commended them for their trust, dutie, and service, which upon his fidelitie and honor he did promise should be well considered by the kings maiestie, and which in the end was performed. For the king being aduertised thereof, he did not onelie thankfullie accept and highlie commend their services, but also rewarded and considered the same, both by confirmation of their charters, enlarging of their liberties, and augmenting of their revenues, in giving unto them the maior of Excester, which as was said was sometimes their ancient inheritance, but by power of the earles of Devon by force taken, and by wrong and iniurie kept from them.

Immediatlie after his coming, sir William Herbert then master of the kings horses, and after earle of Denbroke, came with a thousand Welshmen: who though they came too late to the fraile; yet some inough to the plaie. For the whole countie was then put to the spoile, and euerie soldier fought for his best profit: a lust plague of the Lord upon rebels and disloyall persons. But the citie being as yet altogether destitute of vittells, and the Welshmen at their first coming seeing the same, they did by their speciall industries & travels fraught & furnish the same within two daies with coine, cattels, and vittells, verie plentifullie, to the great reliefe and comfort of the people therein, & to the benefit of themselves. The lord priue scale remained and continued in this citie about twelue daies before he removed: setting all things in good order, rewarding the good & punishing the euill. To sir Peter Carew he gave all Wineslades land, to sir Calwen Carew Humfrie Arundels lands, to William Gibbes esquier Weries lands, and to manie others which had done good services he gave prisoners, both bodies, goods, and lands.

On the other side he commanded forches and gallows to be set up in sundrie places, as well within the citie as also in the countie; and did command and cause manie to be executed and put to death, & speciallie such as were noted to be chiefe and buie dowers & ringleaders in this rebellion. Among them all there was no one so exalted as was Welsh the vicar of saint Thomas nere the Erbridge at Excester, who was preferred and presented to that benefice by the lord Russell patron thereof. This man had manie good things in him, he was of no great stature, but well set and mightilie compact: he was a verie good wrestler, shot well both in the long bow as also in the crossbow, he handled his handgun and peece verie well, he was a verie good woodman and a hardie, and such a one as would not give his head for the polling nor his beard for the washing, he was a companion in any exercises of activitie, & of a courteous and gentle behauiour, he descended of a good honest parentage, being bozne at Pennerin in Cornewall; and yet in this rebellion an archcapteine and a principall doer. He was charged with three principall crimes. The first was, that he did not onelie persuade the people to the condemning of the reformed religion, according to the kings proceedings, and to keepe and obserue the Romish and poppish religion: but also did erect, keepe, and vse the same in his parish church. Secondly, he was a capteine and a principall dealer in the cause of the rebellion, which was chieflie directed by him, his order, & advice. Thirdlie, he caused one Kingwell a tinner of Chagford, and seruant to master John Charrels of Tauesdale to be hanged, because secretly he had conveyed letters betwene my lord and his master, and was earnest in the reformed religion, which was then termed the kings proceedings, & an enemy to the poppish state. And being a sharpe inueter against the one, and an earnest maintainer of the other, it procured unto him great hatred and malice: when the rebellion was begun he fought by all the means he could how to escape alwaie: but he was so narrowly watched, that he could neuer haue any opportunity so to do.

They used all the deuises they could to recover him to their opinions, sometimes with faire words, sometimes with threatenings, and sometimes with imprisonment: but still he inuied against them, calling them rebels and traitors both against God and the king, and foreprophesied unto them that destruction and confusion would be the end & reward of their doings. Thus when they could not reclaim him to their disposition, then by the order and iudgement of this vicar Welsh, he was fetched out of the

The Welshmen came too late to the fight, but some inough to the spoile.

The lord priue scale remained and continued in this citie about twelue daies before he removed: rewarding the good and punishing the euill. Sir Peter Carew, sir Calwen Carew, William Gibbes, rewarded with traitors lands.

These things laid to the charge of the vicar of saint Thomas.

prison, and forthwith brought forth before Calphas and Pilat, and condemned to be hanged: which was executed upon him forthwith, and he brought to an elme tree in Crilond, without the west gate of the citie, before the house of one Nicholas Caeue, and there hanged. The like crueltie or rather tyrannie was done at Sampford Courteneie, where then a certeine frankelin a gentleman, named William Hektons, who comming to Sampford to haue some communication with them for the staie of their rebellion, and for the pacifying of them in their due obedience, was at the townes end taken prisoner, & carried to the churchhouse, where he so earnestlie reproued them for their rebellion, & so sharplie threatened them an euill successe: that they all fell in a rage with him, and not onlie with euill words reuiled him: but also as he was going out of the churchhouse & going downe the staires, one of them named Cithbyrde with a bill strake him in the necke, and immediatlie notwithstanding his pitifull requests and lamentations, a number of the rest fell upon him, slue him, and cut him into small peeces: and though they counted him for an heretike, yet they buried him in the church-yard there, but contrarie to the common manner, laing his bodie north and south.

These things being called to remembrance and objected against this vicar, although some men in respect of his vertues and good gifts did pittie and lament his case, and would haue gladlie bene sutors for his pardon: yet the greatnesse of his lewdnesse and follies considered, they left him unto his deserts: & so was by order of the marshall law condemned to death. And yet this one thing by the waie I must speake in his commendation. There was among the rebels a stranger and an alien, who was a verie skilfull gunner, & could handle his peece verie well, and did much harme vnto the citie, & among others slue one Smith standing at a doore in northgate street with a great shot from saint Dauids hill. This fellow toke vpon him, that he would set the whole citie on fire, and it should be cleane burned within foure houres, do they what they could. This his offer was so well liked, that the daie and tyme was appointed when this should be done.

The vicar hearing thereof, assembleth vnto him as manie men as he could make and haue, & came to this companie when this fire should be kindled, and was so hot and earnest against their attempts, that he would in no wise suffer so lewd an act and wicked a thing to be done. For (saith he) do you what you can by policie, force, or dint of sword to take the citie, I will ioyne with you, and do my best: but to burne a citie which shall be hurtfull to all men and good to no man, I will neuer consent thereunto, but will here stand with all my power against you. And so stout he was in this matter, that he stopped them from their further enterprysing of so wicked a fact. But to the matter. The execution of this man was committed to Barnard Duffeld, who being nothing slacke to follow his commission, caused a paire of gallowes to be made, and to be set vp vpon the top of the towler of the said vicars parish church of S. Thomas: and all things being readie and the stage perfected for this tragedie, the vicar was brought to the place, and by a rope about his middell dazorie bp to the top of the towler: and there in chains hanged in his popish apparell, and had a holie water bucket and spynkle, a sacring bell, a paire of beads, & such other like popish trash hanged about him, and there he with the same about him remained a long time. He made a verie small or no confession, but verie patientlie toke his death, he had bene a good member in his common-wealth, had not the words ouergroونه the good coine, and his soule vices ouercom-med his vertues.

The lord priue scale remaining still in Excester was continuallie occupied in setting things in order, he was verie seuerie and sharpe against such offenders as were chiefe and principall ringleaders of this rebellion: but to the common sort who were led and carried, and who did humble themselves, he was pitifull and mercifull, and did daillie pardon infinite numbers. And his lordship thinking verelie that all things were now quieted, & the rebels pacified, sodenlie newes were brought vnto him that there assembled at Sampford Courtneie, both Devonshire men and Cornishmen, and who were fullie bent to mainteine their quarrell and abide the battell. These newes so troubled and tickled my lord, that all businesse set apart, he commaunded forthwith the trumpet to be sounded, and the drumme to be stricken vp, and all his armie to be forthwith mustered: which was then the greater, by reason of the Welshmen and gentlemen of the countrie and of the commoners, who vpon submission had obtained pardon, and increased to the number of eight or ten thousand men, and forthwith he marcheth towards Sampford Courtneie, where sir William Herbert requested to haue the foze-ward for that daie, which was granted him.

And being come thither, albeit the great companie of so manie good soldiers and well appointed might haue discomfited them, being nothing nor in order, nor in companie, nor in experience, to be compared vnto the others: yet they were at a point they would not yelde to no perswasions, nor did, but most manfullie did abide the fight: and neuer gaue ouer, vntill that both in the towne and in the field they were all for the most taken or slaine. At which time one ap Owen a Welsh gentleman, more boldlie than aduisedlie giuing the aduenture to enter the rampier at the townes end, was there slaine by the rebels, and after carried backe to Cron, where after the manner of wars he was honorable buried in the bodie of saint Peters church, few of the kings side besides him then slaine: and so of a traitorous beginning they made a shamefull ending. Neuertheless manie escaped and they fled towards Summerfetshire: after whom was sent sir Peter Carew, and sir Hugh Paulet then knight marshall: with a great companie attending vpon them, and followed them as far as to King Welton in the countie of Summerfet: where they ouertooke them and ouerthrew them, and also toke one Coffin a gentleman their captaine prisoner and brought him vnto Excester.

The lord Russell himselfe minding to make all things sure, taketh his forneie, and marcheth into Cornewall: and following his former course, causeth execution to be done vpon a great manie, and especially vpon the chiefe belwedders and ringleaders: but the chiefe and principall captaine he kept as prisoner, and brought them with him to Excester. And when this lord had set all things in god order, he returned to Excester, & remained there for a time: but after departed towards London, where he was received with great ioy and thanks: and being come before the king, he forgot not to commend vnto his maiestie the good seruite of this citie in this rebellion, which (as is before said) was liberallie rewarded and considered. After his departure, and according to his order and appointment, the chiefe captaine and principall heads of this rebellion, whom he left in prison in the kings goale at Excester, were carried to London and commaunded to the towler, and in their due time were afterwards executed to death, namely Humfreie Arundell esquier, Willelme esquier, John Berrie and Coffin gentlemen, and Holmes yeoman: which Coffin and Holmes were seruants to to sir John Arundell knight. Of the number of them who were slain, there is no certain knote, but manie more be found lacke then number: holobrit it was accounted by such as continued in the whole service of this commotion to be about foure thousand men. But what number was of the contrarie side dispatched, nothing is reported, albeit it be well knowne that they escaped not scotfree, and especiallie the Burgonians, who were abhorred of the one partie, and nothing favoured of the other. Thus much concerning the description of the cite, and of the sundrie inuasions and assaults against the same, and especiallie of the last rebellion or commotion in the yeare of our Lord 1549, wherein much more might be spoken, but this may suffice for this matter. And for as much as the cathedrall church of this cite, called by the name of S. Peters, is a parcell of the cite, and compassed within the walls of the same, though in respect of certaine priuileges distinct from the iurisdiction thereof; I thought it good to subiect hereunto the description of the said church; and of the antiquitie of the same.

The antiquitie, foundation, and building of the cathedrall church of saint Peters in Excester.

After that corrupt religion and superstition was crept and receiued into the church, and the people became deuout therein, then began the erecting of religious houses and monasteries in euerie countie. And as this was vniuersall throughout all chrestendome vnder the gouernement of the Romaine bishop: so also was it generallie done throughout all England, in which generallie this cite was of a particularitie; for in this cite from time to time as opportunitie serued sundrie religious houses and monasteries were erected and builded, of which there were thre within the cite, circuit, and place now called the clofe of S. Peters, and which in time accrued and were vniued into one. The first was a house for women called moniales or nuns, which is now the deanes house or halendar haie. The other was a house of monks, supposed to be builded by king Ethelred, the third sonne to king Ethelwolp, and these two were vniued by bishop Leofricus vnto the cathedrall church. The third was a house for monks of the order of S. Benet, which was builded and founded by king Athelstane, about the yeare of our Lord 932: and this is that part of the cathedrall church now called the ladie chappell. For the said king, hauing giuen out of this cite the Wiltens then dwelling therein, and minding to make a full conquest both of them and of this their countie which they then inhabited, did so fiercelie follow and pursue them euen into Cornewall, that in the end he conquered them, and had the victorie. After which he returned to this cite, and here staing and sojourning for a time, did reedifie the cite, incompassed it with a stone wall, and founded the cathedrall church, which he then appointed for a monasterie for monks of S. Benets order. For so is it written: Hanc urbem rex Athelstani primus in potestatem Anglorum effugatis Britonibus redactam turribus munivit, et muro ex quadratis lapidibus cinxit, ac antiquitus vocatam Munketon nunc Excester vocari voluit: ac ibi sedens mansum quoddam dedit ad fundandum monasterium pro monachis Deo et sancto Petro famulantibus. Besides the charges which he was at the building of the said church, he gaue also lands and reuenues vnto them sufficient for maintenance and liuelihods, whereof Popkehill and Treasurors were parcell, and which now are appendant and appertaining to the treasurer of the cathedrall church.

After the time of king Athelstane, the Danes with great hostilitie and crueltie hauing overrun this whole land, they also came to this cite, and in spoiling the same, did also ransacke and spoile the said church, whose continuall inuasions the monks being not able to indure, fled and forsoke their house and home, and sought places of better safetie. By which means this monasterie for sundrie yeares was left desituted, vntill the time of king Edgar; who on a time made a progresse into these west parts, to visit his father in law Dogarus then earle of Deuon, and founder of the abbey of Taunfoke, whose daughter he had married. And being come to this cite, did here rest and staie himselfe, where then he saw the distressed state of the said church, & pitying the same, caused search and inquirie to be made of the monks which were scattered and yet left: and when he had gotten them together, he restored them vnto their house and liuelihods, and appointed Sidemannus who was afterwards bishop of this diocese to be abbat of the same. And from thensforth they continued together (though sometimes in troubles) vntill that king Swanus or Sweno the Dane, with a mightie and a huge armie came to this cite, besieged, toke, spoiled, and destroyed it with sword and fier. Whombe it not long after it was restored againe by king Canutus or Canutus, who being aduertised of the great cruelties which his father Sweno had done to the said monasterie, did at the request of Athelredus one of his dukes, make restitution vnto Athelwoldus then abbat of all their lands, liuinges and priuileges: as doth appeare by his charter dated in the yeare of our Lord 1019.

After this, about thirtie yeares, king Edward the Confessor came to this cite, and he by the aduise and at the motion of Leofricus bishop of Crediton, and who sometimes was lord chancellor of England vnder the said king, and one of his priue counsell, partlie for the better safetie of the bishop and his successors, who lieng and hauing their houses in the countie, were subiect to manie and sundrie perils, and partlie to prouide a more conuenient place for the monks, did remove the bishops see from Crediton, and removed the monks vnto Welfminster: and he the king in his owne person, together with quene Edith his wife, did install the said Leofricus in possession of this his new church and see. The bishop thus removed from the old, and placed in the new see and church, doth endow the same with all those lands and liuelihods which he had of the gift of the said king, and which before did appertene to his former church, and to reduce and make his sanctuarie to his mind, polleth downe the two monasteries nere adioining, the one being of monks and the other of nuns, and addeth and vnieth them vnto his owne church, and hauing brought all things to effect according to his mind, denifeth and maketh lawes, orders, and ordinances for the good gouernment of his church and cleargie.

After the death of Leofricus, all his successors for the most part procure the augmentation and increase of this their new erected see and church, some in liuelihods, some in liberties and priuileges, some in buildings, and some in one thing, and some in another. William Warewast the third bishop of this church, who had sometimes bene chapleine to the Conqueror, and to his two sonnes William and Henrie, was in such fauor and good liking with the Conqueror, that at his request he gaue vnto him and to this church, Plimpton, Wampton, and S. Stephens, in Excester, which gift his said sonnes being kings of England did ratifie and confirme. And then this said bishop, hauing the ordering and visiting thereof, giueth Plimpton to the regular monkes there, for whom he had founded and builded a monasterie, and wherein he himselfe shortly after leauing and yeelding vp his bishoprike, became and was a monke. Wrampton was referred to the church, and which afterwards was annexed to the deanerie. And St. Stephens with the fee to the same appertaining, he referred to himselfe and to his successors, & where by they are barons and lords of the parlement. This bishop in the yeare of our Lord 1112, first began to enlarge his cathedrall, and laid the foundation of that part, which is now the chapele quier: for before that time it was no bigger than that, which since and now is called the lade chapele. After him William Bzower the bishop made and established in the yeare of our Lord 1235, a deane and a chapter of foure and twentie prebendaries: and for the deane (whome he appointed, and whose name was Serlo) and for his successors, he gave and impropriated Wrampton and Coliton Kableigh, and for the prebendaries he purchased lands, allotting and assigning to euery of them Pro pane & sale the like portion of foure pounds.

Bishop William Bzower instituteth the deane & foure and twentie prebendaries.

The bodie of saint Peters church first founded.

The chanter and subdeane first constituted in this church.

Bishop Grandisson a great benefactor to the church.

The church of St. Peters was in building 437 yeares.

Peter Duinel the bishop finding the chancell of his church to be fullie builded and ended, beginneth to found and build the lower part of the bodie of his church, in the yeare of our Lord 1284, from the chancell of his church vnto the west end of the said church. This man first appointed a chanter and a subdeane to be in his church. To the one of them he impropriated Daineton and Chudleie, and to the other the parsonage of Gloschehaile in Cornewall. After him John Grandisson, in the yeare of our Lord 1340, did increase the length of the bodie of the church from the fust westwards, as also vaulted the rofe of the whole church, and did fullie end and finishe the same. And albeit from the time of king Athelstane the first founder in the yeare of our Lord 932, vntill the date of the death of this bishop Grandisson, which was in the yeare 1369, there were about 437 yeares distant, and in the meane time this church was continued in building by sundrie persons: yet it is so decentlie and vniuersallie compacted, as though it had bene builded at one verie time and instant.

The cloister builded.

The building of the chapter house.

The successor of this Grandisson, who was named Thomas Wentingham, finished and ended the north tower of the church. After this, about the yeare of our Lord 1400, and in the time of bishop Stoford, the cloister was added to the church, and builded at the most part of the charges of the deane and chapter. And not long after Edmund Lacie bishop began to build the chapter house, which being not ended in his time, his next successor George Penill, in the yeare of our Lord 1456, did fullie end and absolue the same: and which is a verie faire, beautifull, and a sumptuous worke. And thus much concerning the antiquitie, foundation, and building of this cathedrall church. Thus far John Hooker.

Common rebellion.

About the same time that this rebellion (whereof all the foresaid discourse tendeth) began in the west, the like disordered hurles were attempted in Dorsetshire, and Buckinghamshire: but they were speedily appeased by the lord Greie of Wilton, who comming downe that waie to soine with the lord priuie seale, chased the rebels to their houses, of whome two hundred were taken, and a dozen of the ringleaders to him deliuered, wherof certeine afterwards were executed. Whereouer, in diuerse other parts of the realme, namelie in the south and east parts, did the people (as before ye haue heard) assemble themselves in rebellions maner, committing manie foule disorders: but yet by god policie and wholesome persuasions they were appeased, except in Dorsetshire, where after there was a rumour spied, that at the commons in Kent had throlone downe the diches and hedges, wherewith certeine pasture grounds were inclosed, and had laid the same open. Diuerse seditious persons and buisie fellows began to complaine that the like had not bene done in Dorsetshire, and ceased not to practise how to raise the people to an open rebellion; meaning not onelic to laie open parkes and inclosures, but to attempt other reformations, as they termed them; to the great danger of ouerthrowing the whole state of the common-wealthe.

They chiefie declared a spitefull ranco; and hatred conceived against gentlemen, whome they maliciouslie accused of inordinat couetousnesse, pride, rapine, extortion, and oppression, practised against their tenants and other, for the which they accounted them worthy of all punishment. Whereupon diuerse of them, namelie the inhabitants of Atliborough, and other of their neighbors, conceiuing no small displeasure, for that one Grene of Wilbie had taken in a parcell of the common pasture, as was supposed, belonging to the towne of Atliborough, and abiding together, and threlo downe certeine new diches made by the said Grene, to inclose in the said parcell of commons.

This was done before Midsummer, and so it rested till the first of Iulie, at which time there should be a publike plate kept at Wilmondham, a towne distant from Dorsetshire six miles, which plate had bene accustomed yearelie to be kept in that towne, continuing for the space of one night and one date at the least. Whereupon the wicked contriuers of this vnhappie rebellion, toke occasion by the assembling of such numbers of people as resorted thither to see that plaie, to enter further into their wicked enterprise: and vpon conference had, they immediatlie assembled at Dorsetshire a mile from Wilmondham, & there they cast downe certeine diches of maister Hubbords on the tuesday, and that night they repaired to Wilmondham againe, where they practised the like feats. But as yet they toke no mans goods by violence.

Whereupon one John Flowerdew of Wetherset gentleman, finding himselfe grieved with the casting downe of some diches, came vnto some of the rebels, and gaue to them fortie pence to cast downe the fences of an inclosure belonging to Robert Ket, a knight, a tanner of Wilmondham; which pasture lieth nere to the faire Mounge at Wilmondham also: which they did. And that night consulting together, the next morning they toke their tournets to Wetherset, by the procurement of the said Robert Ket, in reuenge of the displeasure which he had conceived against the said Flowerdew, and set them in hand to plucke vp and cast downe hedges and diches, wherewith certeine pasture grounds belonging to the said Flowerdew were inclosed.

Here was somewhat adoe. For maister Flowerdew did what he could to haue caused them to desist from that attempt, in somuch that manie sharpe words passed betwixt Ket and the said maister Flowerdew. But Ket being a man hardie and forward to anie desperate attempt that should be taken in hand, was straight entered into such estimation with the commons thus assembled together in rebellious wise, that his will was accomplished: and so those hedges and diches belonging to the pasture grounds of maister Flowerdew were throlone downe and made plaine. Whereupon was Ket chosen to be their capteine and ringleader, who being resolved to set all on fir and seuen, willed them to be of god comfort, and to follow him in defense of their common libertie, being readie in the common-welths cause to hazard both life and goods.

Wherewith they passed the water betwixt Crin-gelford and Witon, and coming to Bowthorpe, cast downe certeine hedges and ditches in that place, and their number being now greatlie increased, they in-camped there that night. Here sir Edmund Wain-dam knight, being high shiriffe of Suffolke and Suffolke, came and proclaimed them rebels, commanding them to depart in the kings maiesties name. With which proclamation they were greatlie offended, and attempted to haue got him into their hands: but he being well hoisted, valiantlie brake through them that had compassed him in: howbeit he escaped from them and got into Norwich, being not past a mile off. The same night there came a great number of lewd people vnto them, as well out of the citie of Norwich as out of the countrie, with weapon, armour, and artillerie.

The daie before that Ket came to this place, a great number of the meaner sort of the citizens of Norwich had thowne downe a quickset hedge, and filled up the ditches, wherewith the foresaid commons were on the one side inclosed, to keepe in the cattell of the citizens that had the same going before their common meatherd: and so that fence which by god and prouident aduise of their forefathers, had bene raised and made for the common profit of the whole citie, was thus by a sort of lewd persons defaced and cast downe at that present. And scarce had they thowne downe the ditch in the upper end of this parish, but that a companie of euill disposed persons stale out of the citie, and got them to Kets campe.
The maior of the citie named Thomas God aduertised hereof, doubting what might follow of this michievous begun rebellion, thought god to trie if he might persuaade the rebels to giue over their traitorous enterprises: and therefore taking certeine of the aldermen with him, he went to Kets campe, bringing that persuasions he could to reduce them vnto their doutfull obedience, & to depart home to their houses.
But his trauell was in vaine, and therefore returned backe to the citie without hope to doe anie good with that brutall rout.

After whose departure, they considering in what danger they stood to be surprisid, if they should sca-ter abroad in such sort as till then they had done, seeking to wast and spoile the countrie about them, without keeping together in anie warlike order, thought it stood most with their suertie to draw into one place, and to fortifie the same for their further strength. Upon this resolution they determined to go with all speed vnto Spaulthorpe, a place as they tooke it next for their purpose, and therefore sent to the maior of Norwich, requesting him of licence to passe through the citie, because it was their nearest waie, promising not to offer anie iniurie or violence to anie person, but quietly to march through the citie vnto their place appointed. But the maior did not on-lie denie them passage, but also with sharpe and bitter speech reprobating their rebellious doings, told them what should follow thereof, if they gaue not ouer in time from further proceeding in such wicked attempts.

The next daie being thursdaie, sir Roger Woodhouse with seuen or eight of his household seruants, came to them, bringing with him two carts laden with beere, and one cart laden with other vittels: for a recompense whereof he was stripped out of his ap-parell, had his horses taken from him, and whatsoeuer else he had, the rebels accounting the same a god peece, he himselfe was cruelly tugged and cast into a ditch of one Acres of nether Arleham by Welle Donbridge: where the same daie the rebels, being disappointed of their purpose to passe through Norwich, found meanes to passe, and coming to mai-ger Corbets house of Spaulthorpe, intended to haue burnt the same house. But yet being perswaded to spare it from fire, they spoiled his goods, defaced a douchouse of his, which had bene a chappell, and afterwards got them to Spaulthorpe, and coming to St.

Leonards hill, on which the erle of Surrie had built a statelie house called mount Surrie, they inkennelled themselves there on the same hill; and in the woods adioining that lie on the west and the south side of the same hill, as the commons or pasture called Spaulthorpe heath lieth on the east side, which containeth foure or five miles in length, & three or foure in breadth.

They put sir Roger Woodhouse, and other prisoners whom they had caught, in strict ward within the foresaid house of mount Surrie, on the which they seized, and spoiled whatsoeuer they found within it. In the meane time, the maior of Norwich taking aduise with his brethren the aldermen, what was best to doe in this case; whether presentlie to issue forth, and distresse the rebels now in the beginning, least time might giue them meane to increase their power: or rather to staie till they had aduertised the councell of the whole matter. In the end they agreed that this last aduise was most surest, and so they dispatched a post with all speed to the court. Beside this great campe (as they termed it) at Spaulthorpe, there was a lesser at Kising chace neare to Lin: but the rebels there, by the good diligence and circumspect pollicie of the iustices and gentlemen of those parts, were speedilie repelled, and driuen from thence.
Notwithstanding afterwards they assembled togither at Watton, & there remained about a fortnight, stopping also the passage at Thetford and Brandon ferrie, within nine miles of the said Watton: and at length came and ioined themselves with these other at Spaulthorpe, by appointment of their generall captaine (as they took him) the foresaid Robert Ket.

Whereouer, there came flocking from Suffolke and other parts, a great multitude of lewd disposed persons, raised by firing of beacons, and ringing of bells. Also a number of rascals & naughtie lewd persons stale out of the citie of Norwich, and went to campe. And thus being got together in great multitudes, they added one wickednesse to another, as having no state of themselves after their downefall, nor holding them content with the committing of one villanous trespass and horrible transgression, according vnto the poets words to the like purpose:

Quisquam hominum est, quem tu contentum videris uno Flagitio?

Now to cloke their malicious purpose with a comterfeit shew of holinesse, they caused one Coniers vicar of saint Martins in Norwich to saie seruice morning and euening, to praise to God for prosperous speed in that their vngodlie enterprize. Whereouer they went about to ioine to their cause diuers honest men, and right commendable for religion, doctrine, vertue, and innocencie of life; amongst whom were Robert Watton a preacher, Thomas God maior of Norwich, and Thomas Alderich of Pangrue hall.
These three, although sore against their willes, were constrained to be present with them in all matters of counsell, and to take vpon them (as associates with capteine Ket) the administration and order of euerie thing: which happened well for manie. For when ether Ket himselfe, or anie other of the capteins, through setting on of the outrageous multitude, pur-posed anie mischance (as often it came to passe) in one place or other, through their graue aduise, and approued industrie, their furie was sundrie times raised and calmed. Although Ket bent to all vngodlienes,

Then followed in order a long list of names, for the number of the gouernors was great, as they that beside the chiefe captaines had chosen out of euerie hundred two, and there were six and twentie hundred. By vertue of such commissions, manie that were of god worship and credit in the countrie, whom the rebels in their rage had condemned, were fetched from their houses, and other places where they might be found, and being brought to the campe, were committed to prison. Also the ditches and hedges, wherewith the commons abode in the countrie, were inclosed, were throlone downe, & manie were warned and called forth from sundrie parts, to come and take part with them in these tumultuous uprores. And all these things were done, the maior, maister Aldrich not onlie holding their peace and twinkling thereat, but also sometime after a manner giuing their consent to the same, for to haue resisted them had bene but follie, and the waie to haue put themselves in danger of destruction, and their countrie too.

The number of the rebels.

The honest citizens of Poxtolke in this meane while remained in great perplexitie, hearing nothing from the king nor his counsell. They therefore being vncertaine what to do, abode in the citie, till they might vnderstand what order it should please the king to take for the quieting of these troubles. The cause why the counsell was thus slacke in prouiding remedie against the Poxtolke rebels, was: for that they were busie in quieting the troubles in the inner part of the realme about London, and other places (as before ye haue heard) by meanes whereof the power of these Poxtolke rebels still increased, so that there were assembled togither into thes campe, to the number of sixtene thousand vngracious vnchristis, who by the aduise of their captaines fortified themselves, and made prouision of artillerie, powder and other abillments, which they fetched out of ships, gentlemens houses, and other places where any wares to be found, and withall spoiled the countrie of all the cattell, riches and coine, on which they might laie hands.

Rebels and

But because manie (as in such case is euer seene) did prouide for themselves, and bid that which they got, laung it vp for their owne stoz, and brought it not forth to further the common cause, yet and the other gouernors (for so would they be called) thought to prouide a remedie, and by common consent it was decreed, that a place should be appointed, where iudgements might be exercised, as in a iudiciall hall.

Whereupon they found out a great old oke, where the said Act, and the other gouernors or deputies might sit and place themselves, to heare and determine such quareling matters as came in question. Afore whom sometime would assemble a great number of the rebels, and exhibit complaints of such disorders, as now and then were practised among them; and there they would take order for the redressing of such wrongs and injuries as were appointed, so that such greedy vagabounds as were ready to spoile more than seemed to stand with the pleasure of the said gouernors, and farther than there commissions would beare, were committed to prison. This oke they named the tree of reformation.

The tree of reformation.

The maior, maister Aldrich and others, whom they had receiued into the number of their gouernors, would oftentimes go vp into this tree, and make diuerse pitie orations to persuade the outrageous multitude to giue over their riotous rapines and spoilings. There were also certeine diuines which did vse all waies possible to withhold them from their wicked attempts; and to reduce them to peace and quietnesse, although this was not done without danger of their liues. Neuertheless, these in the due time used to preach in the churches, and in the night to watch with armour upon their backs, leaving nothing vndoone that might seme to asperitise vnto the dustie of godlie and vertuous diuines, or faithfull and obedient subjects. Among these was doctor Mathew Parker, afterward archbishop of Cantuarie, whose wisdom, faithfulness, and integritie was most apparant.

Doctor Parker.

He coming on a daie into the campe with his brother Thomas Parker, that was after maior of Poxtolke, found them before the tree at common praier, the foreremembred Coniers bicar of saint Martins in Poxtolke sateng the Lecture. Whereupon doctor Parker thinking the time to serue for his purpose, went vp into the tree; where he made a sermon, diuiding it into thre feuerall parts. In the first he exhorted them to vse with moderation those vittels which they had prouided & brought into their campe, and not riotouslie nor laushlie to wast and consume them. In the second he aduised them in no wise to take reuenge of priuat displeasures, and not to chaine or keepe in irons those persons whom they held in ward, nor to take anie mans life from him. Lastly, he wished that they should haue regard to themselves, & leaue off their rash begun enterprise, giuing eare to such heralds or other messengers as came from the king, and to shew such honour vnto his maiestie now in his pong and tender yeares, as they might inioy him hereafter being growne vp in vertue, to their great ioy, comfort, and gladnesse. As he was handling this matter, with manie godly and effectuall reasons, hauing the auditozie attentive to his words, one lewd fellow among the rest cried out and said: How long shall we suffer this hireling doctor, who being waged by gentlemen, is come hither with his tong, which is sold and tied to serue their appetite? But for all his prating words, let vs brydle them, and bring them vnder the orders of our law.

When began the multitude to stir and make a noise, threatening the preacher, some of them saing: It were well, that for his faire told tale we should bring him downe with a mischiefe, with arrows and lanelings. This speech brought doctor Parker in no small feare, and the more, for that he heard a noise and clattering of weapons vnder him, so that he looked for present death among them. But herein he was deceiued: for there was not a man that stood next him within the compasse of the tree, would him anie harme. And immediatlie the foresaid bicar of

So, Martins that executed the office of the minister, began with helpe of some singinmen that were present, the canticle Te Deum, wherewith the vnruly multitude seemed partlie to quiet themselves. Which occasion doctor Parker perceiuing to serue his turne, thought not longer to tarie amongst them; but quietly got him downe from the tree, and with his brother made hast towards the citie. But before he came to Dockthorp gate, there were of the rebels that came to him, and began to question with him about his licence, whereby he was authorized to preach; but he perceiuing that there was no reason to be conceiued of them, slipt his waies, and left his brother to argue the matter with them.

Yet the next daie he entering into saint Clements church, took occasion to expound somewhat out of one of the lessons that was read that daie, concerning these wicked bariburles; manie of the rebels comming about him; but not interrupting him a whit, hearing the end of his exhortation, although they seemed greatlie therewith offended. But as he came out of the church, they followed him, and told him that (as they understood) he had three or foure able geldings to serue the king; and therefore charged him that after dinner they might be ready for them to occupie. But doctor Parker made them no great answer; but calling to him his horsekeeper, commanded him to plucke off the shoes from some of his geldings, and to pare their hounes vnto the quicke; and that he should anoint the other with neruall, as if they had bene lamed with trauell. The rebels perceiuing this, when they saw the same geldings had forth as it had bene to pasture, made no further businesse. Whereupon doctor Parker shozle after, feining as if he went abroad to walke two miles off from the citie, at Crinklesford bridge found his horses ready as he had appointed, with his servants, and mounting vp, took his iourneie towards Cambridge, with as much speed as was possible, escaping thither out of all danger, although by the waie they met with and saw diuerse of the rebels plaieng their parts in their wonted outrageous manner. Thus did doctor Parker escape the hands of the wicked rebels, who despising his whole some admonitions, did afterwards by Gods iust iudgement proue his words to be most true.

But in the meane time proceeding from one mischief to another, after they had practised to spoile the gentlemen of the countrie of their goods, they began to attach their bodie, and by force to bring them into their campe: so that such as escaped their hands, were glad to flee, and hide themselves in woods and canes, where they might best keepe themselves out of their aduersaries reach and intended dangers. But to speake of all the horrible praisses by these ungratious people exercised, it would be too long a proesse. That shifs they found to cloake their doings, and that euen vnder the kings authoritie, if it was wonderfull. For whereas there were certeine commissions directed vnto diuerse gentlemen in the countrie, to take order for the appeasing of these tumults; they getting the same into their hands, took vpon them the authoritie committed to the gentlemen, vnto whome the same commissions were sent; and taking off the scales from the other, fastened the same vnto their counterfeit writings. To conclude, they grew to such vnnearurable disorder, that they would not in manie things obeye neither their generall capteine, nor anie of their gouernors, but ran headlong into all kind of mischief, & made such spoile of vittels which they brought out of the countrie adioining vnto their campe, that within few daies they consumed (beside a great number of beees) twentie thousand muttons, also swans, geese, hens, capons, ducks, & other fowles so manie as they might laie hands vpon. And furthermore, they spared not to breake into parks, and kill what there they could. Such haucke they made of all that came in their waie, and such number of sheepe speciallie they brought into their campe, that a good fat weather was sold for a groat. The woods, groues, and trees that were destroyed I passe ouer, and make no mention thereof. Herewith, what crueltie was shewed by them in fettering and manacing such gentlemen as they caught, and committed to prison for some mistaking they had conceiued of them, it was a miserable case to behold. Some there were whom they brought forth; as it had bene to iudgement before the tree of reformation, there to be tried afore the gouernors, as if they had bene guiltie of some heinous and greuous crime. And when it was asked of the commons, what should be done with those prisoners, they would crie with one voice; Hang them, hang them. And when they were asked why they gave so sharpe iudgement of those whom they neuer knew, they would roundlie answer; that other cried the same crie; and therefore they went to giue their assent with other; although they could yeeld no reason, but that they were gentlemen, & therefore not worthy to liue.

The outragious dealing as gainst gentle-
men.

Whilest the rebels thus raged abroad in the countrie at Hengham eleuen miles from Norwich, sir Edmund Breuet knight, with a small companie of his owne mentall seruants, set vpon the night watch of the rebels that were placed there, & brake through, overthrowing diuerse of them; and hauing some of his owne men also unhorsed by the rebels, and in danger to be hewen in peeces among them, yet he recovered them, & escaped their hands through great manhood. After which good nights seruice, as they would haue it esteemed, they repaired to their great capteine Ket, to shew their hurts received, & to complaine of their griefes. It was talked among them, that they would go to sir Edmund Breuet's house called Buckenham castell, to assault it, and to fetch him out of it by force. But it was doubted of some, least it were too strong for them; and other feared sharpe stripes, if they should attempt that exploit, being at the least twelue miles from their maine campe: and so that enterpise went not forward, the most part thinking it best to sleepe in whole skins.

Sir Edmund
Breuet's seruice.

There was at London the same time a citizen of Norwich, one Leonard Southerton fled from thence for feare of his life, whome the counsell sent for, to come to speake with them: and being asked what he knew touching the state of the rebels, he declared to them from point to point the manner of all their outrageous proceedings; but yet that as he understood, there were manie among them that would laie aside their armour, if they might be assured of the kings pardon: and therefore if it would please the king to set forth a proclamation, that all such as would depart from the campe and be quiet, should haue their pardon for all that was past, he doubted not but that those routs should be dispersed. His aduise was allowed, and thereupon was an herald sent with all speed in companie with the said Southerton vnto Norwich; & comming into the campe the last of Julie, and standing before the tree of reformation, apparelled in his cote of armes, pronounced there before all the multitude, with loud voice, a free pardon to all that would depart to their homes, and laieing aside their armour, giue ouer their traitorous begun enterpise.

After he had made an end of his proclamation, in maner all the multitude cried, God save the king. And manie of them falling downe vpon their knees, could could not forbear with feares gushing from their eyes, but commend the kings great and unspeakable mercie thus freilie offered unto them, which doubtlesly they had at that time all of them received, if the wicked speech of some of the rascall sort, and namelie the traitorous persuasions of that wicked caittife that himselve, had not staied them from their dutifull inclinations. But after that that had with lowd voice before declared, that kings & princes were accustomed to grant pardons to such as are offenders, and not to others; he trusted that he needed not anie pardon, sith he had done nothing but that belonged to the dutie of a true subiect: and here with he besought them not to forsake him, but to remember his promise, sith he was readie to spend his life in the quarell. The herald hereupon called him traitor, and commanded John Petibone the swordbearer of Northwich to attach him for treason. Then began a great hurle burle among the multitude, so that the herald, perceiving they began to shrink from their former purpose of receiving the kings pardon, departed from them with these words: All ye that be the kings friends, come a'waie with me. The maior & maister Alderich, with a great number of other gentlemen & honest peomen that were readie to obey the kings commandement, followed him.

The citizens favouring the rebels.

The maior being thus returned to the citie, caused the gates to be shut, and such gentlemen as had been committed to prison within the castell, or other places in the citie, he caused to be set at libertie, & with their aduise toke order how the rebelles might be kept out. But as he was busie about such matters, certeine of the citizens that favoured the rebelles had receiued a great multitude of them into the citie, which did put the citizens in such feare, that it was thought the most suretie for the gentlemen that had bene now released out of prison, to be shut up againe, least the rebelles finding them abroad, should haue murdered them. Yet after this, when the rebels were departed out of the citie againe, the maior & aldermen fell in hand to ramprye by the gates, to plant ordinance, and to make all necessarie provision that for them was possible.

At length they fell to shooting off their artillerie as well from the citie as from the campe, doing their best to annote ech other. But when the rebelles saw that they did little hurt to the citie with their great ordinance lieng vpon the hill, they remoued the same downe to the foot of the same hill, and from thence began to beat the walles. Northwich standing, shortly after they made sute for a truce to indure for a time, that they might passe to and fro through the citie, to fetch in vittells, whereof some want began to pinch them in the campe. The maior and aldermen flatlie denied their request, protesting that they would not permit anie traitors to haue passage through their citie.

The rebels soze kindled in wrath with this answer, and deniall of their sute, came running downe from the hill, and assaulking the gates, were beaten off with shot of arrowes and other weapons. And yet such rage appeared among the rebels, that the boies and yong lads shewed themselves so desperat in gathering up the arrowes, that when they saw and felt the same sticking in some part of their bodies, they would plucke them forth, and deliuered them to their bow-men, that they might bestow the same againe at the citizens. In all this boile (a thing noteworthy) the seditious sort minding nothing more than the compassing of their purpose, had as little faie of themselves in this their outrage, as a bull at the sight of a cow, or a stoned horse at the view of a mare; according unto the old saying of the poet:

Fortis equus visa semper adhaeruit equa.*

In the meane time, whilst they were thus busie vpon one side of the citie, an alarm rose at the defendants backs, crying that the rebels were entered the citie on the contrarie side: and so euerie man thinking awaie, and running thither to repell the enimie there, that part was left void of defendants where the first assault began. Whereof the rebels being aduised, rushed into the river that runneth before bishops gate, got to the gates, and breaking them open, entered without anie great resistance. For all the citizens were withdratone to their houses and other places, where they hoped best to hide themselves from the furie of their enimies.

The rebels having thus entered the citie by force, conueied all the guns and artillerie, with other furniture of warre out of the citie into their campe. The herald that was yet abiding in the citie, to see if the rebels would before the daie prefixed for their pardons, being not yet expired, giue ouer their enterprisse, came with the maior into the market place, and in the hearing of a great multitude of people that were come thither and stood about him, he citions gaue commandement in the kings name, that they should laie armes aside, and get them home to their houses: which to so manie as did, he pronounced a generall pardon, and to the rest extreme punishment by death.

The rebels that stood by and heard him, when he had once made an end of his proclamation, bade him get him thence with a mischief: for it was not his faire offers, nor his sweet flattering words that should beguile them, sith they made no account of such manner of mercie, that vnder a colour of pardon, should cut off all their safetie and hope of preservation. The herald perceiving how obstinate they were bent, and set on all mischief, and that it was impossible to bring them from their outrageous treason, either through feare of punishment or hope of pardon, departed without hauing brought that to passe for which he was sent. Immediatlie after his departure, the rebels sought for Leonard Southerton, purposing to haue apprehended him, and committed him to prison, for accompanying the herald thitherwards. But he hauing knowledge of their meaning, hid himselve from them.

After this, there were by thes commandement apprehended diuerse persons, as the maior, Robert Watton, William Rogers, John Homersson, William Wrampton, and manie others, which were brought out of the citie, and committed to prison in mount Surric. That perceiving well that he must either now obtaine a bloodie victorie by force against his countrie, or else to take such an end as his ungracious attempts did well deserue, got together so manie wicked persons as he might procure to come vnto him from ech side, with great rewards and faire promises: so that it was a strange matter to consider that a multitude of bntifists and rascalles came to him vpon the sudden.

The citizens of Northwich were soze displeased, that their maior (being an honest man, and one greatlie beloued among them) should be imprisoned, and so remaine in danger of life among the rebels: for they threatened him soze, & telling at his name, would saie one to another; Let vs all come together to morrow, for we shall see a cobs hed sold in the campe for a penny. Whereupon the citizens fearing least through the malice and rage of the rebels, their maior might chance to be made awaie among them, procured maister Thomas Alderich (whose authoritie was great among them) to be a meane for his deliuerance: who comming to that with sharpe and bitter words words reproued him for his cruell dealing, by imprisoning so honest a man as the maior was, and withall commanded him to release him: which either for shame, or rather through feare of a guiltie conscience that pricked him, he caused incontinentlie to be done: who thereupon might now and then go and come at his pleasure to and fro the citie. But because he could not still remaine in the citie, but was constrained to continue for the most part in the campe, he appointed Augustine Steward to be his deputie, who with the assistance of Henrie Bacon, and John Atkinson thiriffes, gouerned the citie right orderlie, and kept the most part of the citizens in due obedience.

The counsell aduertised now vpon the heralds returne, that there was no waie to reduce these Norfolke rebels vnto quiet otherwise than by force, appointed the marquisse of Northampton with fiftene hundred horsemen to go downe vnto Northolto subdue those stubborn traitors that so vndutifullie refused the kings mercifull pardon, & helie offered by his officer at armes, and others. There went with the lord marquisse diuerse honorable and worshipfull personages, as the lord Sheffield, the lord Wentworth, sir Anthoine Denny, sir Henrie Parker, sir Richard Southwell, sir Rafe Sadler, sir John Clere, sir Rafe Kowlet, sir Richard Lee, sir John Gates, sir Thomas Dallon, sir Henrie Bedingfield, sir John Sullard, sir William Malgraue, sir John Cuts, sir Thomas Cornewallis knights, together with a great manie of other knights, es-quiers and gentlemen, and a small band of Italians, vnder the leading of a capteine named Spalatesta.

The lord marquisse being approached within a mile of Northolch, sent sir Gilbert Dethicke knight, now Carter, then Porrie, king at armes, vnto the citie, to summon them within to yeld it into his hands, or vpon refusal to proclame warre against them. Whereupon Augustine Steward the maiors deputie sent to the maior that was in the campe with him, aduertising him what message he had receiued from the marquisse. The maior sent word againe, that nothing was more gracious vnto him, than to see into what miserie the citie and countrie about were brought by the rage of these commotions; and declaring in what case he stood, being kept by force among the rebels, whereas otherwise he would (according to his dutie) haue come to his hono. But as for the citie, he had committed the gouernance vnto Augustine Steward, who should be ready to surrender it into his lordships hands: and that if he would giue him leaue, he would come himselfe to his hono, submitting all things wholie to his lordships order and disposition.

This message being brought backe by the said Porrie, Augustine Steward the maiors deputie with the thiriffs, and a great number of the citizens, came to the lord marquesses campe, and deliuered by the sword to his lordship, declaring how the maior himselfe would gladlie haue come, if he could haue got from the rebels: and that although a great roul of the lewd citizens were partakers with the rebelles, yet a number of the substantiall & honest citizens would neuer consent to their wicked doings, but were ready to receiue his lordship into their citie. The lord marquisse giuing god words to the citizens, and willing them to be of god comfort, sith he trusted to appease these troubles verie shortly, deliuered the sword vnto sir Richard Southwell, who bare it before the lord marquisse as he passed forth towards the citie, entring the same by saint Ste-phans gate. And incontinentlie was proclamation made that they should all resort into the market place, where they consulted together how they might best defend the citie against the enimies, and to re-presse their furie. Whereupon was order giuen for the placing of watch and ward about the gates and the walles, as might seme expedient. The lord marquisse supped that night and lodged in the maiors deputies house; but his lordship as well as other kept their armour on their backs all that night, for doubt of some sudden assault to be made against the citie by the rebels. Here it chanced that the strangers, either by appointment, or otherwise, went forth, and offered skirmish to the rebels vpon Pagdalen hill.

The strangers offer skirmish to the rebels.

The rebels came forth with their horsemen: but it seemed that they were better practised to fetch in booties, than to make their manage or careise, which being percelused of their fellows that were footmen, they put forth their archers before their horsemen, and such numbers heretofore came swarming forth of their campe, meaning to compasse in those strangers, that they perceiuing the maner and purpose of the enimies, cast themselves in a ring, and retired backe into the citie againe. But they left one of their compantie behind them, a gentleman that was an It-talian, who more valiantlie than warlike ventured to sarre among the enimies, and through euill hap being ouerthrowne before his horse, he was inuironed about with a great multitude of those rebels, that tooke him prisoner, and like vile wretches spoiling him of his armour and apparell, hanged him ouer the walles of mount Surrie. Which act well shewed what courtesie might be looked for at such cruell traitors hands, that would thus vnmmercifullie put such a gentleman and worthy souldior to death: for whose ransome, if they would haue demanded it, they might haue had no small portion of monie to haue satisfied their greedy minds. But it seemed that their bestlie crueltie had bereft them the remembrance of all honest consideration and dutifull humanitie.

An Italian hanged by the rebels.

The marquisse of Northampton causing (as before ye haue heard) diligent watch to be kept vpon the walles, and at the gates, appointed the same to be visited right often, that through negligence no mishap should follow. Moreover, besides the watch at the gates and walles, the residue of the soldiours making a mightie huge fire in the market place, so as all the streets were full of light, they remained there all that night in their armour, ready vpon anie occasion to resist the enimies if they should make anie attempt. Sir Edward Warner marshall of the field gaue the watch word, sir Thomas Dallon, sir John Clere, sir William Malgraue, sir Thomas Cornwallis, and sir Henrie Bedingfield were appointed to the defense of other parts of the citie. And now when euerie thing was thought to be safelie provided for, and that the lord marquisse and other were laid to take their rest, the rebels about the middest of the night began to shot off their great artille-rie towards the citie, so thicke as was possible: but the bullets passed ouer their heads that were lodged in the citie, without doing anie great hurt at all.

Sir Edward Warner.

The lord marquisse, by reason of the often alarums that were giuen, whilst the enimies thus ceased not to rage with continuall shot of ordnance, was called vp by the marshall sir Edward Warner; and comming into the market place, accompanied with the nobles and gentlemen of the armie, fell in counsell with them, how to foresee that the citie in such danger might be safelie defended against the enimies with such small power as he had there with him. It was therefore determined, that all the gates which were on the contrarie part of the towne from the rebels campe, and likewise the ruinous places of the walles should be rampired vp, that if the enimies should chance to giue an assault to the citie,

citie, they might moze easilie be repelled.

But as these things were in doing, and almost brought to end, in a manner all the whole multitude of the rebelles came out of their cabins, running downe in most furious maner to the citie, and with great shouts and yelling cries went about to set fire on the gates, to cline over the walles, to passe the river, and to enter the citie at such places where the walles were thorough age decayed and ruinous. The soldiors that were there with the lord marquisse, did shew their uttermost endeavour to beat backe the enemies. This fight in most cruell wise continued for the space of thre houres without ceasing, the rebels forcing themselves to the uttermost of their powers to enter perforce upon them, and they within the citie shewed no lesse courage to repell them backe. The hardie manhood of diuerse knights, and other men of worship was here right apparant. It was strange to see the desperat boldnesse of the rebelles, that when they were thrust through the bodies of thighs, and some of them hough-sinewed, would yet seeke reuenge in striking at their aduersaries, when their hands were scarce able to hold by their weapon; thinking themselves somewhat satisfied if the humors of their enuie and deadlie spite might be fed but with a drop of their aduersaries blood; with such a malignant spirit (tending wholie to vengeance) these desperat rebels were possessed, according to the poets speech in the like sense and meaning:

The desperatnesse of rebelles.

Inuicta, sat. 13.

Inuicta dabit minimus solatia sanguis.

The rebels beaten backe.

But such was the valiance of the gentlemen and soldiors, which were there with the lord marquisse, that in the end the enemies which were already entered the citie, were beaten out againe, and driuen backe to their accustomed kennell holes with losse of thre hundred of their numbers. They within the towne hauing thus repelled the enemies, & accounting themselves in moze safetie than before, for the rest of the night that yet remained, which was not much, they gaue themselves to refresh their wearied bodies with some sleepe. The next daie, the lord marquisse was informed by some of the citizens, that there were no small number in Ilets campe that would gladlie come from him, if they might be sure of their pardon: and that at Dockethorpe gate there were foure or five thousand, that wished for nothing moze than for pardon: and that if the same were offered them, there were no doubt (as they beleued) but that they would submit themselves to the kings mercie.

The marquisse was glad to vnderstand so much, & incontinentlie dispatched Porreie king at armes, with a trumpetter, to assure them on the kings behalfe, that they should be pardoned for all offenses past, and that had bene committed in time of this rebellion, if they would lay armes aside. Porreie and the trumpetter comming to the gate, found not a man there: but the trumpetter sounding his trumpet, there came running downe from the hill a great multitude of their people, & amongst other as chiefe, one Flotman, whom Porreie commanded to haie. Whereupon the said Flotman asked him what was the matter, and wherefore he had called them together by sound of trumpet: To thy waies (said he) & tell thy companie from my lord marquisse of Northampton, the kings maiesties lieutenant, that he commandeth them to cease from committing anie further outrage: and if they will (saith he) obey his commandement, all that is past, shall be forgiven and pardoned.

Flotman.

Pardon offered to the rebels.

Flotman hauing heard Porreies declaration, as he was an outrageous and buisie fellow, presumptuously made answer, that he cared not a pins point for my lord marquisse, and withall, like a rebellious traitor, railed upon his lordship, and maintained, that he and the rest of the rebels were earnest defenders of the kings roiall maiestie, and that they had taken weapon in hand not against the king, but in his defense, as in time it should appeare, as they that fought nothing but to mainteine his maiesties roiall estate, the libertie of their countrie, and the safetie of their commonwealth, &c. To conclude, he utterly refused the kings pardon, and told Porreie certeinlie, that they would either restore the commonwealth from decay, into the which it was fallen, being oppressed thorough the couetousnesse and tyrannie of the gentlemen; either else would they like men die in the quarrell.

Scarcelie had he made an end of his tale, when suddenlie a fearefull alarm was raised thorough out the citie: for whilest Flotman was thus in talke with the king of armes at Dockethorpe gate, the rebels in great rage entering the citie by the hospitall, went about to bring all things to destruction: but being incountered nere to the bishops palace, by the lord marquisse his men, there ensued a bloudie conflict betwixt them, which continued long with great fiercenesse and eger reuenge on both parts. There died about seuen score of the rebels, and of the soldiors that rescued against them some number, beside a great multitude that were hurt and wounded on both parts. But the pittifull slaughter of the lord Sheffield, who hauing moze regard to his honor than safetie of life, desirous to shew some prouise of his noble valiance, entering amongst the enemies, as he sought right hardlie, though not so warlike as had bene expedient, fell into a ditch as he was about to turne his horse: & herewith being compassed about with a number of those horrible traitors, was slaine amongst them: although he both declared what he was, and offered largelie to the villains, if they would haue saued his life. But the moze noble he shewed himselfe to be, the moze were they kindled in outrageous furie against him. And as he pulled off his head peece, that it might appeare what he was, a butcherlie knaue named Fulks, who by occupation was both a carpenter & a butcher, slat him in the head with a club, and so most wretchedlie killed him. A lamentable case, that so noble a young gentleman, inuend with so manie commendable qualitties, as were to be wished in a man of his calling, should thus miserablie end his daies by the hands of so vile a villain.

Diuerse other gentlemen and worshipful soldiors came to the like end among those outrageous rebels, and amongst other, Robert Woluaston, that was appointed to keepe the doore of Chyffs church, was killed by the same Fulks, who took him for sir Edmund Laneuet, against whom the rebels bare great malice, for that he sought to annoie them so farre as by anie means he might, as partlie ye haue heard. But the slaughter of that noble man the lord Sheffield, soze discouraged the residue of the soldiors that were come with the lord marquisse. And on the other part, the rebels were aduanced thereby, in greater hope to preuaile against them, and thereupon pressed forward with such hardinesse, that they caused the lord marquisse and his people to giue place, and to forsake the citie, enerie man making the best thift he could to saue himselfe. But yet diuerse gentlemen of good account and worship remaining behind, as sir Thomas Cornewallis, and others, whom the rebels afterwards kept in strict durance, untill the daie came of their ouerthrow by the kings power, vnder the conduction of the earle of Warwicke.

The lord marquisse and the residue that escaped, made the best thift they could to get out of danger: and at length, he and the most part of them that went

Reg. 3.

went forth with him, came to London. The rebels having thus repelled the lord marquisse & his power, set fire on the citie, whereby manie faire buildings were consumed and burnt. It happened yet well the same time, that there fell great abundance of raine, the which holpe in part to quench the rage of the fire.
Nevertheless, all the houses on either side of Holmes street, and the hospitall of the poore; also Bishops gate, Dockthorpe gate, Dagdalene gate, and Bearestreet gate, with manie other houses in other parts of the citie, were burned, and sowle defaced with fire. The citizens were brought into such extreame miserie, that they knew not which waie to turne them. Some there were that fled out of the citie, taking with them their gold and siluer, and such short ware as they might coueie awaie with them, abandoning wife and childe, to rest at the mercie of the rebels.
Other hid their goods in wells, priuies, and other such secret places out of the waie.

The rebels entering into the houses of such as were knowne to be wealthie men, spoiled and bare awaie all that might be found of anie value. But to speake of all the cruell parts which they plaied, it would be tedious to expresse the same, their doings were so wicked and outragious. There was shooting, holing, and wounding among them, waeping, and crying out of women and childe. To be short, the state of the citie at that present was most miserable. The maiors deputie kept himselfe close in his house, and might behold all this mischief and destruction of the citie, but durst not come abroad, nor go about to staie them: at length, a great multitude of the rebels that were come downe fro their campe, entering by saint Augustines gate, came straight to his house, and strove to breake open the doores: but when they could not easilie bring their purpose to passe that waie forth, they began to fire the house.
Whereupon for feare to be burned within his owne lodging, he set open the doores, and in came those un-manerlic ghests, toke him, plucked his gowne behind his backe, called him traitor, and threatened to kill him, if he would not tell them where the lord marquisse of Northampton had hidden himselfe.

And when he had told them that undoubtedly he and all his companie were gone, they were in a great rage, and with terrible noise and rimbling they sought euerie corner of the house for him, and taking what they found, they departed. But yet manie of them afterwards partlie pacified for a pece of monie, and other things which they reuelued of the maiors, and partlie reproued for the wrongfull robberies by some that were in credit among them, they brought againe such packs and fardels as they had trussed up together, and threw them into the shops of those houses, out of the which they had taken the same before: but yet there were diuers of the citizens that were spoiled of all that they had by those rebels, that entered their houses under a colour to seeke for the marquisse of Northampton's men. Namelie, the houses of those citizens that were fled, were spoiled and ransacked most miserable, for they reputed and called them traitors and enimies to their king and countrie, that thus had forsaken their houses and dwelings in time of such necessitie: yet manie of the citizens bringing forth bread, beere, and other vitels unto the rebels to refresh them with, somewhat calmed their furious rage, and so escaped their violent hands, although no small number were so fiesed (as before ye haue heard) that they haue liued the waie for it all the daies of their life since that time.

But now the rebels having thus got possession of the citie, & chased awaie the kings people, they toke order to haue the gates kept howrelie with watch and ward of the citizens themselves, thertuning them with most shamefull death, if they omitted the same.

These brutall persons were so farre kept into all kind of beastlie outrage, that when it rained, they would kennell by themselves in the churches, abusing the place appointed for the seruice and worshipping of the almightie God, in most prophane and wicked manner, and neither prayer nor yet threats of men or women that abused them to modestie could take place. The kings maiestie aduertied therefore, that there was no waie to tame their diuelish and traitorous outrage, but by force: with the aduise of his councell caused a power to be put in a readinesse, as well of his owne subiects as of strangers, namelie lanquenets, which were come to serue his maiestie against the Scots.

But now it was thought expedient to vse their seruice against these rebels, whose power and desperate boldnesse was so farre increased, that without a maine armie, guided by some generall of great experience, and noble conduct, it would be hard and right dangerous to subdue them: wherein violence and force was to be used, sith they had shewed themselues in an extremitie of stubborneesse, like buls that by basting are to be tamed, or like disnecked stallions which with bit & bridle must be managed, as one saith:

Asper equis duris contrahitur ora lupatis.

Whereupon that noble cheefeste and valiant erle of Marwick, latelie before appointed to haue gone against the Scots and Frenchmen into Scotland, was called backe, and commanded to take upon him the conduction of this armie against the poore folke rebels: for such was the opinion then conceiued of that honorable erle, for the high manhood, valiant prowesse, and great experience in all warlike enterprises, sufficientlie tried, and knowne to rest in him, that either they might be vanquished and ouercome by him, or by none other.

Captaine Ket and his rebellious armie, having some aduertisement by rumors spred, of this preparation and coming of an armie against them, they were not slacke to make themselves strong and readie to abide all the hazard that fortune of warre might bring. The erle of Marwick then, after that his men and provisions were ready, did set forward, and came vnto Cambridge, where the lord marquisse of Northampton and other met his lordship. Here also diuerse citizens of Norwich came to him, and falling downe upon their knees before him, besought him to be good lord vnto them; and withall declared their miserable state, great griefe and sorrow, which they had conceiued for the wretched destruction of their countrie: beseeching him to haue pittie vpon them. And if in such extremitie of things as had happened vnto their citie, they had through feare or ignorance committed anie thing contrarie to their dutifull allegiance, that it might please his honor to pardon them their offenses in such behalf, sith if anie thing were amisse on their parts, the same came to passe for against their wills, and to their extreame griefe and sorrow.

The erle of Marwick told them, that he knew indeed in what danger they had bene among those brutall ribalds; and as for anie offense which they had committed, he knew not: for in leauing their citie sith matters were growne to such extre-mitie, they were to be borne with, but in one thing they had ouershot themselves: for that in the beginning they had not sought to repress those tumults, sith if they had put themselves in defense of their countrie, to resist the rebels at the first, such mischiefs as were now growne, might easilie haue bene auoi-ded. But neuertheless, vpon this their humble submission, he granted them all the kings mercifull pardon, and commanding them to provide themselves of armour and weapon, appointed them to march forth with the armie, wearing certeine laces or ribbons about their necks for a difference, that they might be knowne from others. There were in this armie under the earle of Warwicke diuerse men of honor and great worship, as lords, knights, esquires, and gentlemen in great numbers. First the lord marquisse of Northampton, and sundrie of them that had bene with him before, desirous to be reuenged of his late repulse, the lords Willoughbie, Powes and Wale, Ambrose Dudley, sonne to the said earle, and at this present worthilie adorned with the title (which his father then bare) of earle of Warwicke, and his brother lord Robert Dudley now earle of Leicester; also Henrie Willoughbie esquier, sir Thomas Cresham, sir Parmaduke constable, William Deuener sonne to the lord Ferrers of Chartley, sir Edmund Kneuet, sir Thomas Palmer, sir Andrew Flammoche, and diuerse other knights, esquires, and gentlemen: all which plaid their parts as time and occasion was ministered vnto them to giue trial of their manhood.

The earle of Warwicke, and such as were come with him to Cambridge, marched directlie from thence towards Norwich, and came vnto Wymondham the two and twentieth of August, where and by the waie the most part of all the gentlemen of Norfolk folke that were at libertie, came vnto him. The next daie betimes he shewed himselfe vpon the plaine, betwixt the citie of Norwich and Ciston wood, and lodged that night at Intwood, an house belonging to sir Thomas Cresham knight, a two miles distant from Norwich. Here they rested that daie and night following, not once putting off their armour, but remaining still in a readinesse, if the enimies should haue made anie sudden inuasion against them. The earle of Warwicke in the meane time sent the afore remembred king of armes Porreie, to summon the citie, either to open the gates that he might quietlie enter; or else to loke for warre at his handes that would then assaie to win it by force, and such reward as rebels (that wilfullie withstand their fouereigne) ought to receiue.

Norwich
summoned.

what answer was made to the herald by the citizens of Norwich,
whom he assigned there vnto.

When he understood that the herald was come to the gates, he appointed the maiors deputie Augustine Steward, and Robert Rug, two of the chiefe citizens, to go to him and to know his errand. They passing forth at a posterne, and hearing his message, made answer, that they were the miserablest men that were then liuing, as they themselves beleued, sith that hauing suffered such calamities as they could not but tremble at in calling to remembrance, they could not now haue libertie to declare the loiall dutie which they bare & ought to beare to the kings highnesse: so that they accompted themselves most vnforsunate, sith their hap was to liue in that season, in which they must either leaue off life, or the estimation of their good name, although they trusted the kings maiestie would be gracious lord vnto them. sith they had given no consent vnto such wicked rebellion as was thus raised against his highnesse, but with losse of goods and perill of life so farre as in them laie, had done what they could to keepe the citizens in good order and dutifull obedience.

One thing more they would humbly desire of my lord of Warwicke, that whereas there was no small number of the kings armie in the citie without armour or weapon, and as it should seeme irksome and wearie of that which had bene already done, it might please him once againe to boughsaie to offer them the kings pardon, and if he should thus do, they had great hope that the rebels would gladly accept it, and so the matter might be pacified without more bloudshed. Porreie returned to the earle of Warwicke, and declared what answer he had receiued. The earle desirous of nothing more than to haue the matter thus taken vp, as well for other considerations, as for feare least the gentlemen remaining prisoners with the rebels, should be unmercifullie murdered by their keepers, if they came to the bittermost triall of battell, he resolved to proue if it would thus come to passe. And heretupon was Porreie with a trumpet sent to offer them a generall pardon, who being entered the citie, met about fortie of the rebels on horsebacke, riding two and two together verie pleasant and merrie, and so passing from S. Stephens gate vnto Wishops gate, the trumpetter sounded his trumpet, and with that, a great multitude of the rebels came thronging downe together from the hill: to whom the hoismen speedilie riding, commanded that they should diuide themselves, and stand in order vpon either side the waie. And as Porreie and the trumpetter, with two of the chiefe citizens entred betwixt them, they were receiued with great noise and clamour, for euerie of them putting off their hats or caps, cried; God saue king Edward, God saue king Edward.

Porreie and the two citizens, highlie commending them herein, requested them to keepe their place and order wherein they stood for a while: and then Porreie passing forth about two hundred and fiftie paces, came to the top of the hill, and putting on his coate armour, staied a while (for he was not yet come) and at length began to declare vnto them in what manner diuers times since first they had taken armes in hand, the kings maiestie by sundrie persons, as well heralds as other, had sought to reduce them from their vnlawfull and rebellious tumults, vnto their former dutie and obedience; and yet neuerthelesse, they had shewed themselves wilfull and stubborne, in refusing his mercifull pardon freely offered vnto them, and despised the messenger which his grace had sent vnto them to pronounce the same. He willed them therefore to call themselves now at length to remembrance, and to behold the state of the common-wealth, which they so often to no purpose had still in their mouths, and neuerthelesse by them miserable defaced, & brought in danger of bitter ruine and decay.

And herewith discourting at large of the horrible, wicked, and heinous murders, riots, burnings, and other crimes by them committed, he willed them to consider into what sea of mischeces they had throwne themselves, and what punishment they ought to looke for as due to them for the same; sith as well the wrath of God as the kings armie was hanging ouer their heads, and readie at hand, which they were not able to resist. For his grace had resolved no longer to suffer so great and presumptuous mischeces as this, to be suffered in the middle of his realme: and therefore had appointed the right honourable earle of Warwicke, a man of noble fame and approved ballancie, to be his generall lieutenant of that his roiall armie, to persecute them with fire and sword; and not to leaue off, till he had utterly disperfed and scattered that wicked and abominable assemblie. And yet such was the exceeding greatnesse of the kings bountifull mercie and clemencie, that he that was by him appointed to be a reuenger of their heinous treasons committed against his maiestie, if they continued in their obstinate wilfulness, should be also the interpreter and minister of his gracious and free pardon, to so manie as would accept it. Which vntill they now imbraced, the said earle had made a solemn vow, that they should neuer haue it offered to them againe; but that he would persecute them till he had purged shed the whole multitude according unto their lust deserts.

Wantie that heard him, hauing due confideration of their miserable estate, were touched with some remorse of conscience, fearing at length to taste the reuenge of such horrible crimes as they had been partakers of with others in committing the same.
But the more part finding themselves highly offended with his words, began to iangle (as they had done before unto other that had bene sent to offer them pardon) that he was not the kings herald, but some one made out by the gentlemen in such a gate coate, patched together of belements and church-stufte, being sent onelie to deceiue them, in offering them pardon, which would proue nought else but halters; and therefore it were well done, to thrust an arrow into him, or to hang him vp. Although other seemed dutifullie to reuerence him, and diuerse that had serued in Scotland and at Bullongne, re-membryng that they had sene him there and knew him, told and perswaded their fellowes, that he was the kings herald indeed. Wherebpon they became more mild, and offered him no further iniurie: but yet they could not be perswaded that this pardon tended to anie other end, but to bring them to destruction; and that in stead of pardon, there was prepared for them nought else but a barrell full of halters.

Such lewd speech was amongst them, fauouring altogether of malicious mistrust, and most willfull treason. Forreie neuerthelesse departing from thence, accompanied with het, came to another place, where he made the like proclamation: for the multitude was such that he could not be heard of them all in one place. Here, before he had made an end of his tale, there was a vile boie (as some write) that turned vp his bare taile to him, with words as vnseemlie as his gesture was filthie: with which spitefull reproch thus shewed towards the kings maiesties officer at armes, one (which in com-panie of some other that were come over the water to view things) being greatly offended, with an harquebuse shot stroke that vngracious lad through the bodie a little aboue the reins.

Which when some of the rebels had sene, a dozzen of their horsemen came galloping out of the wood, crying; We are betrayed friends, we are betrayed, if you looke not about you: do you not see how our fellowes are slaine with guns before our faces? What may we hope if we disarme our selues, that are thus vsed being armed? This herald goeth about nothing else, but to bring vs within danger of some ambush, that the gentlemen may kill and beate vs all downe at their pleasure. Wherebpon they all shanke awaie, and fled, as they had bene out of their wits: yet did their great capteine Robert het accompanie Forreie, meaning (as hath bene said) to haue gone to the earle of Warwicke himselfe, to haue talked with him: but as he was almost at the foot of the hill, there came running after him a great multitude of the rebels, crying to him, and asking him whither he went; We are readie (said they) to take such part as you do, be it neuer so bad: and if he would go anie further, they would (as thep said) suerlie follow him.

Forreie then perceiuing such numbers of people following them, desired het to staie them: who returning backe to them, they were incontinentlie appeased, and so they all returned with him backe to their campe. When the earle of Warwicke vn-derstood that they were thus altogether set on mis-chiefe, and neither with praier, proffer of pardon, threatening of punishment, nor other meanes they could be reduced to quietnesse, he determined to proceed against them by force. And herebpon bringing his armie unto saint Stephens gate, which the rebels stopped vp, with the letting downe of the portculice, he commanded those that had charge of the ar-tillerie, to plant the same against the gate, and with batterie to breake it open.

As these things were in hand, he understood by Augustine Steward the maiors deputie, that there was an other gate on the contrarie side of the citie, called the Wasen gate, which the rebels had rammed vp, but yet not so, but that it might be easilie broken open. Wherewith were the pioniers called, and commanded to breake open that gate also: which being done, the soldiers entered by the same into the citie, and due diuerse of those rebels that stood readie to defend and resist their entrie. In the meane time had the gunners also broken in sunder with their shot the portculice, and nere hand the one halfe of the other gate, by the which the marques of Northampton, and capteine Durrrie, alias Poignard (that being sent from London met my lord of Warwicke by the waie) entered with their bands, and droue backe the rebels with slaughter, that were readie there to resist them.

Whereouer, the maiors deputie caused Warwicke gate to be set open: at the which the earle of Warwicke himselfe entring with all his armie, and finding in manner no resistance, came to the market place. Here were taken a threelcore of the rebels, the which according to the order of martial law were incontinentlie executed, according to the qua-littie of their offense, confessing (no doubt) in conscience, that their punishment was proportioned to their trespasses, and that in dieng the death (were the same neuer so extreme & dreadfull) they had but their desert; and therefore might well saie with the poet:

Supplicia scelerum paruas expendimus omnes.
Shortlie after, the carriages belonging to the armie were brought into the citie by the same gate, and passing through the citie, by negligence & want of order giuen to them that attended on the same cariage, they kept on forward till they were got out at Bishops gate towards Household. Whereof the rebels being aduised, they came downe, & setting upon the carters, and other that attended on the carriages, put them to flight, and droue awaie the carts laden with artillerie, powder, and other munition, bringing the same into their campe, & greatlie reioysing thereof, because they had no great store of such things among them: but yet capteine Durrrie with his band comming in good time to the rescue, recovered some of the carts from the enimies, not without some slaughter on either side. Whereouer, the enimies as yet being not fullie driuen out of the citie, placed themselves in crosse streets, & were readie to assaille the soldiers as they saw their aduantage, part of them standing at S. Michells, part at S. Ste-phans, and part at S. Peters, and some of them also stood in Timers street.

Here they assailing such as bradsheddle were entered within their danger, they due diuerse, and among other thre or foure gentlemen, before they could be succoured from anie part. The earle of Warwicke aduertised hereof, passed forth with all his forces to remoue the enimie, and comming to S. Andrew in Johns street, was receiued with a sharpe shorme of arrowes: but capteine Durrrie his harquebusers galled them so with their shot, that they were glad to giue place, and so fled amaine. There were slaine a hundred and thirtie, and diuerse of them shynking asid into churchyards and other places vnder the walles, were taken and executed. All the rest got them vp to their campe at Household, and so the citie was rid of them for that time. Then was the erle of Warwicke take order for the safe keeping of the citie, appointing watch and ward to be kept on the walles, and in euerie street. Also that all the gates should be rammed vp, except one or two that stood towards the enemies, at the which were planted certaine peeces of the great artillerie.

Alexander
Newill.

But the rebels understanding that the earle of Warwicke wanted powder and other things appertaining to the vse of the great ordinance, and withall perceiuing that the Welshmen which were appointed to the gard of the said great peeces of artillerie were no great number, and therefore not able to resist anie great force that should come against them, they came downe the hill vpon the sudden as it were wholie together in most outrageous manner. And withall one pyles that was a verie perfect gunner, and maruelous skillfull in the feat of shooting of great artillerie, and at that time remaining among the rebels, shot off a peece; and due one of the kings principall gunners, that was attending vpon those peeces of artillerie, which stood thus before the gate. Whom when the rebels perceiued thus to be slaine, they made forward with more courage, and gaue such a desperate onset vpon them that garded the said artillerie, that their small number, being not able to withstand their aduersaries great and huge multitude pressing in such furious rage vpon them, that they were constrained to flee backe, and to leaue the artillerie for a preie vnto the enemies, who seizing vpon the same, conueied them awaie with certaine carts laden with all manner of munition for wars vp to their campe: a matter (as was thought) of no small importance, sith the enemies thereby were furnished now with such things, whereof before they stood most in need, and now hauing store thereof, they spared not liberallie to bestow it against the citie, beating downe not onlie the highest top of Bishops gate, but also a great part of the wals on that side.

The rebels

Captaine Dzurie.

And here trulie the good seruice of captaine Dzurie is not to be forgotten, who now as earli being readie to reuenge this iniurie, following vpon the enemies, put them to flight, and recouered much of that which they had taken from the earls souldiers. The earle of Warwicke after this cut off the entries at the gates, and rampired them vp, placed at the bridges and turnings of the waies and streets diuers bands of souldiers to keepe the passages, brake downe the White friers bridge, and at Bishops gate he appointed the lord Willoughbie with a great number of souldiers to defend that part, & in this sort he made provision to defend the citie from the rebels, if they should attempt to make anie surpris vpon the sudden.

The next daie yet they passing ouer the river, set fire on certaine houses at Connessforth, burning the more part of all the houses of two parishes: and so great was the rage of the fire, that catching hold vpon an house wherein the merchants of Nozwich vse to laie vp such wares and merchandize as they conueie to their citie from Permouth, the same house with great store of wheat and other riches was miserablie consumed and defaced. Thus whilest euerie thing seemed to chance and fall out in fauour of the rebels, there were some in the earle of Warwicks armie, that despairing of the whole successe of their tournee, came to the earle of Warwicke, and began to persuaide with him, that sith the citie was large, and their companies small (for in deed the whole appointed numbers as yet were not come, neither of strangers nor Englishmen) it was impossible to defend it against such an huge multitude as were assembled together in their campe, and therefore besought him to regard his owne safetie, to leaue the citie, and not to hazard all vpon such an vncertaine maine chance.

The earle of Warwicke as he was of a noble and invincible courage, baliant, hardie, and not able to abide anie spot of reproch, whereby to lose the least peece of honour that might be, made this answer: Whie (saith he) and do your harts faile you so some? Are you so mad withall, to thinke that so long as anie life resteth in me, that I will consent to such dishonour? Should I leaue the citie, heaping vp to my selfe and likewise to you such shame and reppose as woorthilie might be reputed an infamie to vs for ever? I will rather suffer whatsoeuer either fire or sword can worke against me. These words being vttered with such a courage as was maruelous to consider, he drew out his sword. Which other of the honorable and woorthipfull that were then present likewise did, whome he commanded that each one should kisse others sword, according to an ancient custome used amongst men of war in time of great danger: and herewith they made a solemne vow, binding it with a solemne oth, that they should not depart from thence, till they had either vanquished the enemies, or lost their liues in manfull fight for defence of the kings honour.

Whilest these things were in doing, the rebels brake into the citie on that side, where was no suspicion of their entring at all; but being come almost to the bridges, they were encountered by the souldiers, beaten backe, and chased out by the same waie they came. The next daie being the six and twentieth of August, there came to the earle 1400 lancequenets. The rebels notwithstanding that such reinforcement of the earles power might haue somewhat discouraged them, yet trusting altogether to certaine baine prophesies, which they had among them, and set out in verses by such wilfards as were there with them in the campe, they had conceiued such a baine hope of prosperous successe in their businesse, that they little esteemed anie power that might come against them.

Among other of those same verses, these were two: The countie gnuffes, Hob, Dick, and Hick, with clubs and clowted shoon, Shall fill vp Dussin dale with blood of slaughtered bodies soone.

Vpon hope therefore of this and other baine prophesies, the rebels through the diuels procurement, that had nourished and pricked them forward all this while in their wicked proceedings, determined to remoue thither, to the end that they might with more speed make an end of the matter, before they should be dztuen to disperse themselves by famine. For the earle of Warwicke had taken order to haue the passages stopped, in such wise as no vittells could easilie be conueied to their campe, the want whereof began already to pinch them. Here vpon setting fire on their cabins, which they had raised and built here and there of timber and bushes (the smoke whereof covered all the grounds about them) they came downe with their ensignes into the ballie called Dussin dale, where with all speed that might be they intrenched themselves about, and raising a rampe of a good height, set stakes also round about them, to keepe off the horsemen.

The earle of Warwicke perceiuing their doings, the next daie being the seuen and twentieth of August with all his horsemen, and the Almans with captaine Dzuries band, issued forth of the citie, marching straight towards the enemies. Yet before he approached in sight of them, he sent sir Edmund Beauchamp & sir Thomas Palmer knights, with others, to understand of them, whether now at length they would submit themselves, & receiue the kings pardon; which if they would do, he offered to grant it freele to all the whole multitude, one or two of them onlie excepted:

red: but they with generall voices refusing it, the earle fell in hand to encourage his people unto the battell, and hauing appointed as well the horsemen as footmen in what order they should giue the charge, they passed forward in approaching the enimies. The rebels beholding them thus to come forward, put themselves in order of battell, in such manner, that all the gentlemen which had bene taken prisoners, and were kept in irons for starting awaie, were placed in the fore ranke of their battell, coupled two and two together, to the end they might be killed by their owne friends that came to seeke their deliuerance: but yet as God would haue it, the most part of them were saued. Besides the maister gunner among the rebels, leuelling a peece of ordnance, shot it off, and strooke him that carried the kings standard in the thigh, and the horse through the shoulder.

The earle of Warwicke and others fore grieved therewith, caused a whole bolie of artillerie to be shot off at the rebels: and here with capteine Durie with his owne band, & the Almans or lanceknights, whether yelid to call them, on foot, getting nere to the enimies, hailed them with their barquebut shot so sharplie, and thrust forward upon them with their pikes so stronglie, that they brake them in sunder. The gentlemen, who (as we haue said) were placed in the fore ranke, found meanes (as god hath was) to shrinke aside, and escaped the danger for the more part, although some indeed were slaine by the Almans, and other that knew not what they were. The light horsemen of the kings part herewith gaue in amongst them so roundlie, that the rebels not able to abide their valiant charge, were easilie put to flight, and with the foremost their grand capteine Robert Ket galloped awaie so fast as his horse would beare him. The horsemen following in chase, slue them downe on heapes, ever still as they ouertake them; so that the chase continuing for the space of three or foure miles, there were slaine to the number of three thousand five hundred at the least: besides a great multitude that were wounded as they fled here and there ech waie forth, as seemed best to serue their turne for their most speedie escape out of danger. Yet one part of them that had not bene assailed at the first onset, seeing such slaughter made of their fellows, kept their ground by their ordinance, and thanke not: determining as men desperatlie bent, not to be breuenged, but to fight it out to the last man.

They were so inclosed with their carts, carriages, trenches (which they had cast) and stakes pitched in the ground to keepe off the force of horsemen, that it would haue bene somewhat dangerous to haue assailed them within their strength. But sure they were that now they could not escape, seeing no small part of their whole numbers were cut off and distressed, and they inuironed on ech side, without hope of succour or reliefe of vittels, which in the end must needs haue forced them to come forth of their inclosure to their vndoubted overthrow and destruction. The earle of Warwicke yet pittieing their case, and loth that the king should lose so manie stout mens bodies as were there amongst them, which might do his maiestie and their countrie good seruice, if they could be reclaimed from this their desperat follie bringing them pardon of life if they would throw downe their weapons and yeld: if not, he threatened that there should not a man of them escape the deserved punishment. Their answer was, that if they might be assured to haue their liues saued, they could be contented to yeld: but they could haue no trust that promise should be kept with them. For notwithstanding all such faire offers of pardon, they took it that there was nothing meant but a subtil practise, to bring them into the hands of their aduersaries the gentlemen, that had prepared a barrel of ropes and halters, with which they purposed to trusse them by: and therefore they would rather die like men, than to be strangled at the wils and pleasures of their more tall enimies.

The earle of Warwicke right sozie to see such desperat minds among them, sent to the citie, and caused the most part of the footmen which he had left there to defend the same, to come forth now in battell arrate, that they might helpe to distresse those wilfull rebels that thus obstinatelie refused the kings pardon. And hauing brought as well them as the Almans and the horsemen in order of battell againe, and readie now to set upon the rebels, he likewise sent unto them to know that if he should come himselfe and giue his word, that they should haue their pardon, whether they would receiue it or not. Hereunto they answered, that they had such confidence in his word, that if he would so do, they would giue credit thereto, and submit themselves to the kings mercie. Incontinentlie hereupon he went unto them, and commanded Porreie to read the kings pardon freely granted to all that would yeld. Which being read, euery man threw downe his weapon, and with one whole and entier voice cried, God saue king Edward, God saue king Edward. And thus thorough the prudent policie, and fauourable mercie of the earle of Warwicke, a great number of those offenders were preserved from the gates of death, into the which they were readie to enter.

Thus were the Norfolk rebels subdued by the high prowesse, wisdome, and policie of the valiant earle of Warwicke, and other the nobles, gentlemen, & faithfull subiects there in the kings armie: but not without losse of diuers personages of great worth, beside other of the meaner sort, namely maister Henrie Willoughbie esquier, a man so well beloued in his countrie for his liberalitie in housekeeping, great courtesie, byright dealing, assured steadfastnes in friendship, & modest staednes in behaviour, that the countries where his liuings laie lament the losse of so worthy a gentleman euen to this date. There died also maister Lucie esquier, maister Foster esquier, and maister Throckmorton of Northamptonshire, gentlemen of no small credit and worship in their countries. The battell being thus ended, all the spoile gotten in the field was giuen to the soldiers, who sold the most part thereof openlie in the market place of Norwich. The next daie the earle of Warwicke was aduertised that Ket, being crept into a barne, was taken by two seruants of one maister Riches of Swanington, and brought to the house of the same Riches. Hereupon were twentie horsemen sent thither to fetch him, who brought him to Norwich. The same daie examinations were taken of them that were the principall beginners and setters forth of this unhappie rebellion, and diuerse being found gilty were hanged, and nine of the chiefe procurers of all the mischief (Robert Ket and his brother William onelie excepted) were hanged vpon the oke of reformation, besides the number & two of their prophets being three of that number.

Some others of them were drabone, hanged, and quartered, & their heads and quarters set vp in publicke places for a terror to others. But yet the earle of Warwicke spared manie, where some would gladlie haue persuaded him, that there might haue bene a great number more executed. But his lordship perceiving them importunate in that incharitable sute, told them (as it were in fauour of life of those sillie wretches, whose miserable case he seemed to pittie) that measure must be vsed in all things, & in punishing of men by death (saith he) we ought alwaies to beware that we passe not the same. I know well that such wicked doings deserue no small reuenge, and that the offenders are worthy to be most sharplie chastised. But how farre yet shall we go? Shall we not at length shew some mercie? Is there no place for pardon? What shall we then do? Shall we hold the plough our selues; plaie the carters and labour the ground with our owne hands. These and such like words tastig altogether of mercie and compassion in that noble earle, did quench the cruell desire of reuenge in them that were altogether kindled in wrath and wished nothing moze than to see the whole multitude executed: but now moued with the earles wise and mercifull answer to their rigorous sute, they became moze mild and mercifull towards the miserable creatures.

This also is not to be forgotten, that when information was giuen against some of the rebels, for that they had bene busie fellowes, & great doers in time of those vpproes, so as it was thought of some, that it stood with god reason to haue them punished by death, when the earle of Warwike vnderstood by credible report of Doctore king at armes, that vpon the offer of the kings pardon, they were the first that theyr downe their weapons, and submitted themselves to the kings mercie, the earle would not in a nie wise consent that they should die, but protested frankeite that he would keepe promise with them, and that he would be as good to them as his word: and so they had their liues saued. The same daie was order giuen by the earle that the bodies of them that were slaine in the field should be buried. On the morrow being the nine and twentieth of August, the earle of Warwike, with the nobles and gentlemen of the armie, and others in great numbers, both men and women, went to saint Peters church, and there gaue praises and thanks to God for the victorie obtained. And this done, he with all the armie departed out of the citie, and returned homewards with high commendation of citizens & others, that acknowledged the said earle to be the defender of their liues, and recoverer of their wiues, children, houses, and liuinges.

It was afterwards ordeined, that vpon the same daie in the which the rebels were thus subdued, the citizens yearelie should repaire to their churches, and there to heare sermice, and to haue a sermon abroad, to the which they should come together, to giue thanks to God for their deliuerance as that daie, and this is obserued till these our times. Robert Ket and his brother William Ket were brought vp to London, where they were committed to the tower, and shortly after arraigned of their treason and found guiltie, were brought to the tower againe, where they continued till the nine and twentieth of Nouember, on which daie they were deliuered to sir Edmund Windham high shiriffe of Dorsetholke and Suffolke, to be conueied downe into Dorsetholke, where Robert Ket was hanged in chains vpon the top of Dorsetholke castell: and William Ket his brother on the top of Windmondham Steple, in which towne they had both dwelled, and conspired with others to go forward with their wicked rebellion.

This William Ket (as was thought) had bene sure of his pardon, if he had not plaid the traitorous hypocrite: for vpon his submission at the first to my lord marquisse of Dorsethampton, at his comming downe to suppress this rebellion, he was sent to his brother to perswade him and the rest to yeld, and receiue the kings pardon: but he (like a dissembling lutchie, although he promised to my lord to do what he could in that behalfe) vpon his comming to his brother into the rebels campe, beholding the great multitude that were there about him, he did not one-lie not dissuade him and them from their traitorous rebellion, but encouraged them to persist and continue in their doings, declaring what a small number of souldiers the marquisse brought with him, nothing able to resist such a puissance as was there assembled. So that if it had not bene through the wicked perswasion of him, and some others at that time, not onelic Robert Ket himselfe, but also all the multitude beside, would haue submitted themselves, and receiued the kings pardon, to the preservation of manie a good mans life that after died in the quarrell.

But now to retorne somewhat backe to the doings in Scotland. In the meane while that such huris were in hand here in England, ye shall vnderstand that in the beginning of this summer, the king by aduise of his counsell sent forth a nauie by sea towards Scotland, the which arrtiuing in the Forth, and comming before Lieth, saluted the towne with cannon shot, & remaining there ten or twelue daies, took in the meane time the Ile of Jusketh, leaving therein foure ensignes of Englishmen, and one of Italians, with certeine pioners to fortifie the place. But the Frenchmen (as in the Scottish historie ye shall find moze at large) after the departure of the English nauie, recovered that Ile againe out of the Englishmens possession (after they had kept it fixtē daies) with the slaughter of capteine Cotton their generall, capteine Applebie, & one Jasper that was capteine of the Italians, beside others. After the recovering of this Ile, monsieur de Desse returned into France, leauing his charge to monsieur de Thermes latelie before there arrived: who after the departure of the said Desse, with a campe volant did what he could to stop the Englishmen within Vadington from vittels. But notwithstanding the earle of Rutland being lieutenant of the north, did not onlie vittell it, but put the French armie in danger of an ouerthrow, as it was thought must needs haue followed, if they had not with moze speed than is vsed in a common march kept alwaie, after they perceiued the English armie so neare at their elbowed.

Moreover, beside these inordinate vpproes and insurrections aboue mentioned, about the latter end of the said moneth of Iulie, in the same yeare, which was 1549, an other like sturre or commotion began at Semer in the north: siding of Dorsetholke, and continued in the eastriding of the same, and there ended. The principall doers and raiuers by whereof, was one William Dmbler of Eastbedderton peoman, and Thomas Dale parish cleark of Semer, with one Steuenfon of Semer, neighbour to Dale and nephew to Dmbler, which Steuenfon was a meane or messenger betwene the said Dmbler and Dale, being before not acquainted together, and dwelling seuen miles one from the other: who at last by the trauell of the said Steuenfon, and their owne euill dispositions, inclined to vngratiousnesse and mischief, knowing before one the others mind by secret conference, were brought to talke together on saint James daie, Anno 1549.

The causes mouing them to raise this rebellion, were these. First & principally their traitorous hartis grudging at the kings most goodlie proceedings, in aduancing and reforming the true honour of God and his religion. An other cause also was, for trusting to a blind and a fantasticall prophesie, wherewith they were seduced, thinking the same prophesie should shortly come to passe, by bearing the rebellions of Dorsetholke, of Denonshire, and other places. The reason of which prophesie and purpose together of the traitors was, that there should no king reigne in England, the noblemen and gentlemen to be destroyed, and the realme to be ruled by foure gouernours,

¶ The hurt of feditiō how greuous it is to a common-wealth, set out by sir Iohn Cheeke knight, in the year 1549.

The true subiect to the rebell.

Althow so manie and notable benefits, wherewith God hath alreadie and plentifullie indued vs, there is nothing more beneficiall, than that we haue by his grace kept vs quiet from rebellion at this time. For we see such miseries hang ouer the whole state of the common-wealth, through the great misorder of your feditiō, that it maketh vs much to reioyse, that we haue bene neither partners of your doings, nor con-spirers of your counsels. For euen as the Lacede-monians for the auoiding of drunkennesse did cause their sons to behold their seruants when they were drunke, that by beholding their beastlinesse, they might auoid the like vice: euen so hath God like a mercifull father staied vs from your wickednesse, that by beholding the filth of your fault, we might fustlie for offense abhorre you like rebels, whome else by nature we loue like Englishmen. And so for our selues, we haue great cause to thanke God, by whose religion and holie word daile taught vs, we learne not onelie to feare him trulie, but also to o-beie our king faithfullie, and to serue in our olone vocation like subiects honestlie. And as for you, we haue surelie iust cause to lament you as brethren, and yet suffer cause to rise against you as enemies, and most iust cause to ouerthrow you as rebels.

For what hurt could be done either to vs priuatlie, or to the whole common-wealth generallie, that is now with mischief so brought in by you, that euen as we see now the flame of your rage, so shall we necessarilie be consumed hereafter with the miserie of the same. Wherefore consider your selues with some light of vnderstanding, and marke this grie-uous and horrible fault, which ye haue thus vilelie committed, how heinous it must needs appeare to you, if ye will reasonable consider that which for my duties sake, and my whole countries cause, I will at this present declare vnto you. Ye which be bound by Gods word not to obeie for feare like men-pleasers, but for conscience sake like christians, haue contrarie to Gods holie will, whose offense is enerlasting death, and contrarie to the goodlie order of qui-etnesse, set out to vs in the kings maiesties lawes, the breach whereof is not vnknotone to you, taken in hand vncalled of God, vsent by men, vnfit by reason, to cast awaie your bounden duties of obeience, and to put on you against the magistrats, Gods office committed to the magistrats, for the reformation of your pretended iniuries. In the which doing ye haue first faulted grieuouslie against God, next offended vnnaturallie our soueraigne lord, thirdlie troubled miserablie the whole commonwealth, vndone cruellie manie an honest man, and brought in an bitter miserie both to vs the kings subiects, and to your selues being false rebels. And yet ye pretend that partlie for Gods cause, and partlie for the common-wealths sake, ye do arise, when as your selues cannot denie; but ye that seeke in word Gods cause, do breake in deed Gods commandements; and ye that seeke the common-wealth, haue destroyed the common-wealth: and so ye marre that ye would make, & breake that ye would amend, because ye neither seeke anie thing rightlie, nor would amend anie thing orderlie.

Ye that faulteth, faulteth against Gods ordinance, who hath forbidden all faults, and therefore ought againe to be punished by Gods ordinance, who is the reformer of faults. For he saith, I caue the punishment to me, and I will reuenge them. But the magistrate is the ordinance of God, appointed by him with the sword of punishment to loke strenght-lie to all euill doers. And therefore that that is done by the magistrate, is done by the ordinance of God, whome the scripture oftentimes doth call God, because he hath the execution of Gods office. How then do you take in hand to reforme? Be ye kings: By what authoritie? By what occasion? Be ye the kings officers: By what commission? Be ye called of God: By what tokens declare ye that? Gods word teacheth vs, that no man should take in hand anie office, but he that is called of God like Aaron.

What Apolles I praise you called you? What Gods minister had you rise?

Ye rise for religion. What religion taught you that? If ye were offered persecution for religion, ye ought to flie: so Christ teacheth you, and yet you intend to fight. If ye would stand in the truth, ye ought to suffer like martyrs, and you would stee like tyrants. Thus for religion you keepe no religion, and neither will follow the counsell of Christ, nor the conscience of martyrs. Why rise ye for religion? Haue ye anie thing contrarie to Gods booke? Poa, haue ye not all things agreeable to Gods word? But the new is different from the old, and therefore ye will haue the old. If ye measure the old by truth, ye haue the oldest; if ye measure the old by fanie, then it is hard: because mens fancies change, to giue that is old. Ye will haue the old still. Will ye haue anie older than that as Christ left, & his apostles taught, & the first church after Christ did vse? Ye will haue that the chancous do establish. Why that is a great deale younger than that ye haue, of later time, and newlie invented. Yet that is it that ye desire. Why then ye desire not the oldest. And do you preferre the bishops of Rome afore Christ, mens inventions afore Gods law, the newer sort of worship before the older? Ye seeke no religion, ye be deceiued, ye seeke traditions. They that teach you, blind you, that so instruct you, deceiue you. If ye seeke what the old doctors saie, yet loke what Christ the oldest of all saith. For he saith, Before Abraham was made I am. If ye seeke the truest way, he is the verie truth; if ye seeke the readiest waie, he is the verie waie; if ye seeke euerlasting life, he is the verie life. What religion would ye haue other now, than his religion?

You would haue the bibles in againe. It is no maruell, your blind guides would leade you blind still. Why, be ye howlets and backs, that ye cannot looke on the light? Christ saith to euerie one, Search ye the scriptures, for they beare witnesse of Christ. You saie, Vnto in the scriptures, for we will haue no knowledge of Christ. The apostles of Christ will vs to be so readie, that we maie be able to giue euerie man an account of our faith. We will vs not once to read the scriptures, for feare of knowing of our faith. Saint Paul praieeth that euerie man may increase in knowledge: ye desire that our knowledge might decaie againe. A true religion ye seeke belike, and worthe to be sought for. For without the sword indeed nothing can helpe it, neither Christ, nor truth, nor age can mainteine it. But why should ye not like that which Gods word establisheth, the primitive church hath authorized, the greatest learned men of this realme haue drawn, the whole consent of the parlement hath confirmed, the kings maiestie hath set forth? Is it not trulie set out? Can ye deuise anie truer than Christes apostles vse? Ye thinke it is not learnedlie done. Were ye commons take vpon you more learning, than the chosen bishops and clearks of this realme haue? Think ye folle in it? Ye were wont to iudge your parlement wisest, & now will ye suddenlie excell them in wis-dome?

them againe. If ye would follow his will, and obaie his commandments, ye should eat the fruits of the earth, saith the prophet; if not, the sword shall deuour you. Ye might haue eaten the fruits of this seasonable yeere, if ye had not by disobedience rebelled against God. Now not onelie ye can not eat that which your felices did first sowe by labour, and now destroye by sedition; but also if the kings maiesties sword came not against you, as iust policie requireth, yet the iust vengeance of God would light among you, as his word promisseth, and your cruell wickednesse deserueth.

The act of rebellion aggravated, & proved most wicked and horrible.

For what fouler the causes be that haue moued your wild affections herin, as they be vniuersall causes, & increase your faults much, the thing it selfe, the rissing I meane, must needs be wicked and horrible before God, and the blurring of authoritie, and taking in hand of rule, which is the sitting in Gods seat of iustice, and a proud climbing vp into Gods high throne, must needs be not onelie cursed newelie by him, but also hath bene often punished afore of him.
And that which is done to Gods officer, God accom-teth it done to him. For they despise not the minister, as he saith himselfe, but they despise him: and that presumption of chalenging Gods seat, doth shew you to haue bin Lucifers, and the woe is that God will punish you like Lucifers. Wherefore rightly I looke, as ye durke haue deserved, either for great vengeance for your abhominable transgression, or else earnestlie repent, with vniueined minds, your wicked doings; and either with example of death be content to dehort other, or else by faithfullnesse of obedience declare how great a seruice it is to God, to obey your magistrats faithfullie, and to serue in subjection traile.

Well, if he had not thus grievously offended God, whome ye ought to worship, what can ye reasonable thinke it, to be no fault against the king, when ye ought to reuerence? He be bound by Gods word to obeye your king, and is it no breach of dutie to withstand your king? If the seruant be bound to obeye his maister in the familie, is not the subiect bound to serue the king in his realme? The child is bound to the priuat father, and be we not all bound to the common-wealths father? If we ought to be subiect to the king for Gods cause, ought we not then to praye you to be faithfullie subiect to the king? If we ought dutifullie to shew all obedience to heathen kings, shall we not willingly and trulie be subiect to christian kings? If one ought to submit himselfe by humilitie to another, ought we not all by dutie to be subiect to our king? If the members of our naturall bodie all follow the head, shall not the members of the politicall bodie all obeye the king? If good ma-ners be content to giue place the lower to the higher, shall not religion teach vs alwaie to giue place to the highest? If true subiects will die gladielie in the kings seruice, should not all subiects thinke it dutie to obeye the king with iust seruice. But you haue not onelie disobeyed like ill subiects, but also taken stoutly rule vpon you like wicked magistrates.

A notable and rhetoricall clause, and to the purpose.

pe haue bene called to obedience by counsell of pzinat men, by the aduise of the kings maiesties counsell, by the kings maiesties free pardon. But what counsell taketh place, where surdineſſe is law and churlish answers be counted wiſdome? Who can perſuade where treason is about reason, and might ruleth right, and it is had for lawfull whatſoeuer is luſſfull, and commotioners are better than commiſſioners, and common too is named common-wealth? Haue ye not broken his lawes, diſobeyed his counsell, rebelled againſt him? And what is the common-wealth worth, when the law which is indifferent for all men, ſhall be willfullie and ſpitefullie broken of head-strong men, that seke against lawes to order lawes; that those may take place, not what consent of wisse men hath appointed, but what the lust of rebels hath determined? What unthriftine-is in ill seruants, wickednes in vnnaturall children, sturdinesse in brutish lubbers, crueltie in fierce enemies, wilddnes in brastle mindes, pride in disdainfull harts; that slowly now in you, which haue fled from houised conspiracies, to incamped robberies, and are better contented to suffer famine, cold, trauell, to glut your lusts, than to liue in quietnesse to saue the common-wealth, and thinke more libertie in wilful-nesse, than wisdome in dutifullnesse, and so run headlong not to the mischief of other, but to the destruction of your selues, and vnder by follic that ye intend by mischief, neither seeing how to remedie that ye iudge faultie, nor willing to saue your selues from miserie; which stiffneckednesse cannot do, but home-sie of obedience must frame.

20 If authoritie would serue vnder a king, the coun-cell haue greatest authoritie; if wisdome and grant-tie might take place, they be of most experience; if knowledge of the common-wealth could helpe, they must by ballie conference of matters vnderstand it best; yet neither the authoritie that the kings maie-stie hath giuen them, nor the grauntie which you know to be in them, nor the knowledge which with great trauell they haue gotten, can moue you either to keepe you in the dutie ye ought to do, or to auoid the 30 great disorder therein ye be. For there disobedience is thought stoutnesse, and sallennes is counted manhood, and stomaching is courage, and prating is lub-berd wisdome, and the clusthest is most met to rule; how can other iust authoritie be obied, or sad counsell be followed, or godd knowledge of matters be heard, or commandements of counsellors be considered? And how is the king obied, whose wisest be withstanded, the disobedientest obied, the high in au-thoritie not weied, the vnskillfullest made chiefe cap-teins, to the noblest most hurt intended, the brag-gingest braller to be most safe? And euen as the vic-40 iler parts of the bodie would contend in knowledge & gouernement with the fine wits: so do the lower parts of the common-wealth enterpryse as high a matter, to striue against their dutie of obedience to the counsell.

¶ What talke I of disobedience to quietnesse: haue not such mad rages run in your heads, that forsaking and bursting the quietnesse of the common peace, ye haue heinouisie and traitorouisie incamped 50 your selues in field, and there like a bile in a bobie, naie like a sinke in a tobole, haue gathered together all the nasty vagabonds and idle loiters to beare armour against him, whome all goodlie and good subiects will liue and die withall. If it be a fault when two fight together, and the kings peace broken, and punishment to be sought therefore; can it be but an outrageous and detestable mischiefe, when so manie rebels in number, malicious in mind, mischievous 60 in enterprise, fight not among themselves, but against all the kings true and obedient subiects; and seeke to proue whether rebellion may beat downe honestie, and wickednesse may overcome truth o: no: If it be treason to speake heinouisie of the kings maiestie, who is not hurt thereby, and the infamie returneth to the speaker againe; what kind of outragious & horrible treason is it, to assemble in campe an armie against him, and so not onelie intend an o-uerthrow to him, and also to his common-wealth; but also to cast him into an infamie, though all outward and strange nations, and perswade them that he is hated of his people, whome he can not rule; and that they be no better than bilans, which will not with godd orders be ruled:

What death can be deuised cruell enough for those rebels, who with trouble seeke death, and can not quench the thirst of their rebellion, but with the blood of true subiects; and hate the kings mercifull pardon, when they miserable haue transgressed, and in such an outrage of mischief will not by stubborneacknowledge themselves to haue faulted, but intend to bzoile the common-wealth with the flame of their treason, and as much as lieth in them not one to annoie themselves, but to deströie all others: He that is discontented with things that happen, and because he cannot beare the miserie of them, renteth his beare, and teareth his skin, & mangleth his face, which easeth not his sorow, but increaseth his mis-erie; maie he not be iustlie called mad and fantasticall, and wozthie whose wisdom should be suspected? And what shall we saie of them, who being in the common-wealth, seeing a soe greuous vnto them, and easie to haue bene amended, sought not the remedie, but haue increased the greife, and like frantike beasts raging against their head, do teare and deface as much as lieth in them his whole autho-ritie in gouernement, and violentlie take to themselues that rule vpon them, which he by policie hath granted vnto other?

And who weieing well the beauntesse of the fault, maie not iustlie saie and hold them to be worse herein than any kind of brute beasts? For we see that the shepe will obeie the shepheard, and the neat be ruled by the neatheard, and the hösse will know his keeper, and the dog will be in awe of his maister, and euerie one of them feed there, and of that, as his keeper and ruler doth appoint him, & goeth from thence, and that, as he is forbidden by his ruler. And yet we haue not heard of, that anie heard of companie of these haue risen against their heardsman or gouer-nour, but be alwaies contented not onelie to obeie them, but also to suffer them to take profit of them.
And we see furthermore, that all heards, & all fozts, be more egre in fiercenesse against all kind of strangers, than they be against their owne rulers, & will easier offend him who hath not hurt them, than touch their ruler who seeketh profit on them.

But ye that ought to be gouerned by your magistrates, as the heards by the heardsman, and ought to be like shepe to your king, who ought to be like a shepheard vnto you, euen in the time when your profit was sought, and better redresse was intended, than your vpsirs and vniquietnesse could obtaine, haue beyond the crueltie of all beasts foliue risen against your ruler, and sheued your selues wozthie to be ordered like beasts, who in kind of obedience will fall from the state of men. A dog stropeth when he is beaten of his maister, not for lacke of stomach, but for naturall obedience: you being not striken of your head but fauoured, not kept downe but succoured and remedied by law, haue violentlie against law not onclie barked like beasts, but also bitten like helhoundes. What? Is the mischief of sedition either not knowne vnto you, or not feared? Haue not examples aforesayd both told the end of rebels, and the wickednesse of rebellion it selfe? But as for old examples, let them passe for a while, as things well to be considered. But at this present one thing more to be weied.

Loke vpon your selues, after ye haue wickedlie stept into this horrible kind of treason, doe ye not see how manie bottomlesse whirlpooles of mischief ye be gulst withall, and what lossefull kinds of rebellion ye be faine to wade through? Ye haue sent out in the kings name, against the kings will, precepts of all kinds, & without commandement commanded his subiects, and vniustlie haue ruled where ye liued to command, thinking your owne fancies the kings commandements, and reles luffs in things to be right gouernement of things, not looking what should follow by reason, but what your selues follow by affection. And is it not a dangerous and a cruell kind of treason, to giue out precepts to the kings people? There can be no iust execution of lawes, reformation of faults, giuing out of commandements, but from the king. For in the king onelie is the right herof, & the authoritie of him deriued by his appointment to his ministers. Ye hauing no authoritie of the king, but taking it of your selues, what thinke ye your selues to be? Ministers ye be none, except ye be the diuels ministers, for he is the author of sedition.

The kings maiestie intendeth to mainteine peace, and to oppresse warre; ye stirre by vpozers of people, huriburles of vagabonds, routs of robbers.
Is this anie part of the kings ministerie? If a vagabond would do what he list, and call himselfe your seruant, and execute such offices of trust, whether ye would or no, as ye haue committed vnto another mans credit, what would euerie one of you saie or do herein? Would ye suffer it? Ye wander out of houses, ye make euerie daie new matters as it pleaseth you, ye take in hand the execution of those things, God by his word forbidding the same; which God hath put the magistrates in trust withall. What can ye saie to this? Is it sufferable thinke ye? If ye told a pssuat message in another mans name, can it be but a falselie I praie you? And to tell a feined message to the common-wealth, and that from the king, can it be honest thinke ye? To command is more than to speake: what is it then to command so traitorous a lie? This then which is in word a deceitfull lie, and in deed a traitorous fact, noisome to the common-wealth, vnhonourable to the king, mischie-fous in you, how can ye otherwise iudge of it, but to be an vheard of and notable disobedience to the king: and therefore by notable example to be punished, and not with gentlenesse of pardon to be forgiuen: Ye haue robbed euerie honest house, and spoiled them vniustlie, and pssioullie wronged poze men being no offenders, to their vtter vndoiing; and yet ye thinke ye haue not broken the kings lawes. The kings maiesties law and his commandement is, that euerie man should safelie keepe his owne, and use it reasonable to an honest gaine of his liuing: ye violentlie take and carie awaie from men without cause, all things whereby they should mainteine, not onelie themselves, but also their familie, & leaue them so naked, that they shall feele the smart of your curst enterprisse, longer than your owne vnnaturall & vngodlie stomachs would well vouchsafe. By iustice ye should neither hurt nor wrong man, and your pretended cause of this monstrous stur is to increase mens wealth. And yet how manie, and saie truth, haue ye decayed and vndone, by spoiling and taking awaie their goods? How should honest men liue quietlie in the common-wealth at anie time, if their goods, either gotten by their owne laboz, or left to them by their friends, shall vnlawfullie and vno-derlie, to the feeding of a sort of rebels, be spoiled and wasted, and vtterlie scattered abroad? The thing that ye take is not your right, it is an other mans owne.
The maner of taking against his will is vnlawfull, & against the order of euerie godd common-wealth.
The cause why ye take it is mischievous and horrible, to sat your sedition. Ye that take it be wicked traitors, and common enemies of all good order.

If he that desireth an other mans goods or cat-tel, do fault: what doth he (thinke you) whose desire taking followeth, and is led to and fro by lust, as his wicked fantasie void of reason doth guide him? He that vseth not his owne well and charitable, hath much to answer for: and shall they be thought not dies, which should be at libertie vnder the king, and restrained them of their seruice, which by dutie they owe the king, and appaied both strength and health, wherewith they liue and serue the king. As there anie honest thing moze desired than libertie: We haue shamefullie spoiled them thereof. As there anie thing moze dutifull than to serue their lord and master: But as that was desired of the one part, so was it hindered and stopped on your part. For neither can the king be serued, nor families kept, nor the common-wealth looked vnto, where freedom of libertie is stopped, and diligence of seruice is hindered, and the helpe of strength and health abated.

 Mens bodies ought to be free from all mens bondage and crueltie, and onelie in this realme be subiet in publike punishment to our publike gouer-nour, and neither be touched of headlesse captaines, nor bolden of brainlesse rebels. For the gouerne-ment of so pretious a thing ought to belong vnto the most noble rylar, and not iustlie to be in euerie mans powder, which is iustlie euerie lining mans treasure.
 For what goods he is deare to euerie man, as his owne bodie is, which is the true vessell of the mind, to be incalurable kept of euerie man for all exercises & seruices of the mind: If ye may not of your owne authoritie meddle with mens goods, much lesse you may of your owne authoritie take order with mens bodies.

For what be gods in comparison of health, liber-tie, and strength, which be all setled and fastened in the bodie : They that strike other, doe greatlie offend, and be iustlie punishable : and shall they that cruel-lie and wrongfullie torment mens bodies with irons and imprisonments, be thought not of others but of the infernall honest, and plaine, and true dealing men : What shall we say by them, who in a priuat businesse will let a man to go his tourneie in the kings high waie : Doe they not thinke ye plaine wrong : When in a common cause not onlie to hinder them, but also to deale cruelle with them, and thrust them from doing their service to the king, and their dutie to the common-wealth, is it not both disobedience, crueltie, and mischief thinke ye : What an hinderance is it, to haue a good garment hurt, and setwell appaired, or anie esteemed thing to be decaied : And seeing no earthlie thing a man hath is more pretious than his body, to cause it to be cruelle tormented with irons, feebled with cold, weakened with ordering: can it be thought anie other thing but wrong to the sufferer, crueltie in the doer, & great disobedience and transgression to the king? how then be able to defend it? But seeing ye so impietifullie bere men, cast them in prison, lade them with irons, pine them with famine, contrarie to the rule of nature, contrarie to the kings maiesties lawes, contrarie to God holie ordinaunces, beeing no matter but pretended and faigned gloses, ye be not onelie disobedient to the king like rebels, but withstanding the law of nature like beaſts, and so woorthie to die like dogs, except the kings maiestie, without respect of your deſerving, bee mercifullie grant you of his goodnesse that which you cannot escape by office.

Yet ye being not content with this, as small things enterprise great matters, and as though ye could not satisfie your selues, if ye should leaue anie mischiefed wmdome, haue sought blood with crueltie, and haue flaine of the kings true subiects manie, thinking their murder to be your defense, when as ye haue increased the fault of your vile rebellion, with the horror of bloodshed, and so haue burdened mischief with mischief, whilist it come to an importable weight of mischief. What could we do more, in the horriblest kind of faults, vnto the greatest transgressours and offenders of God and men, than to looke stricte on them by death, and so to rid them out of the common-wealth by severe punishment, whome ye thought vnto worthie to lue among men for their doings? And those who haue not offended the king, but defended his realme, and by obedience of seruice fought to punish the disobedient, and for safegard of euerie man put themselves vnder dutie of law, those haue ye miserable and cruellie flaine, and bathed you in their blood, whose doings ye should haue followed, & not to haue appaied the common-wealth, both by destruction of good men, and also by increase of rebels. And how can that common-wealth by anie means indure, wherin euerie man without authoritie, may vniuersallyd slea whome he list, and that in such case as those who be flaine shew themselves most noble of courage, and most readie to serue the king and the common-wealth, and those as do slea be most vilanous and traitorous rebels that anie common-wealth did ener suffer?

For a citie and a prouince be not the faire houses, and the strong walles, nor the defense of anie engine, but the liuing bodies of men, being able in number and strength to mainteine themselves by god order of iustice, & to serue for all necessarie & prouenable uses in the common-wealth. And then as mans bodie being a part of the whole common-wealth, is wrongfullie toucht anie way, and specially by death, then suffereth the common-wealth great iniurie, and that alwaies so much the more, how honester and nobler he is, who is iniuriously murdered. How was the lord Sheddels handled among you, a noble gentleman, and of god service, both fit for counsell in peace, and for conduct in war, considering either the grauitie of his wisdomme, or the authoritie of his person, or his seruice to the common-wealth, or the hope that all men had in him, or the need that England had of such, or among many notable god, his singular excellencie, or the fauor that all men bare toward him, being loosed of euery man, and hated of no man:

man, and hated of no man: Considered ye who should by doctre be the kings subiects, either how ye should not haue offended the k. or after offence haue received the kings pardon, or

He that stealeth anie part of a mans substance, is worthie to lose his life. How then, your owne consciences should be made your iudges, & none other set to giue sentence against ye. Seeing ye haue bene such bloudshedders, so heinous manquellers, so horrible murderers, could ye do anie other than plainlie confesse your soule and wicked rebellion to be gracious against God, and traitorous to the king, and hurtfull to the common-wealth? So manie gracious faults meeting together in one sinke, might not one lie haue discouraged, but also giuen to desperation, anie other honest or indifferent mind.

But what fele they, whose hearts so deepe mischæse had hardened, and by vehemencis of affection be made unshamefast, and stop all discourse of reason, to let at large the full scope of their unmeasurable madnesse? What mens goods seme little to your insatiable desires, ye haue wared greedie now upon cities, and haue attempted mightie spoiles, to glut ye (and ye could) your waiking hunger. Oh how much haue they need of, that will neuer be contented, and what riches can suffice anie that will attempt high enterprises aboue their estate? Ye could not mainteine your camps with your priuat goods, with your neighbours portion, but ye must also attempt cities, because ye sought great spoiles, with other mens losses, and had forgotten how ye liued at home honestlie with your owne, and thought them worthie death that would disquiet ye in your house, and plucke awaie that which ye by right of law thought to be your owne. Wherein se what ye would haue done, spoiled the kings maiesties subiects, weakened the kings strength, ouerthrowne his townes, taken awaie his munition, drawne his subiects to like rebellion, yea and as it is among forren enemies in sacking of cities, no doubt thereof, ye would haue fallen to slaughter of men, ransoming of wiues, deslouring of maidens, chopping of children, sacking of houses, beating downe of streets, ouerthrowing of altogither.

For what measure haue men in the increase of madnesse, when they can not at the beginning staie themselves from falling into it. And if the besetting but of one house to rob if, be inflie damned worthie death: what shall we thinke of them that besiege whole cities for desire of spoile? We liue vnder a king to serue him at all times when he shall need our strength: and shall ye then not onlie withdraw your selues, which ought as much to be obedient as we be, but also violentie plucke other awaie too, fro the dutie vnto the which by Gods commandement all subiects be straitlie bound, and by all lawes eueris nation is naturallie led? The townes be not onlie the ornament of the realme, but also the seat of merchants, the place of handicrafts, that men scattered in villages, and needing diuerse things, made in little rowne know where to find the lacke. To ouerthrow them then, is nothing else but to waist your owne commodities, so that when ye would buie a necessaie thing for monie, ye could not tell where to find the same.

Spunition serueth the king not onlie for the defence of his owne, but also for the inuasion of his enemy. And if ye will then so straitlie deale with him, that ye will not let him so much as defend his owne, ye offer him double iniurie; both that ye let him from doing anie notable fact abroad, and also that ye suffer not him quietlie to inioie his owne at home. But herein hath notable apared what cities haue faithfully serued and suffered extreme danger, not onlie of goods, but also of famine & death, rather than to suffer the kings enemies to enter: and what white liured cities haue not onlie not withstood them, but also with shame fauored them, and with mischief aided them. And I would I might praise herein all cities alike! which I would do, if all were like worthie. For then I might shew more faith in subiects than strength in rebelles, and testifie to men to come, what a generall faith euerie citie bare to the kings maiestie, whose age although it were not fit to rule, yet his subiects hearts were willing to obeie, thinking not onlie of the hope, which all men conceiue hereafter to be in him, but also of the lust kind of gouernment, which in his minority his counsell doth vse among them. And here, how much and how worthie maie Grecester be commended, which being in the middell of rebels, vnittelled, vnfortified, vnprepared for so long a siege, did noble hold out the continuall and dangerous assault of the rebell: For they sustained the violence of the rebell, not onlie they had plentie enough of vittels, but also eleuen or twelue daies after the extreme famine came on them, and liuing without bread, were in courage so manfull, & in dutie so constant, that they thought it yet much better to die the extreme death of hunger, shewing truth to their king, and loue to their countrie, than to giue anie place to the rebell, and fauor him with aid, although they might haue done it with their lesse danger.

Whose example if Norwich had followed, & had not rather giuen place to traitors, than to keepe their dutie; and had not sought more safegard than honestie, and priuat hope more than common quietnesse: they had ended their rebellion sooner, and escaped themselves better, and saued the losse of the worthie lord Shrefeld, in whome was more true seruice for his life, than in them for their goods. And although this can not be spoken against a certeine honest soyt that were amongst them, whose praise was the greater, because they were so few: yet the greater number was such, that they not onlie obeyed the rebell for feare, but also followed him for loue, and did so traitorously order the kings band vnder my lord marquisse, that they suffered more damage out of their houses by the townes men, than they did abroad by the rebelles. Whose fault as the kings maiestie maie pardon, so I would either the example might be forgotten, that no citie might

Who then that would willinglie defend ye, can say anie thing for ye, which haue so diuerslie faulted, so traitorously offended, not onlie against priuat men seuerallie, but also generallie against whole townes, and that after such a sort, as outward enemies full of deadlie feud could not more cruellie inuade them?
And thus the kings maiestie dishonored, his counsell dishonored, the gods of the poze spoiled, the houses of the wealthie sacked, honest mens bodies imprisoned, worthie mens personages slaine, cities besieged and threatened, and all kind of things disordered, can ye without teares and repentance heare spoken of, which without honestie and godlinesse ye practised, and not find in your hearts now to returne to dutie, which by witchcraft of sedition were poisoned in dis-they do so far prouoke God, or offend man: and find and detestable sedition? Do ye not see how for the maintenance of these vngodlie rablements, not on-lie cities and villages, but also shires and countries be utterly destroyed? Is not their corne wasted, their cattell fethed a waie, their houses rised, their goods spoiled, and all to feed your byrissing without reason, and to mainteine this tumult of rebellion invented of the diuell, continued by you, and to be o-uerthrowen by the power of Gods mightie hand?

And whie should not so hurtfull wasting and harrid-ing of countries be iustlie punished with great seueritie, seeing robbing of houses, and taking of purfes, do by law deserue the extremite of death? How manie suffer iniurie when one hundred of a shire is spoiled: And what iniurie thinke ye is done; when not onlie whole shires be destroyed, but also euerie quarter of the realme touched? Haue ye not brought vpon vs all povertie, weaknesse, and hatred within the realme, & discouragement, shame, and damage without the realme? If ye miserable intended not on-lie to know other, but also to destroy your selues, and to ouerthrow the whole realme, could ye haue taken a readier waie to your owne ruine than this is?

A further briefe of the in-conueniences byed by rebellion.

The losse of haruest.
Warms be poze mens storehouses.

And first if ye be anie thing reasonable, list by your reason, and weigh by wisdom, if not all things, yet your owne cases, and learne in the beginning of matters to foresee the end, and iudge aduisedlie yer ye enter into anie thing basillie. See ye not this yeare the losse of haruest? And thinke ye can grow to wealth that yere when ye lose your thrist and profit? Warns be poze mens storehouses, wherein lieth a great part of euerie mans owne liuing, his wines and childrens liuing, wherewith men mainteine their families, paie their rents: and therefore be alwaies thought most rich when they haue best crops. And now when there is neither plentie of haie, nor sufficient of straw, nor corne enough, and that through the great disorder of your lewd rebellion, can ye thinke ye do well, when ye vndo your selues, and iudge it a common-welth when the commons is destroyed, and seeke your hap by unhappinesse, and extreme your owne losse to be your owne forwardnes, and by this iudgement shew your selues, how little ye vnder-stand other mens matters, when ye can scarcely consider the weightiest of your owne? Hath not the haie this yeare, as it rose from the ground, so rooted to the ground againe: and where it was wont by mens seasonable laboz to be taken in due time, and then serue for the maintenance of horse and cattell wherwith we liue, now by your disordered mischefe hath bene by mens idlenesse and vndutifolnesse let alone vntouched, and so neither serueth the poze to make monie of, nor anie cattell to liue with. The corne was sowne with labour, and the ground filled for it with labour, and looked to be brought home againe with labour: and for lacke of honest labozers it is lost on the ground; the owners being loiterers, and seeking other mens, haue lost their owne, and hoping for mounteins, lacked their present thrist, neither ob-teining that they sought, nor seeking that they ought.

And how shall men liue when the maintenance of their prouision is lacking? For labouring and their old store is wasted by wilfulness of sedition, and so neither spare the old nor saue the new. How can men be fed then or beasts liue, when as such wastfull negligence is miserablie vbled? And mispending the time of their profit, in shamefull disorder of inobedience, they care not greatlie what becometh of their owne, because they intend to liue by other mens: Haie is gone, corne is wasted, straw is spoiled, what reckoning of haruest can ye make, either for the aid of others, or for the releefe of your selues? And thus haue ye brought in one kind of miserie, which if ye saw before, as ye be like to see after, although ye had hated the common-welth, yet for loue of your selues ye would haue avoided the great enemie thereof, into the which ye willfullye now haue cast your selues.

An other no lesse is, that such plentie of vittels as was abundantie in euerie quarter for the releefe of vs all, is now wastfullie and vnthriftfullie spent, in mainteining you vnlatfull rebels, and so with disorder all is consumed, which with good husbandrie might long haue indured. For, so much as would haue serued a whole yeare at home with diligence and skilfull heed of husbandrie, that is willfullye wasted in a moneth in the campe, through the raueni-ng spoile of vilanie. For what is vnordered plentie, but a wastfull spoile, whereof the inconuenience is so great, as ye be worthie to seele, and bringeth in more hardnes of liuing, greater dearth of all things, & occasioneth manie causes of diseases? The price of things must needs increase much, when the number of things wareth lesse, and by scarcitie be inhabited, & compelleth men to abate their liberalitie in house, both to their owne, and also to strangers. And where the rich wanteth, what can the poze find, who in a common scarcitie liueth most scarcilie, and scarcely quickest the sharpnesse of starving, when enerie man for lacke is hungerbitten. Which if ye had well remembred before, as ye now maie after perceiue, ye would not I thinke so stiffe-neckedlie haue rested and indangered your selues in the scoome of famine, whereof ye most likeliest must haue the greatest part, which most subboynlie refused, to your owne shame hame and confusion.

Experience teacheth vs, that after a great dearth cometh a great death; for that when men in great want of meat eat much ill meat, they fill their bodies with ill humors, and cast them from their state of health, into a subiection of sicknesse: because the good blood in the bodie is not able to keepe his temper, for the multitude of the ill humors that corrupteth the same. And so grow great & deathly plagues, and destroye great numbers of all sorts, sparing no kind that they light on, neither respecting the poore for mercie, nor the rich with fauour. Can ye therefore thinke herein, when ye see decarie of vittels, the rich pinch, the poore famish, the following of diseases, the greatnesse of death, the mourning of widowes, the pitifulnesse of the fatherlesse, and all this miserie to come thorough your vnnatural misbehaviour, that ye haue not dangerouse hurt the commons of your countrie with a dolefull and vncurable wound? These things being once felt in the common-wealth, as they must needs be, euery man seeth by and by what followeth: euen a great diminishment of the strength of the realme, when the due number that the realme doth mainteine is made lesse, and thereby we be made rather a prey for our enemies, than a safetie for our selues.

And how can there be but a great decarie of people at the length, when some be ouerthrowne in warre, some suffer for punishment, some pine for famine, some die with the campes diet, some be consumed with sicknesse? For although ye thinke your selues able to match with a few vnprepared gentlemen, and put them from their houses, that ye might gaine the spoile: doe ye iudge the refoze your selues strong inough, not onelie to withstand a kings power, but also to ouerthrow it? Is it possible that ye should haue so mad a frensie in your head, that ye should thinke the number ye see so strong, that all ye see should not be able to preuaile to the contrarie? With what reason could ye thinke, that if ye booe the hot brunt of battell, but ye must needs feele the smart, speciallie the kings power comming against you: which if ye feare not, belike ye know not the force thereof? And so much the greater number is lost in the realme, that both the ouercommer and the ouercommen be parties, although vnlike, of one realme: and what losse is not onelie of either side, but of both, that doth plainlie rebound to the whole.

Then where so great and so horrible a fault is committed, as woe can not be mentioned of from the beginning, and bringeth in withall such penurie, such weaknesse, such disorder in the common-wealth, as no mischief besides could do the like: can aie man thinke with iust reason, that all shall escape unpunished that shall escape the sword, and not manie for terrour and examples sake should be looked vnto, who haue bene either great doers in such a disordered bilantie, or great counsellors to such an outrageous mischief: seeing the onelie remedie of redressing wilfull faults is a iust and seuer punishment of such, whose naughtie deeds god men ought to abhorre for duties sake, and ill men maie dread for like punishments sake, and a free licence to do mischief unpunished is so dangerous, that the sufferance of one is the occasion of the fall of a great number, and vmanly pitie to one is a deceitfull crueltie to the whole, inticing them to their owne destruction by sufferance, which would haue auoided the danger by fore punishment.

And in such a barrennesse of vittels, as must needs come after so rauening a spoile, it must needs be, that some (though few) shall be so nipt with egerneesse of famine, that they shall not recover againe themselves out of so fretting a danger. So in a generall weaknesse, where all shall be feeble, some must needs die, and so diminish the number, and abate such strength as the realme defended it selfe withall befoze. Which occasion of neuer so few, comming of so great a cause, if ye should make iust amends for, not of recompense which ye could not, but of punishment which ye ought; how manie, how diuerse and how cruell deaths ought euery one of ye often suffer? How manie came to the camps from long labour to sudden ease, and from meane fare to strong of vittels; and so fell in a manner vnwares to such a contrarie change, that nature hit selfe abiding neuer great and sudden changes, can not beate it without some grounds entered of diseases to come, which vncircumspect men shall sooner feele than thinke of, and then will scarcelie iudge the cause, when they shall be vexed with the effect.

It is little maruell that idlenesse and meat of another mans charge will sone feed by a fat like men; but it is great maruell if idlenesse and other mens meat doe not abate the same by sicknesse againe, and speciallie comming from the one, and going to the other: contrarie in those who violentlie seeke to turne in a moment the whole realme to the contrarie. For while their mind changeth from obedience to vnrulinesse, and turneth it selfe from honestie to wildnesse, and their bodies go from labour to idlenesse, from small fare to spoile of vittels, and from beds in the night to cabins, and from sweet houses to stinking camps, it must needs be by changing of affections which alter the bodie, and by vning of rest that filleth the bodie, and by glutting of meats which weakeneth the bodie, & with cold in the nights which accreteth the bodie, and with corrupt aire which infecteth the bodie, that there followe some grievous tempest not onelie of contagious sicknesse, but also of present death to the bodie.

The greatest plucke of all is, that behemencie of plague, which naturallie followeth the dunt of hunger, which when it entereth once among men, what darts of pangs, what throules of paines, what shewes of death doth it cast out? How manie fall, not afflicted with the sicknesse, but fretted with the paine: How beateth it downe not onelie small colonies, but also great countries? This when ye see light first on your beasts which lacke fodder, and after fall on men whose bodies gape for it, and see the scarcenesse of men to be by this your soule enterpryse, and not onelie other men touched with plagues, but also your owne house strong with death, and the plague also raised of your rising, to fire your selues: can ye thinke you to be anie other but mankillers of other, and murderers of your selues, and the principals of the ouerthrow of so great a number, as shall either by sword or punishment, famine, or some plague or pestilence be consumed and waisted out of the common-wealth?

And seeing he that decareth the number of cottages or plowes in a towne, seemeth to be an enemy to the common-wealth: shall we not count him, not onelie an enemy, but also a murderer of his countrie, who by harebrazined vnrulinesse causeth vtter ruine and pestilent destruction of so manie thousand men? Grant this folke then and oversight to be such as woorthilie ye maie count it, and I shall go further in declaring of other great incontinencies, which your dangerous and furious misbehaviour hath hurtfullie brought in; seeing diuerse honest and true dealing men, whose lining is by their owne prouision, hath come so before hand by time, that they haue bene able well to line honestlie in their houses, & paie beside the rents of their farmes trulie, and now haue by your crueltie and abhorred insurrections lost their goods, their cattell, their harmost, which they had gotten before, and wherewith they intended to live hereafter, & now be brought to this extremitie, that they be neither able to live, as they were wont at home before; nor to paie their accustomed rent at their due time. Whereby they be brought into trouble and unquietnesse, not onlie missing what they have lost by you, but also in danger of losing their holds at their lords hands, except by pitie they shew more mercie, than the right of the law will grant by iustice.

The fruits of honest mens travels long in gathering, quicklie spoiled by rebellion.

And what a griefe is it to an honest man, to labour trulie in youth, and to gaine painefullie by labour, wherewith to live honestlie in age, and to have this, gotten in long time, to be suddenlie caught awaie by the violence of sedition, which name he ought to abhorre by it selfe, although no miserie of losse followed to him thereby. But what greater griefe ought seditious rebels to haue themselves, who if they be not stricken with punishment, yet ought to pine in conscience, and melt awaie with the griefe of their owne faults, when they see innocents and men of true service hindered and burdened with the hurt of their rebellion, & who in a good commonwealth should for honesties sake prosper, they by these rebels onlie meanes be cast so behind the hand, as they can not recouer easilie againe by their owne trust, that which they have lost by those traitors mischiefes. And if unskill men ought not so to be handled at any mans hands, but onelie stand to the order of a law: how much more should true and faithfull subjects, who deserve praise, feele no unquietnesse, nor be vexed with sedition, who be obedientlie in subjection, but rather seeke iust amends at false rebels hands, and by law obtaine that they lost by disorder, and so constrain you to the uttermost, to paie the recompense of wrongfull losses, because ye were the authors of these wrongfull spoiles.

An argument from equitye & bright dealing curia with the unskill.

Then would ye some perceiue the commonwealths hurt, not when other felt it who deserved it not, but when you smarted who caused it, and stand not & looked vpon other mens losses which ye might pitie, but tormented with your owne which ye would lament. Now I am past this mischief, which ye will not hereafter denie, when ye shall praise other mens foresight, rather than your wicked doings, in bewailing the end of your furie, in whose beginning ye now reioise. What saie ye to the number of vagabonds and loitering beggers, which after the overthrow of your campe, and scattering of this seditious number, will swarme in euery corner of the realme, and not onelie lie loitering vnder hedges, but also stand sturdie in cities, and beg boldlie at euery doore, leauing labour which they like not, and following idleness which they should not? For euery man is easilie and naturallie brought from labour to ease, from the better to the worse, from diligence to slothfulness: and after warres it is commonlie seene, that a great number of those which went out honest, returne home againe like roisters, and as though they were burnt to the warts bottom, they haue all their life after an vnauoie smeeke thereof, & smell still toward daiesleepers, pursepickers, highwaie robbers, quarrellmakers, yea and bloodshedders too.

As what shifts soldiers fall after dis-camping and ceasing from warres.

Do we not see commonlie in the end of warres more robbing, more begging, more murdering than before, and those to stand in the high waie to aske their almes, whome ye be affraid to saie naie vnto honestlie, least they take it awaie from you violentlie, and haue more cause to suspect their strength, than pitie their need? Is it not then daile heard, how men be not onelie pursued, but utterlie spoiled, & few make ride safe by the kings highwaie, except they ride strong, not so much for feare of their goods, which men esteeme lesse, but also for danger of their life, which euery man loueth. Who is vndone at home and loiterers linger in streets, lurke in alehouses, range in highwaies, valiant beggers plate in towns and yet complaine of need, whose staffe if it be once bet in their hand, or sugghness beed in their bosome, they will neuer be allured to labour againe, contenting themselves better with idle beggerie, than with honest and profitable labour. And what more noisome beasts be there in a commonwealth? Prones in hives sucke out the honie, a small matter, but yet to be looked on by good husbands. Caterpillers destroy the fruit, an hurtfull thing, and well distast for by a diligent ouerser. Diuers beermine destroy coine, kill pulleime, engines and snares be made for them.

But what is a loiterer? A sucker of honie, a spoiler of coine, a stroier of fruit, a waister of monie, a spoiler of vittels, a sucker of blood, a breaker of orders, a seeker of bycakes, a queller of life, a basilisk of the commonwealth, which by companie and sight doth poison the whole countrie, and staineth honest minds with the infection of his venome, and so draweth the commonwealth to death and destruction. Such is the fruits of your labour and travell for your pretended commonwealth, which iustice would no man should taste of but your selues, that ye might trulie iudge of your owne mischief, and fraie other by example from presuming the like. When we see a great number of flies in a yeare, we naturally iudge it like to be a great plague, and hauing so great a swarming of loitering vagabonds, ready to beg and biall at euery mans doore, which declare a greater infection, can we not looke for a greuouser and perillous danger than the plague is? Who can therefore other wise deeme, but this one deadlie hurt, wherewith the commonwealth of our nation is wounded, beside all other is so pestilent, that there can be no more hurtfull thing in a well governed estate, nor more thowne into all kind of vice and varulinesse: and therefore this your sedition is not onelie most odious, but also most horrible, that hath spotted the whole countrie with such a staine of idleness.

There can be none end of faults, if a man rehearse all faults that do necessarilie follow this unrulie sturdinesse. For not onelie vagabonds wandering and scattering themselves for mischief, shall run in a mans eyes, but also disorder of euery degree shall enter into a mans mind, and shall behold hereby the commonwealth miserable defaced by you, who should as much as other haue kept your selues in order in it. Neither be the magistrats duly obeyed, nor the lawes iustlie feared, nor degrees of men considered, nor masters well serued, nor parents trulie reuerenced, nor lords remembered of their tenants, nor yet either naturall or ciuill law much regarded. And it is plainlie vnpossible that that countrie shall well stand in gouernement, and the people growe to wealth, where order in euery state is not sitlie obserued: and that bodie cannot be without much griefe of inflammation, where anye left part is out of ioint, or not duellie set in his owne naturall place.

Wherefore order must be kept in the commonwealth like health in the bodie, and all the dist of policie looketh to this end, how this temper may be safely maintained, without anye excess of vnicuersalenesse, either of the one side, or of the other. And easie enough it is to keepe the same, when it is once brought into the meane, and to hold it in the state it is found in: but when it bursteth out once with a vehementie, and hath gotten into an unrulie disorder, it spreadeth so fast, and ouersloweth all honest mens resisting so violentlie, that it will be hard to recouer the breach of long time againe, except with great great and wise counsell, which no doubt shall be in season vied, there be wonderfull remedies sought therefore. And enen as a man falling, is casier holden by by staie, than when he is fallen downe he is able to rise againe: so is the commonwealth slipping, by the foresight of wisdom better kept from ruine; than when it is once fallen into anie kind of miserie, the same may be called againe to the old and former state. Now we not euidentlie know, that a man may better keepe his arme or his leg from breaking or falling out of joint, afoze hurt come to it; than after the hurt it may safelie and quietlie be healed, and restored to the former strength and health againe? And now through your seditious means, things that were afore quiet and in good order, laws feared and obied, subiects ruled and kept in dutie, be all now in a great disorder, and like (if it be not holpen) to grow to wild-nesse, and a beaslinelie; seeing that neither common dutie can be kept, which nature prescribeth, nor common law can be regarded, which policie requireth.

How can yee keepe your owne if yee keepe no order?
Your wines and children, how can they be defended from other mens violence, if yee will in other things beate all order? By what reason would yee be obied of yours as seruants, if yee will not obie the king as subiects? How would yee haue others deale orderlie with you, if yee will vse disorder against all others? Seeing then there is such a confusion now of things, such a turmoile of men, such a disorder of families; who can loke to liue quietlie a great while, who can thinke but that yee haue miserable tossed the commonwealth, and so vexed all men with disorder, that the inconuenience hereof cannot onelie nip others, but also touch you?

But now see how that not onelie these vnlooked for mischances haue beauslie growne on yee, but also those commodites, which yee thought to haue holpen your selues and others by, be not onelie hindered, but also hurt thereby. The kings maiestie by the abuse, as intended a iust reformation of all such things as poore men could trulie shew themselves oppressed with, thinking equalitie of iustice to be the diademe of his kingdome, and the safegard of his commons.
Which was not onelie intended by wisdom, but also set on with speed, and so entered into a due considering of all states, that none should haue iust cause to grudge against the other, when as euerie thing rightfullie had, nothing could be but vnrightfullie rugged at. And this would haue bene done, not onelie with your glad and willing assent: but also bene done by this date almost throughout the whole realme: so that quietlie it had bene obtained without inconuenience, and speedilie without delaie. And what sooner had bene done by the kings maiesties authoritie, that would by right haue remained for e-uer, and so taken in law, that the contrarie partie neither could by iustice, neither would by boldnesse haue enterprised the breach thereof.

But least wicked men should be wealthe, and they whose hearts be not truelie bent to obedience, should obtaine at the kings hands that they deser-ued not in a commonwealth, yee haue maruellouslie and worthilie hurt your selues, and greuouslie prouoked (except the kings goodnesse be more vnto you than your owne deserts can claime) that yee be not so much worthe as to be benefited in anie kind, as yee be worthe to lose that yee haue on euerie side. Ye haue thought god to be your owne reformers belike, not onelie vnnaturallie mistrusting the kings iustices, but also cruellie and vnciuillie dealing with your owne neighbours. Wherein I would as yee haue hurt the whole realme, so yee had not enterprised a thing most dangerous to your selues, & most contrarie to the thing yee intended. If yee had let things alone, thought god by your selues to be redressed, and dutifullie looked for the performance of that, the kings maiestie promising reformation, they should not haue bene vndone at this time, as in a great sort of honest places they be; nor whole countries, who for their quietnesse be most worthe to be looked on, should haue bene vnproviden for at this date. But this commoditie hath happened by the waie, that it is euidentlie knowne by your mischance, and others dutie, who be most true to the king, and most worthe to be done for, and who be most pernicious and traitorous rebels. And it is not to be doubted, but they shall be considered with thanks, and find iust redresse without deserued miserie, & you punished like rebels, who might haue had both praise & profit like subiects.

For that as yee haue valiantlie done of your selues, thinke yee it will stand anie longer, than men feare your rage, which cannot indure long; and that yee shall not then bide the rigor of the law for your prouat injuries, as yee vied the furie of your braines in other mens oppressions: Will men suffer wrong at your hands, when law can redresse it, & the right of the commonwealth will mainteine it, and god order in countries will beare it? Yee amend faults as ill surgeons heale sores, which when they come to be whole about, they rankle at the bottome, and so be saine continuallie to be soze, or else be mended by new breaking of the skin. Your redresse seemeth to you perfect and good, yee haue pulled downe such things as yee would, yee thinke now all is well: yee consider no further, yee seeke not the bottome, yee see not the soze, that yee haue done it by no law, yee haue redressed it by no order, what then? If it be no other, wise searched than by you, it will not tarie long so: either it will be after continuallie as it was afore your coming, or else it must be (when all is done) amended by the king.

Thus haue yee both lacked in the time, and mist in the doing, and yet besides that ye haue done, which is by your doing to no purpose. Yee haue done the things with such inconueniences, as hath bene both before rehearsed, and shall be after declared; that better it had bene for you, neuer to haue enioied the commoditie, if there be anie, than to suffer the griefs that will insue, which be verie manie. In euerie quarter some men (whom yee set by) will be lost, which euerie one of you (if ye haue loue in ye) would rather haue lacked the profit of your inclosures, than cause such destruction of them, as is like by reason & iudge-ment necessarilie to follow. What commonwealth is it then, to do such abhominable enterprises after so vile a sort, that yee hinder that god yee would do, and bring in that hurt yee would not, and so find that yee seeke not, and follow that yee lose, and destroy your selues by follie; rather than yee would be ordered by reason, and so haue not so much amended your old sores, as brought in new plagues, which yee your selues that deserue them will lament, and we which haue not deserued them may curse you for? For although the kings maiestie, as intended for your profits a reformation in his commonwealth: yet his pleasure was not, nor no reason gaue it, that euerie subiect should buslie intermeddle with it of their owne head, but onelie those whose his counsell thought most meet men for such an honest purpose.

The kings maiestie, as hath goodlie reformed an uncleane part of religion, and hath brought it to the true forme of the first church that followed Christ, thinking that to be truest, not what later mens fancies haue of themselves deuised, but what the apostles and their felowes had at Christs hand receiued, and willeth the same to be knowne and set abroad to all his people. Shall euerie man now that listeth and fantiseth the same, take in hand vncalled, to be a minister,

suffer, and to set forth the same, having no authori-tie: & aie, though the thing were verie goodlie that were done, yet the person must needs do ill that enterprisseth it, because he doth a good thing after an ill sort, and looketh but on a little part of dutie, considring the thing, and leaveth a great part unadvised, not considering the person: when as in a well and iustitie done matter, not onelie these two things ought well to be weighed, but also good occasion of time, and reasonable cause of the doing, ought also much to be set before everie doers eyes. Now in this your deed, the manner is ungodlie, the thing unsufferable, the cause wicked, the person seditious, the time traitorous: and can ye possiblie by anie honest defense of reason, or anie good conscience religious-lie grounded, denie that this malicious and horrible fault, so wickedlie set on, is not onelie sinful afoze God, and traitorous to the king, but also dradlie and pestilent to the whole common-wealth of our coun-trie, and so not onelie overthroweth vs with the miserie, but also overthroweth you with the rage thereof?

The poke that rebels willfullie bring upon themselves.

Yet further see and ye be not wearie with the multitude of miseries, which ye have marvellouslie moued, what a poke ye willfullie do bring on your selues, in stirring by this detestable sedition, and so bring your selues into a further slauerie, if ye vse your selues into a further slauerie, if ye vse your selues often thus inobedientlie. When common order of the law can take no place in unrulie and disobedient subiects, and all men will of willfullnesse resist with rage, and thinke their owne violence to be the best iustice; then be wise magistrats compelled by necessitie to seeke an extream reme die, where meane waies helpe not, and bring in the martiall law where none other law serueth. Then must ye be contented to bide punishment without processe, condemnation without witness, suspicion is then taken for iudgement, and displeasure may be iust cause of your execution, and so without fauor ye find stritnesse, which without rule seeke violence. Ye thinke it a hard law and unsufferable. It is so indeed, but yet good for a medicine.

Desperate remedies for desperate diseases.

Rebels whoorthie to suffer extremities of punishment.

The greatest shame that can come to a common-wealth.

Desperate sicknesses in physike must haue desperate remedies, for meane medicines will neuer helpe great griefes. So if ye cast your selues into such sharpe diseases, ye must needs looke for sharpe medicines againe at your physicians hands. And woorthie ye be to suffer the extremitie in a commonwealth, which seeke to do the extremitie, and by reason must receiue the like ye offer, and so be contentered to bide the end willinglie which set on the beginning willfullie. For no greater shame can come to a common-wealth, than that those subiects which should be obedient euen without a law, can not be contented to be ordered by the law, and by no means kept within their dutie, which should euerie waie offend rather than in their dutie. It is a token that the subiects lacke reason, when they forsake law, and thinke either by their multitude to find pardon, which cannot iustlie stretch to all, or else by strength to beare the stroke, which cannot prosper against a king.

They must needs little consider themselves, who bring in this necessitie, rather to stand to the pleasure of a mans will, than to abide the reason of the law; and to be endangered more when an other man li-seth, than when himselfe offendeth. And this must necessarilie follow if your rebellion thus continue: and while ye seeke to throw downe the poke, which ye sanke your selues burdened withall, ye bring your selues in a greater bondage, leaning safetie and so-lowing danger, and putting your selues vnder the iustice of them whose fauour ye might easilie haue kept, if ye would willinglie and dutifullie haue ser-ued. Now the gentlemen be more in trust, because the commons be unrulie, and they get by seruice, which ye lose by stubbornnesse, and therefore must needs, if ye thus continue, haue more authoritie from the king: because ye would be in lesse subiection to the king, and that as ye will not do of your selues, ye must be compelled to do by others, and that ye refuse to do willinglie, thinke ye must be dradlie to do the same constrainedlie. Which when it cometh to passe, as wisdometh seeth in your faults that it must needs, what gaine ye then, or what profit can arise to you by rising, which might haue found ease in sitting still? And what shall ye be at length the better for this turmoil, which beside diuers other in-commodities rehearsed, shall be thus clogged with the unsufferable burden of the martiall law.

Yet there is one thing behind, which me thinketh your selues should not forget, seeing that ye haue gi-uen the cause, ye should durie looke for the effect. Ye haue spoiled, imprisoned, and threatened gentlemen to death, and that with such hatred of mind, as may not well be borne. The cause therof I speake not on, which tried, will happilie be not so great: but see the thing, set murder aside, it is the heinouslest fault to a princat man. What could more spitefullie haue bene done against them, than ye haue vied with crueltie?
Can this do anie other but breed in their stomachs great grudge of displeasure toward you, and ingender such an hatred, as the weaker and the sufferer must needs beare the smart thereof.

The kings best kind of government is so to rule his subiects, as a father ordereth his children, and best life of obedient subiects is one to behaue himselfe to an other, as were brethren vnder the king their father. For loue is not the knot onelie of the common-wealth, whereby diuerse parts be perfectlie ioined together in one politike bodie, but also the strength and might of the same, gathering together into a small ronne with order, which scattered would else breed confusion and debate. Dissention we see in small houses, and thereby may take example to great common-wealths, how it not onelie de-caiethe them from wealth, but also abateth them from strength. Thinke small examples to take place in great matters, and the like though not so great to follow in the both, and there by learne to indge of great things unknowne, by small things perceived.
When brethren agree not in a house, goeth not the weakest to the walles; and with whom the father taketh part withall, is not he likeliest to preuaile: As it not wisdometh for the yonger brother, after the good will of the parents, to seeke his eldres brothers fa-uour, who vnder them is most able to do for him: So seeke them both with honestie is wisdometh, to lose them both by sullenness is madness.

Haue there not bene daillie benefits from the gentlemen to you, in some more, and in some lesse, but in none considered, which they haue more friendlie offered, than you haue gentlie requited? This must ye lose, when ye will not be thankfull, and learne to the gaine new good will by desert, when ye forsake the old friendship vnproouoked. And ye must thinke that living in a common-wealth together, one kind hath need of an other: and yet a great sort of you more need of one gentleman, than one gentleman of a great sort of you. And though all be parts of one common-wealth, yet all be not like woorthie parts, but all being vnder obedience, some kind in more subiection one waie, and some kind in more seruice another waie. And seeing ye be lesse able by monie and liberalitie to deserue good will than others be, and your onelie kind of desert is to shew good will, which honest men do well accept as much woorth as mo-nie, haue ye not much hindered & hurt your selues herein, losing that one kind of humanitie which ye have onlie left, and turning it into crueltie, which ye ought most to abhor, not onlie because it is wicked of it selfe, but also most noisome to you.

I can therefore for my part thinke no lesse herein, if ye follow your stiffenesse still, & must needs iudge that ye have wilfullie brought on your selues such plagues, as the like could not have fallen on you, but by your selues. Seeing then thus manie waies ye have hurt the common-welth of this whole countrie within, by destruction of shires, losing of harvest, waiting of vittells, decaying of manhood, vndermining of farmers, increasing of vagabonds, mainteining of disorders, hindring of redresses, bringing in of martiall law, and breeding continuall hatred among diuerse states: what thinke ye, I praise your Judge ye not that ye have committed an odious and detestable crime against the whole common-wealthe, whose fartherance ye ought to have tendered by dutie, and not to have sought the hurt thereof with your owne damage?

Besides all these inward griefes, which euery one severallie must needs feele with miserie, there happeneth so manie outward mischances among strangers to vs with disdain; that if there were nothing ill within the realme which we should feele, yet the shame which doth touch vs from other countries, should not onlie moue, but also compell you hartlie to forsethinke this your rebellious sedition. For what shall strangers thinke, when they shall heare of the great misorder which is in this realme with such confusion, that no order of law can keepe you vnder, but must be faine to be beaten downe with a kings powder? Shall they not first thinke the kings miserie, in whose mind God hath put so much hope for a child, as we may looke for gifts in a man; either for his age to be little set by, or for lacke of qualities not to be regarded, or for default of loue to be resisted, and no notable grace of God in him considered, nor the worthinesse of his office looked vpon, nor naturall obedience due to him remembred?

Shall they not next suppose, small estimation to be giuen to the rulers, to whom vnder the king we owe due obedience, that can not in iust and lawfull matters be heard, nor men to haue that right iudgement of their wisdomes, as their iustice in rule, and foresight in counsell requireth: but rather prefer their owne fancies before others experience, and deeme their owne reason to be common-wealthe, and other mens wisdomes to be but dreaming? Shall they not trulie saie the subjects to be more vnfaithfull in disobedience, than other subjects were ordeered be; and licence of libertie to make wild heads without order, and that they neither haue reason that vnderstand not the mischiefe of sedition, nor dutie which followeth their beaulinesse, nor loue in them which so little remember the common-wealthe, nor naturall affection which will daile seeke their owne destruction?

Thus the whole countrie lacking the good opinion of other nations, is cast into great shame by your vnkinnesse, and the proceedings of the countrie, be they neuer so goodlie, shall be ill spoken of, as vnfit to be brought into life, and good things hereby that deserve praise, shall bide the rebuke of them that list to speake ill, and all things vntouched shall be boldlie maintained. Nothing may with praise be redressed, where things be measured by changeable disorder, rather than by necessarie life; and that is thought most politike, that men will be best contented to doe, and not that which men should be brought vnto by dutie. And with what dutie or vertue in ye, can ye quench out of memorie this foule enterpryse, or gather a good report againe to this realme, who have so bilie with reproch slandered the same, and discreetly discredited it among others, and abated the good opinion which was had of the iust government and ruled order used heretofore in this noble realme, which is now most gricuous, because it is now most without cause.

If this outward opinion (without further inconvenience) were all, yet it might well be borne, and would with ease decaye as it grew: but it hath not onlie hurt vs with voice, but endangered vs in deed, and cast vs a great deale behind the hand, where else we might haue had a iollie forebode. For that oportunitie of time which seldome chanceth, and is alwaies to be taken, hath bene by your forward meanes lost this yeare, and so vainlie spent at home for bringing downe of you, which should else profitablie haue bene otherwise bestowed, that it hath bene almost as great a losse to vs abroad, as to lacke that we might haue obtained, as it was combrance at home, to go about the ouerthrow of you, whose sedition is to be abhorred. And we might both conuenientlie haue inuaded some, if they would not reasonably haue growne to some kind of friendship, and also defended others which would beside promise for times sake vniuersally set vpon vs, and easilie haue made this stormie time a faire yeare vnto vs, if our men had bene so happy at home, as our likelihood abroad was fortunat.

But what is it I praise you either to let slip such an occasion by negligence, or to stop it by stubbornnesse, which once past awaie, can be by no means recovered; no not though with diligence ye go about to re-inforce the same againe? If ye would with wickednes haue forsaken your faith to your naturall countrie, and haue sought craftie means to haue vtterlie betrayed it to our common enemies: could ye haue had any other speedier waie than this is, both to make our strength weake, and their weakenesse strong? If ye would haue sought to haue spited your countrie, and to haue pleased your enemies, and followed their counsell for our hinderance: could ye haue had deuised of them any thing more shamefull for vs, and ioisfull to them? If they which lie like spiels, and hearken after likelihoods of things to come, because they declare oportunitie of times to the enemies, are to be iudged common enemies of the countrie; what shall we reasonable thinke of you, who do not secretlie bewaile the counsels of other, but openly betraye the common-wealthe with your owne deeds, and haue as much as lieth in you, sought the ouerthrow of it at home: which if ye had obtained at Gods hand, as he neuer alloweth so horrible an enterpryse, how could ye haue defended it from the ouerthrow of others abroad?

For is your vnderstanding of things so small, that although ye see your selues not vnfit to get the upper hand of a few gentlemen, that ye be able to beat downe afore the kings power: ye and by chance ye were able to do that, would ye iudge your selues by strength mightie enough, to resist the power of outward nations, that for praise sake would invade ye? I saie, thinke trulie with your selues, that if ye do overcome, ye be vnafire both by strength abroad, and displeasure of honest men at home, and by the punishment of God above. And now ye haue not yet gotten in deed, that your vaine hope looketh for by fanthe: thinke how certeinly ye haue wounded the common-wealthe with a sore stroke, in procuring our enemies by our weakenesse to seeke outward glorie with inward dishonour. Which howsoever they get, thinke it to be long of you, who haue offered them victorie before they began warre: because ye would declare to men hereafter (belike) how dangerous it is to make sturres at home, when they do not onlie make our selues weak, but also our enemies strong.

Beside this, there is another sort of men desirous of advantage, and disdainfull of our wealth, whose greife is most our greatest hap, and be offend with religion, because they be drowned in superstition, men zealous toward God, but not fit to iudge, meaning better without knowledge, than they iudge by their meaning, worthier whose ignorance should be taken awaie, than their will should be followed; whome we should more rebuke for their stubbornesse, than despise for their ignorance. These seeing superstition beaten downe, and religion set by, Gods word taking place, traditions kept in their kind, difference made betwene Gods commandements and mans learning, the truth of things sought out according to Christs institution, examples taken of the primitive churches use, not at the bishop of Romes ordinance, and true worship taught, and wil-worship refused, do by blindness rebuke that as by truth they should follow, and by affection follow that as by knowledge they should abhorre, thinking vantage to be truth, and scripture to be error, not weieing by the word, but misconstruing by custome.

Religion beareth the blame and is counted the cause of rebellion, but amisse.

And now things be changed to the better, and religion trulier appointed, they see matters go awry, which hurteth the whole realme, and they reioice in this mischance as a thing worthilie happened, mistaking the cause, and slandering religion, as though there were no cause why God might haue punished, if their used profession might still haue taken place. They see not that where Gods glorie is truest set forth, there the diuell is most busie for his part, and labourereth to corrupt by lewdnesse, that as is gotten out by the truth, thinking that if it were not blemished at the first, the residue of his falsehood should after lesse preuaile. So he troubleth by bitwaies, that he cannot plainlie withstand, and vseth subtiltie of sophistrie, where plaine reason faileth, and persuadeth simple men that to be a cause, which in deed can not be tried and taken for a cause. So he causeth religion which teacheth obedience, to be iudged the cause of sedition; & the doctrine of loue, the seed of dissention; mistaking the thing, but persuading mens minds, and abusing the plaine meaning of the honest to a wicked end of religions overthrow.

The diuels sophistrie.

Examples.

The husbandman had not so sone thowne seed in his ground, but steppeth by the enemy, and he soweth cockle too, and maketh men doubt whether the good husband had done well or no, and whether he had sowne there good seed or bad. The farsifull Jewes in Egypt would not beleue Jeremie, but thought their plague and their miserie to come by his means; and learning of idolatrie to be the cause of penurie, wherefore by willfull aduise they intended to forsake the prophets counsell, and thought to serue God most trulie by their rooted & accustomed idolatrie. When the christian men were persecuted in the primitive church, & daillie suffered martyrdom for Christs profession, such faire season of weather was for three or foure peares together, that the heathen lodged thereupon God to be delighted with their cruelty, and so were persuaded that with the blood of the martyrs they pleased God highlie. Such fantasies light now in papists, and irreligious mens heads, and soine things by chance happening together, and conclude the one to be the cause of the other, and then delight in true worshippers hurt, because they iudge curiously the god to be bad, and therefore reioice in the punishment of the goodlie. For they being fleshlie, iudge by outward things, and perceiue not the inward, for that they lacke the spirit and so iudge amiss, not understanding God, what diuersitie he suffereth to blind still the willfull, and how thorough all dangers he saucth his chosen.

The Jewes ascribe their miserie to a false cause.

The heathens fond opinion of gods fauouring their cruelty against christians.

And thus haue ye giuen a large occasion to stubborne papists, both to iudge amisse, and also to reioice in this wicked chance, contented with our mischance, not liking our religion, and thinking God doth punish for this better change, and haue thereby an euill opinion of Gods holie truth, confirmed in them by no sure scripture, but by following of mischance, which they ought to thinke to come for the pride and stubbornnesse of the people, who doth not accept Gods glorie in good part, nor giue no due praise to their Lord and maker. What should I saie more? Ie hurt euerie waie, the dangers be so great, and the perils so manie, which do daillie follow poor diuillish enterpryse, that the more I seeke in the matter, the more I continually see to faile. And what words can worthilie declare this miserable beaklines of poyrs, which haue intended to diuide the realme, and arme the one part for the killing of the other? For euen as concord is not onelie the health, but also the strength of the realme; so is sedition not onelie the weaknesse, but also the apostume of the realme, which when it breaketh inwardlie, putteth the state in great danger of recouerie, and corrupteth the whole commonwealth with the rotten surie that it hath bene long putrified withall. For it is not in sedition as in other faults, which being mischievous of themselves, haue some notable hurt alwaies fast adioined to them: but in this one is there a whole hell of faults, not seuerallie scattered, but clustered on a lump together, and coming on so thicke, that it is impossible for a region armed with all kinds of wisdom, and strength thereto, to auoid the dangers that issue out thereof.

When sedition once breaketh out, see ye not the lawes overthrowne, the magistrates despised, spoiling of houses, murdering of men, wasting of countries, increase of disorder, diminishing of the realms strength, swarming of vagabonds, scarcity of laborers, and all those mischiefs plentifully brought in, which God is wont to scourge seuerelie withall, warre, dearth, and pestilence? And seeing ye haue these & murder, plague & famine, confusion and solennelie linked together, can ye looke for anie more mischance in one shamefull enterpryse, than ye euidentlie see to grow herein? As for warre, although it be miserable, yet the one part getteth somewhat, and reioiceth in the spoile, and so goeth luckier awaie: and either increaseth his countrie with riches, or inhabits himselfe with glorie: but in sedition both parts lose, the ouercommer cannot die, the ouercommed cannot spoile; the more the winner winneth, the more he loseth; the more that escape, the more infamous men liue; all that is gained is scarcelye saved; the winning is losse, the losse is destruction, both waste themselves, and the whole most wasted; the strengthening of themselves, the decaye of the countrie; the striving for the victorie, is a peece to the enemy: and thortlie to saie, the bellish turmoile of sedition so farre passeth the common miserie of warre, as to saie himselfe is more heinous, than to be slaine of another.

A noble peace, that wealth bringeth thou in, how do all things flourish in field and in towne, what forwardnesse of religion, what increase of learning, what grauitie in counsell, what deuise of wit, what order of maners, what obedience of laws, what reuerence of states, what safeguard of houses, what quietnesse of life, what honoz of countries, what friendship of minds, what honestie of pleasure hast thou alwaies mainteined, whose happinesse we knew not, while now we see thy lacke, and shall learne by miserie to vnderstand plentie, and so to auoid mischance by the hurt that it bringeth, and learne to serue better, where rebellion is once known; and so to liue true, ¶ Thus far this necessarie treatise touching rebellion, penned by sir John Cheke, a gentleman euerie waie in complet sort satisfieng the report: blayed abroad of him. For if there were no more testimonies extant in the world, but this onelie treatise discourfing Betts rebellion; it were enough to warrant no lesse true, than in common speech and writing is left witnessed of him. And suerlie it appereth, that as in this gentleman there was an extraordinary heape of laudable gifts; so was there also in him the right use of them all. Wherby he grew in such fauor with king Henrie the eight, that partlie for his absolute knowledge in tongues, speciallie the Greeke and Latine, and also for his integritie of life and religion; he was chosen scholemaster to yong prince Edward, to traine him by in the right vnderstanding, both of forein languages, & the purenes of Gods seruice. Insomuch that by his industrie such effects folloved (God above prospering his actions) that the yong prince, when he came to the kingdom was mindefull of him, and among other (I will not saie gratuities, there cause of desert maketh chal

a mile or little more beyond Margulsen; from thence he came with his armie, and lodged on a hill, some what more than a mile & a halfe from Hambleteuue. The French king hauing viewed the forts, caused five and twentie peeces of artillerie to be planted against that fort, which was built in a place called the Almaine campe, but the Frenchmen named it Le fort de Selague, distant from Hambleteuue about a quarter of a mile. The artillerie had not gone off little more than the space of two houres, but that Charles Sturton capteine of that peece, and George Willoughbie a gentleman associat with him, came forth to parlee with the Constable, offering to yeld the fort into his hands, vpon condition they might depart with bag and baggage. But as they were thus in hand to make their composition, the Frenchmen thrust forward to the rampiers, and entered in plumps into the fortresse, slue fourescore persons, & toke the rest prisoners. There might be in all within that peece two hundred and thirtie persons, men and women. This happened the foure and twentieth of August, being Bartholomeu daie.

This done, the king caused part of the artillerie to be planted against the castell of Hambleteuue, situated at the one end of the towne nere to the sea side. Towards night monsieur de Gladosme gaue an approach to the said castell, and they within by commandement of the lord Greie retired to the maine fort to helpe to furnish the same, wanting numbers sufficient to defend it. The next daie being the five and twentieth of August, the king caused approaches to be made vnto the great fort, and the morrow after the batterie began most furiously. The same daie after dinner, the king summoned them within to yeld; but the lord John Greie being generall (although he saw how weake the peece was of it selfe, & the lacke of sufficient numbers of men to resist such a puissant force, as the French king had there with him) would not yet hearken vnto anie talke, nor suffer the herald to come nere; for that he should not perceiue the weakenesse of the peece: and so he was commanded to get him thence with speed, or else they would cause him to be packing smallie to his case. The French king soe offended here with, that his herald was so vncourteouslie vied, caused the batterie to be reinforced with great diligence, which dismounting their ordinaunce within, and beating downe their rampiers, made such breaches, that my lord John and the capteins within perceiued they were not able by anie meanes to defend the place any longer. Wherevpon they offered to render the fort to the king vpon composition: which in the end fell out to be thus, that the souldiers should depart with their liues saued, and that the generall (for honor sake) should haue one horse to ride on in his cosset, without sword or dagger, and likewise two other capteins with him: but as for the other souldiers, with the women and children, should depart on foot in their shirts, leauing all their goods and substance behind them. After it was agreed that the fort should be thus surrendered, there entered monsieur de Chatillon that was after admerall of France, and monsieur de Delle, latelie returned out of Scotland. The French souldiers entring by stealth into the fort by the breaches, committed foule disorders, not onelie in ransacking the houses, but also in spoiling the souldiers by force, intreating them in most rigorous manner.

The French writers confesse, that it was pittie to see the poore men and women so miserable handled and abused as they were by the ontragious souldiers that thus entered the fort, and sacked all that they could laie hands vpon. Monsieur de Delle saued a great number of women and yong maidens from the cruell hands of their aduersaries, causing them to passe forth by the breach, and presented them to the king, who appointed that they should be conducted in safetie, with all that they had about them, till they had gotten out of danger. Monsieur de Chatillon, by the kings commandement, caused all the rest within the fort to come forth, who passing thre and thre in a range came before the king, who stood there to behold them, with the whole armie placed so in order on either side the waie as they should come, that they might passe betwixt their ranks, as it were through a lane. They that came forth in this fort might be (as the French writers record) about seven or eight hundred in all of men and women, wherof there were manie hurt and mained; some with halfe a shirt on to couer them, and diuerse stark naked. The lord John Greie being mounted on a curtaile, passing by the French king, and saluting him, was courteouslie of him embraced.

The morrow after was the fort of Blacknesse or Blaconnesse rendered to the French king, with like conditions as they of Hambleteuue had rendered theirs. This was on the tuesday the seven and twentieth of August. The nine and twentieth of August sir Nicholas Arnault conueieng all the artillerie, munition, vittels, and goods out of Bullongne berg, caused fire to be set on that fort, and retired with all his souldiers and other people vnto Bullongne. Wherevpon shortly after the Frenchmen seized vpon the said place of Bullongne berg, & kept it. The French king leauing monsieur de Chatillon within Hambleteuue with the old hands of the French footmen, returned towards Bullongne, & approaching within a mile and a halfe of the old man, meant to build there a fort on the sea side: but what through such sharpe skirmishes as the Englishmen continually were redie to make with his men, and what through the abundance of raine which fell in that season, he was constrained to breake by his campe, and leauing strong garrisons both of horsemen and footmen in all those places, which he had in that season wone out of the Englishmens hands, he returned himselfe with the princes of his blood into France.

In this meane time whilst the French king was thus occupied, to vse the oportunitie of time in recovering of those fortresses in Bullongnois out of the Englishmens hands, the kings maiestie and his counsell were busie still in quieting his rebellious subjects here in England: and finally for meane of a full pacification, and to set all things in good frame and quiet rest, the king published his graces most generall and free pardon to all rebelles, so that they would forthwith (vpon publication of the same pardon) returne euerie man to his house and countrey; which they gladlie did: and so these seditious and most dangerous troubles were brought to end and pacified.

Also in this busie time Marie Steward queene of Scots was conueied by sea out of Scotland into France, and there on the nineteenth daie of April 1549, was married in our ladie church in Paris (with great triumph and solemnitie) to Francis the Dolphin, eldest sonne vnto king Henrie the second of that name French king. This conueieng of the yong queene is reported by one to haue bene prouoked, at such time as the counsell of England were in some expectation and hope to obtaine hir. Nevertheless the subtiltie of the Scots, bitter and trecherous forwardnesse of the Scots, offerre lie disappointed the honest and honorable purpose of the English. Now when the yong queene and hir traine, with the gard of hir person (be they whom you will) were vnder saile, the English nauie was abroade, and lieng in wait to haue intercepted hir course, course, meant not onlie to sketm. g. but also to recouer the yong queene from the French in spite of their hearts, had not the king of England and the most of his counsell flatte forbidden them to attempt anie warlike incounter, for certeine iust and weightie causes to them knowne. But the Scots smarted for this their vaine lightnesse, as in former times for like practises of their vile lewdnesse, as C. O. sayth:

Sic lentior leui pluma promissa scotorum Infamem reddunt gentem, dant sanguine panas Perfidie quandoq. sua velut ante dederunt.

In this troublesome yere also Edmund Bonner bishop of London preached a sermon at Pauls croffe, for the which he was accus. bnto the counsell by William Latimer parson of saint Laurence Dountneie, and John Hoper sometime a white monke, and so conuented before the archbishop of Canturburie, and other commissioners at Lambeth, on the twentieth daie of that same moneth, and sent to the sparthalea. On the first of October he was deprived of his bishoprike, for disobeying the kings order in religion.]

Now after that these hurle burlies were through-lie quieted, manie of the lords of the realme, as well counsellors as other, mistaking the government of the protector, began to withdraw themselves from the court, and resorting to London, fell to secret consultation for redresse of things, but namelie for the displacing of the lord protector. And suddenlie upon what occasion manie marvelled, but few knew. C. uerie lord and counsellor went through the citie weaponed, and had their seruants likewise weaponed, attending upon them in new lineries, to the great wondering of manie. And at the last a great assemble of the said counsellors was made at the earle of Warwicks lodging, which was then at Elie place in Holborne, whither all the confederats in this matter came pynlie armed; and finally concluded to possesse the towne of London, which by the policie of sir William Paulet lord treasurer of England was peaceable obtained, & who by order of the said confederats immediatlie removed sir John Sparham then lieutenant of the towne, and placed in that rowe sir Leonard Chamberleine. And after that the said counsell was broken by at Elie place, the earle of Warwicke removed forthwith into the citie of London, and late in the house of one John Worke a citizen of London, who was then chiefe maister of the mint, kept at Suffolke place in Southwarke.
The lord protector hearing of the maner of the assemble of this counsell, and of the taking of the towne, which seemed to him verie strange and doubt-full, did presentlie the said night remove fro Hampton court, taking the king with him, unto the castell of Windsoze, and there began to fortifie the same, and withall wrote a letter to that noble gentleman the lord Russell lord priuie seale remaining as yet in the west countrie, aduertising him of these troubles as followeth.

A letter of the lord protectors to the lord Russell lord priuie seale, concerning troubles working against him.

After our right hartie commendations to your good lordship. Here hath of late risen such a conspiracie against the kings maiestie & vs, as neuer hath bene sene, the which they can not mainteine, with such vaine letters and false tales furnished, as was neuer ment nor intended on vs. They pretend and saie, that we haue sold Bullongne to the French, and that we do withhold wages from the soldiers, & other such tales and letters they do spread abroad (of the which if anie one thing were true, we would not toly to liue) the matter now being brought to a marvellous extre-mitie, such as we would neuer haue thought it could haue come vnto, especiallie of those men towards the kings maiestie and vs, of whome we haue deser-ued no such thing, but rather much fauour and loue.

But the case being as it is, this is to requyre & praise you, to hasten you hither to the defense of the kings maiestie, in such force and polver as you maie, to shew the part of a true gentleman, and of a verie friend: the which thing we trust God shall reward, and the kings maiestie in time to come, and we shall neuer be vnmindfull of it to. We are sure you shall haue other letters from them, but as ye tender your dutie to the kings maiestie, we requyre you to make no faie, but immediatlie repaire with such force as ye haue to his highnesse in his castell of Windsoz, and cause the rest of such force as ye maie make to follow you. And so we bid you right hartlie farewell. From Hampton court the first of October.

Your lordships assured loving friend Edward Summerset.

An answer to the lord protectors letter.

This letter of the lord protectors sent the first of October, the lord Russell returning answer againe vpon the eight of the said moneth, first lamented the heauie dissolution fallen betwene the nobilitie and him, which he toke for such a plague, as a greater could not be sent of almighty God vpon this realme being the next waie (said he) to make vs of conquerors, slaues; and like to induce vpon the whole realme an vniuersall thraldome and calamitie, vntil the mercifull godnesse of the Lord do helpe, and some wise order be taken in staing these great extreni-ties. And as touching the dukes request in his letters, so much as he had heard before of the boile of the lords, and feared least some conspiracie had bene meant against the kings person, he hastied forward with such companie as he could make, for the succie of the king as to him appertained. Now perceiving by the lords letters sent vnto him the same first daie of October, these tumults to rise vpon priuie causes betwene him and them, he therefore thought it expedient, that a conuenient polver should be leuied, to be in a readinesse to withstand the worst (what perils soeuer might insue) for the preservation both of the king and state of the realme from inuasion of forreyn enemies, and also for the staing of bloodshed, if anie such thing should be intended betwixt the parties in the heat of this faction. And this he thinking best for the discharge of his allegiance, humbly besought his grace to haue the same also in speciall regard and consideration; first, that the kings maiestie be put in no feare; and that if there be anie such thing, wherein he hath given iust cause to them thus to proceed, he would so conforme himselfe, as no such priuie quarrels do redound to the publike disturbance of the realme: certifieng moreouer the duke, that if it were true which he vnderstood by the letters of the lords, that he should send about proclamations and letters for raising vp of the commons, he liked not the same. Notwithstanding he trusted well that his wisdomme would take such a waie, as no effusion of blood should follow.

And thus much being contained in his forther letters the eight of October, in his next letters againe written the eleuenth of October, the said lord Russell reioysing to heare of the most reasonable offers of the lord protector made to the lords, wrote vnto him and promised to do, what in the uttermost power of him (and likewise of sir William Herbert joined together with him) did lie, to worke some honorable reconciliation betwene him & them: so as his said offers being accepted and satisfied, some good conclusion might insue, according to their god hope and expectation: signifieng moreover, that as touching the leueng of men, they had resolved to haue the same in readinesse for the benefit of the realme, to occurre all inconueniences whatsoeuer, that either by forren inuasion or otherwise might happen: & so hauing their power at hand to draw nere, wherby they might haue the better oportunitie to be solicitous and meanes for this reformation on both parts, &c. And thus much for the answer of the lord Russell to the lord protectors letters.

The lords of the council assembled against the lord protector.

But now to proceed and go forward with the matter of the lords, who together with the earle of Warwike (upon what occasion God knoweth) were assembled at London (as ye haue heard) against the lord protector. When the king with his council at Hampton court heard thereof, first secretarie Peter with the kings message was sent vnto them, whome the lords notwithstanding detained still with them, making as yet no answer to the message. Whereupon the lord protector wrote as followeth.

A letter of the lord protectors to the council at London.

The protectors letter to the lords.

MY lords we commend vs heartlie vnto you. And whereas the kings maiestie was informed that you were assembled in such sort as you do, and now remaine, and was aduised by vs and such other of his council as were then here about his person, to send master secretarie Peter vnto you with such a message, as whereby might haue insued the suertie of his maiesties person, with the preservation of his realme and subjects, and the quiet both of vs and your selues, as master secretarie can well declare to you: his maiestie and we of his council here do not a little maruell, that you staie still with you the said master secretarie, & haue not as it were vouchsafed to send answer to his maiestie, neither by him nor yet by anie other. And for our selues we do much more maruell and are sorie, as both we and you haue god cause to be, to see the manner of your doings bent with force of violence, to bring the kings maiestie & vs to these extremities.

No word hitherto sent from the lords to the lord protector what they required of him to do.

Which as we intend, if you will take no other waie but violence, to defend (as nature and allegiance doth bind vs) to extremitie of death, and to put all to Gods hand, who giueth victorie as it pleaseth him: so if that anie reasonable conditions & offers would take place (as hitherto none hath bene signified vnto vs from you, nor we do not vnderstand, what you do require or seeke, or what you do meane) and that you do seeke no hurt to the kings maiesties person, as touching all other priuat matters, to auoid the effusion of christian blood, and to preserve the kings maiesties person, his realme and subjects, you shall find vs agreeable vnto anie reasonable conditions that you will require. For we do esteeme the kings wealth and tranquillitie of the realme more than all other worldly things, yea than our owne life. Thus praieing you to send vs your determinate answer herein by master secretarie Peter, or if you will not let him go, by this bearer, we beseech God to giue both you and vs grace to determinate this matter, as maie be to Gods honor, the preservation of the king, and the quiet of vs all: which maie be, if the fault be not in you. And so we bid you most hartlie farewell. From the kings maiesties castell of Windsor the seuenth of October, 1549.

Your lordships loving friend Edward Summerson.

After the receipt of these letters, the lords seming not greatlie to regard the offers contayned therein, persisted in their intended purpose; and continuing still in London conferred with the maior of London and his brethren, first willing them to cause a god and substantiall watch by night, and a god ward by daie to be kept for the safeguard of the citie, and the ports and gates thereof: which was consented vnto, and the companies of London in their turnes warned to watch and ward accordingly. Then the said lords and counsellors demanded of the lord maior and his brethren five hundred men to aid them, to fetch the lord protector out of Windsor from the king. But therevnto the maior answered, that he could grant no aid without the assent of the common council of the citie: wherupon the next daie a common council was summoned to the Guildhall in London. But in this meane time the said lords of the council assembled themselves at the lord maiors house in London, who was then sir Henrie Amcotes fishmonger, and John Wolfe and Richard Turke shiriffes of the said citie. And there the said council agreed and published forthwith a proclamation against the lord protector, the effect of which proclamation was as followeth.

The lords continue in their intended purpose against the lord protector.

The council of the king enmit the lord protector.

George Sted the citizen of London maior sent order London be quiet and applye.

A proclamation on published against the lord protector.

- 1 That the lord protector, by his malicious and euill gouernement, was the occasion of all the sedition that of late hath happened within the realme.
- 2 The losse of the kings peaces in France.
- 3 That he was ambitious and sought his owne glorie, as appeared by his building of most sumptuous and costlie buildings, and speciallie in the time of the kings warres, and the kings soldiers vnpayed.
- 4 That he esteemed nothing the graue council of the counsellors.
- 5 That he sowed sedition betwene the nobles, the gentlemen, and commons.
- 6 That the nobles assembled themselves together at London, for none other purpose, but to haue caused the protector to haue liued within his limits, and to haue put such order for the kings maiestie as appertained, whatsoeuer the protectors doings were, which (as they said) were vnnaturall, ingrate, and traitorous.
- 7 That the protector flattered the council to the king, and did that in him late to cause variance betwene the king and his nobles.
- 8 That he was a great traitor, and therefore the lords desired the citie and commons to aid them to take him from the king. And in witnesse and testimony of the contents of the said proclamation the lords subscribed their names and titles as followeth.

The lord Rich lord chancellor, the lord S. John lord great maister and president of the council, the lord re. Juelle of Northampton, the earle of Warwike lord great chamberleine, the earle of Arundell lord chamberleine, the earle of Shrewsburie, the earle of Southampton Marquisse, sir Thomas Cheinie knight treasurer of the kings house and lord warden of the cinque ports, sir John Cage knight constable of the tower, sir William Peter knight secretarie, sir Edward North knight, sir Edward Montague cheife iustice of the common pleas, sir Rafe Sadler, sir John Baker, sir Edward Watton, doctor Whotton deane of Canturburie, sir Richard Southwell.

the time that the lord maioz and his brethren sat in their court or inner chamber, and entered and continued a long while with them, and at the last the maioz and his brethren came forth vnto the common counsell, where was read the kings letter sent vnto the maioz and citizens, commanding them to aid him with a thousand men, as hath maister Fox, and to send the same to his castell at Windsoze: and to the same letter was adioined the kings hand, and the lord protector. On the other side, by the mouth of the recorder it was requested, that the citizens would grant their aid rather vnto the lords: for that the protector had abused both the kings maiestie, and the whole realme, and without that he were taken from the king, made to vnderstand his follie, this realme was in a great hazard: and therefore required that the citizens would willingly assent to aid the lords with five hundred men: herevnto was none other answer made but silence. But the recorder (who at that time was a worthie gentleman called maister Brooke) still cried vpon them for answer.

At the last stepped by a wise and good citizen, named (as maister Fox saith) George Stablow, and said thus. In this case it is good for vs to thinke of things past to avoid the danger of things to come. I remember (saith he) in a storie written in Fabians chronicle, of the warre betwene the king and his barons, which was in the time of king Henrie the third, and the same time the barons (as our lords do now) commanded aid of the maioz and citie of London, and that in a rightfull cause for the common weale, which was for the execution of diuerse good lawes, wherevnto the king before had given his consent, and after would not suffer them to take place, and the citie did aid the lords. Now it came to an open battell, wherein the lords prevailed, and took the king and his sonne prisoners, and vpon certaine conditions the lords restored againe the king and his sonne to their liberties. And among all other conditions, this was one, that the king should not onlie grant his pardon to the lords, but also to the citizens of London, which was granted, yea and the same ratified by act of parlement. But what followed?

Was it forgotten? No surly, no; yet forgotten during the kings life. The liberties of the citie were taken awaie, strangers appointed to be our heads and gouernours, the citizens given awaie bodie and goods, and from one persecution to another were most miserably afflicted: such it is to enter into the wrath of a prince, as Salomon saith; The wrath and indignation of a prince is death. Wherefore forso much as this aid is required of the kings maiestie, whose voice we ought to hearken vnto (for he is our high shephard) rather than vnto the lords: and yet I would not wish the lords to be clearlie shaken off, but that they with vs, and we with them may loine in suite, and make our most humble petition to the kings maiestie, that it would please his highnesse, to heare such complaint against the gouernement of the lord protector as may be iustlie alledged and proued. And I doubt not but this matter will be so pacified, that neither shall the king nor yet the lords haue cause to seeke for further aid, neither we to offend any of them both. After this tale the commons staid, and the lord maioz and his brethren for that time brake vp, and after ward communed with the lords.

The lords sat the next daie in counsell in the Star chamber, and from thence they sent sir Philip Hobbie with their letters of credence to the kings maiestie, beseeching his highnesse to giue credit to that which the said Philip should declare vnto his maiestie in their names: the king gaue him libertie to speake, and most gentlie heard all that he had to saie. And truly he did so wiselie declare his message, and so grauelie told his tale in the name of the lords, yea therewithall so vehementlie and grauenouslie against the protector, who was also there present by the king, that in the end, the lord protector was commanded from the kings presence, and shortly was committed to ward in a tower within the castell of Windsoze called Beauchamps tower. And sone after were staied sir Thomas Smith, sir Michaell Stanhope, and sir John Thyn knights, maister Challeie, maister Fisher, Maister of the priuie chamber, Craie of Reading, and diuers other gentlemen that attended vpon the lord protector. And the same daie the lords of the counsell came to Windsoze to the king, and the next daie they brought from thence the lord protector, and the other that were there staied, and conueied them through the citie of London, with as much wonderment as might be, vnto the tower, where they remained prisoners.

Touching the manner of the dukes comming to the tower from Windsoze, I find that it was on the fourteenth of October in the after none, at which time he was brought on horsebacke through Holburne, in at Newgate, and so to the tower of London, accompanied with diuerse lords and gentlemen with three hundred horse: the lord maioz, sir Raife Warren, sir John Gresham, maister recorder, sir William Locke, and both the shiriffes, and other knights, sitting on their horses against Soper lane, with all the officers with halberds, and from Holburne bydage to the tower, certaine aldermen or their deputies on horsebacke in euerie street, with a number of householders standing with billes as he passed. Shortly after the lords refoited to the tower, and there charged the protector with sundrie articles, as followeth.

The lord protector committed to prison.

Abr. Fl. ex I. Stow, 1044.

The lord protector committed to the tower.

Articles obiected against the lord protector.

In primis, you toke vpon you the office of a protector and gouernour, vpon condition, expresselie and speciallie, that you would do nothing in the kings affaires publicke or priuatlie, but by the assent of the late kings executors.

2 Also you, contrarie to the said condition, of your owne authoritie, did staie and let iustice, and subuerted the lawes, as well by your letters as by your commandements.

3 Also you caused diuerse persons, being arrested and imprisoned for treason, murther, manslaughter and felonie, to be discharged and set at large, against the kings lawes and statutes of this realme.

4 Also you haue made and ordeined lieutenants for the kings armies, and other weightie affaires vnder your owne writing and seale.

5 Also you haue communed with the ambassadors of other realmes, discourting alone with them in the weightie causes of this realme.

6 Also you haue sometime rebuked, checked and talunted, as well priuatlie as openlie, diuerse of the kings most honorable counsellors, for shewing and declaring their aduises and opinions against your purposes in the kings weightie affaires, saleng sometimes to them, that you need not to open matters vnto them, and would therefore be otherwise aduised: and that you would, if they were not agreeable to your opinion, put them out, and take other at your pleasure.

7 Also you had and held against the law in your owne house, a court of requests, and thereby did enforce diuerse the kings subiects to answer for their free holds and goods, and determined the same to the subuer-

But now to returne to other doings. Whilſt theſe huris and tumults were in hand, to the danger of the whole ſtate, the wars againſt the Scots were nothing followed, according to the former purpoſed meaning of the counsell: ſo that it ſeemed neceſſarie to give over the keeping of Hadington, the ſame being in deed more chargeable (as was thought) than profitable, ſith the garrifon there could not be bitteled but with a great power to conduct the cariages in ſafetie, the enimies being ſtill readie to take their advantage to diſtreſſe them upon anie opportunitie offered. It was therefore reſolved, that the earle of Rutland ſhould go thither to ſee the fortifications raſed, and to conduct from thence the men & ordinance in ſafetie home into England. Whereupon the ſaid earle with the Almans, and other ſouldiours then remaining on the borders, marched thither, and cauſed the bulwarks, rampiers, and trenches to be raiſed and filled flat with the ground, and bringing from thence all the men, artillerie and munition, bag and baggage returned into Barwicke without encounter, in peaceable and quiet maner.

Shortlie after this, the kings maiestie called his high court of parlement, which began at Weſtmiſter, the foure and twentieth daie of November in this third yeare of his reigne, and there continued the ſame untill the firſt daie of Februarye next following, which was in the beginning of the fourth yeare of his reigne. And among other things there enacted and concluded, one ſtatute was made for the puniſhment of rebels, and unlawfull aſſemblies: the which law was made by occaſion of the late rebellion that happened in manner through the realme the yeare paſſed, & was not thought nor meant to have touched anie noble man, ſpeciallie ſuch as the duke of Sumnerſet was, which after (as it ſhall appeare) it did, and by that ſtatute he was condemned within two yeares next after.

The nineteenth of Januarye, ſir John Russell lord priſtue ſcale, was created earle of Bedford: and lord ſaint John Lord great maſter, was created earle of Wilſhire: and ſir William Paget, comptroller of the kings houſe, was made lord Paget. On the ſame daie at night, were murdered by ſaint Pauls church againſt the kings head without ſetwage of London two capteins, that had ſerved the king of Bullongne and elſe where, the one was ſir Peter Gambo, the other ſilicirga. Which murder was committed by Charles Gauaro a Flemming, who came poſſ from Barwicke to do that act. On the morrow, he with three of his companie was taken in Smithfield by the lord Paget, and ſent to ſetwage, and the foure and twentieth of Januarye they were all foure, Charles Gauaro, Balthazar Gauaro, Nicholas Diſalueron, and Francis Deuallaco, had in a cart to Smithfield. And by the waie at the place where the murder was done, Charles Gauaro had his right hand ſtricken off on the cart whele, and then all hanged in Smithfield; who being exhorted to reconcile himſelfe to God and the world by confeſſing his fault, by repenting himſelfe of the offense, and aſking forgiveness, that he might with a diſburthened conſcience reſigne his ſoule into the hands of God, obſtinacie and deſperacie answered, that he would neuer repent him of the deed.]

About the ſame time, monſieur de Thermes that ſucceeded monſieur de Weſſe in gouvernement as general of the French forces in Scotland, came before Broughtierag, where he did ſo much by batterie & other kinds of inſoſement, that giving an aſſault both with his Frenchmen and certeine Scots ſolned with him, the twentieth of Februarye, the fort was entered by ſine force, and all within it either taken or ſlaine. Sir John Lutterell gouvernour of that pece remained priſoner amongſt the Frenchmen. Moreover, now after the end of the parlement, the earle of Marlowe, having then higheſt authoritie, and the reſt of the lords of the counsell, calling to remembrance how the laſt yeare in the time of rebellion, the French king had entered Bullongnois, and waſone diuerſe of the Engliſh ſorts there, being of great importance for deſenſe of the towne and countrie, the deſault whereof was imputed to the negligent government of the lord protector: and for ſo much as they well underſtood that the French king upon further practice had placed a capteine called the Keingraue, with diuerſe regiments of Almaine lancequenets, and certeine enſignes alſo of Frenchmen, to the number of foure or five thouſand at the towne of Hoguifon, being the midwaie betwene Bullongne and Calis, to the great perill and danger as well of the countie of Bullongnois, as alſo of Calis, Guſnes, and all the low countrie.

The king therefore for the deſenſe of the ſaid frontiers, cauſed all the ſtrangers which had ſerved that yeare againſt the rebels, being to the number of two thouſand, to be tranſported ouer the ſea to the marches of Calis. And now at Chriſtmas laſt paſſ, by order of the ſaid earle, and of the counſellors aforeſaid, Francis earle of Huntington, and ſir Edward Hastings his brother, ſir James Croft, ſir Leonard Chamberleine, and diuerſe other capteins and ſouldiers, to the number of three thouſand, were ſet over to the marches of Calis, to ſoine with the ſaid ſtrangers, minding with as conuenient ſpeed as they might, to remove the campe, and otherwiſe to annoie the French. But in the meane time through the diligent trauell of certeine perſons, ſpeciallie of one Guidotti an Italian, and a Florentine bozne, there was a motion made for a treatie to be had by certeine commiſſioners, appointed betwixt the kings of England and France, for the concluſion of ſome peace, upon ſuch reaſonable conditions and articles as might be thought expedient for the preſent time; and to ſtand with the honor and commoditie of both the princes.

This motion toke ſuch effect, that about the ſeventh daie of Februarye, certeine commiſſioners, appointed for this treatie, that is to wit, John the earle of Bedford, the lord Paget, ſir William Peter the kings cheſe ſecretarie, and ſir John Paſon, arrived at Calis: by reaſon of whole coming, the earle of Huntington, and the armie ſent ouer before for the deſenſe of the frontiers were countermanded from anie attempt, ſo that little or nothing was done in that voiage, ſaving certeine ſkirmiſhes at diuerſe times, not much materiall to be witten of. Theſe commiſſioners being thus arrived, paſſed from Calis to Bullongne, there to meet with the commiſſioners appointed for the French king, where as a certeine houſe was newlie erected for the ſaid treatie to be had, which was upon the ſide of Bullongne haven next to France, where after diuerſe meetings & conferences of the commiſſioners of either partie, a ſmall peace was at laſt concluded betwixt both the realmes. But theſe among other things, for the reſtitution of Bullongne and Bullongnois to the Frenchmen, which were upon certeine conditions following.

Firſt, that the French king ſhould yeld and paie to the king of England a certeine ſumme of monie, and the ſame to be paid at two payments, as it was then agreed: and for the ſame ſumme the king of England ſhould render the towne of Bullongne, and all the forts thereto adjoining, which he then in-toied, with all such artillerie and munition as was there found at the taking of the same to the French king. And for the sure payment of the said sum, the French king sent into England for hostages and pledges, the counte de Anguicourt, Lewis the duke of Clansome his brother, the Vidame of Chartres, and the duke de Anmale and others. And on S. Parkes daie next following, being the five and twentieth daie of April, about eight of the clocke in the morning, the Englishmen did deliver to the Frenchmen the possession of Bullongne, and the castles and forts in the countie of Bullognois, according to the agreements and articles of peace afore mentioned. And the fifteenth daie next following the French king entered into the said towne of Bullongne with trumpets blowne, & with all the roiall triumph that might be, where he offered one great image of silver of our ladie in the church there, which was called our ladie church: the which image he had caused speciallie to be made in the honoz of the said ladie, and caused the same to be set up in the place where the like image before did stand, the which before was taken awaie by the Englishmen at the winning of the towne.

¶ On Candlemasse daie, William lord S. John earle of Willshire, lord great maister, and president of the counsell, was made lord treasurer. John Dudleie earle of Warwike, lord great chamberleine, was made lord great maister. William Parre marquess of Dorsethampton, was made lord great cham-berleine. Lord Wentworth was made lord cham-berleine of the household. Sir Anthoine Wingfield capitaine of the gard, was made comptrollor of the kings house. And sir Thomas Warcie knight, was made vicechamberleine & capitaine of the gard. And the earle of Arundell late lord chamberleine, with the earle of Southampton were put off the counsell, and commanded to keepe their houses in London.
¶ On the 10 of Februarie, one Well a Suffolke man was hanged and quartered at Tyburne, for moving a new rebellion in Suffolke and Essex. This time, the lord maiorz of London and the aldermen purchased all the liberties of Southwiche, which were in the kings hands.]

¶ Some after the aforesaid agreement betwene England and France was concluded, upon the fore-remembered capitulations, because of suspicion of displeasure and hatred that was thought to remaine betwene the earle of Warwike and the duke of Summerfet, latelie before delivered out of the tower, a meane was found that their friendship should be renewed through alliance, and a marriage was concluded betwene the earle of Warwikes eldest sonne, and the duke of Summerfets eldest daughter: the which marriage was solemnized at Shene, the king being then present. After the solemnitie of this marriage, there appeared outwardlie to the world great love and friendship betwene the duke and the earle, but by reason of carietales and flatterers, the love continued not long, howbeit manie did verie earnestlie wish love and amitie to continue betwene them. ¶ About this time was a new rebellion in Kent, but it was soon suppressed, and certeine of the chiefe were apprehended and put to death, namelie Richard Lion, Goddard Coxrain, and Richard Ireland. This yeare was a parlement holden at Westminster, where among other things by the authoritie of the said parlement, pzests children were made legitimate, and blurie for the loane of monie forbidden.]

¶ On wednesdaie in Whitsuneweke, at a court of aldermen kept at the Guildhall, sir John Aliske knight, and maister of Blackwell hall, was sworn alderman of the Bridge ward without, to have iurisdiction of the borough of Southwiche, and thus was he the first alderman that ever was there, who made up the number of six and twentie aldermen of London, whereas before that time had bene but five and twentie. ¶ Trinitie tearme was adourned till spichaelmasse, for that the gentlemen should keepe the commons from commotion. The cleventh of June being S. Barnabies daie, was kept hollidaie all London over: and the same daie at night, the high altar in Paules church was pulled downe, and a table set where the altar stood, with a veile drawne beneath the steps; and on the sondaie next a communion was song at the same table; and shortly after all the altars in London were taken downe, and tables placed in their rooms. This yeare was no such watch at Whitsunmer as had bene accustomed.

The thirtieth of Julie Thomas lord Wriothesleie erle of Southampton, knight of the garter, and one of the executors to king Henrie the eight, deceased at Lincoln place in Holborne, and was buried in S. Andzews church there. Sir Andzews Jude for this yeare maiorz of London, and Skinner, created one notable frechcole at Tunbridge in Kent, wherein he brought up and nourished in learning great store of youth, as well bred in that shire, as brought from other countries adjoining. A noble act and correspondent to those that have bene done by like worthifull men, and other in old time within the same citie of London. He also builded almshouses for six pore almshouse people, nigh to the parish church of saint Helens within Bishopsgate of London, a gaveland to the companie of the skinners in the same citie, amounting to the value of threescore pounds three shillings eight pence the yeare: for the which they be bound to paie twentie pounds to the scholemaister, and eight pounds to the vther of his frechcole at Tunbridge yearelie for ever, and foure shillings the weeke to the six pore almshouse people at S. Helens aforesaid, eight pence the pace weekelie, and five and twentie shillings foure pence the yeare in coles amongst them for ever.]

About this time there was at Feuerham in Kent a gentleman named Arden, most cruelle murdered and slaine by the procurement of his olone wife.
The which murder, for the horriblenesse thereof, although otherwise it may seeme to be but a private matter, and therefore as it were impertinent to this historie, I have thought good to set it forth somewhat at large, having the instructions delivered to me by them, that have used some diligence to gather the true understanding of the circumstances. This Arden was a man of a tall and comelie personage, and matched in marriage with a gentlewoman, young, tall, and well favoured of shape and countenance, who chancing to fall in familiaritie with one Apollie a tailor by occupation, a blacke swart man, servant to the lord Poze, it happened this Apollie upon some mislaking to fall out with hir: but the being desirous to be in favour with him againe, sent him a paire of silver dice by one Adam Foule dwelling at the Fleure de lice in Feuerham.

After which he resorted to hir againe, and oftentimes laie in Ardens house: in somuch that within two yeares after, he obtained such favour at hir hands, that he laie with hir, or (as the p. terme it) kept hir, in abusing hir bodie. And although (as it was said) Arden perceived right well their mutuall familiaritie to be much greater than their honestie, yet because he would not offend hir, and so lose the benefit which he hoped to gaine at some of hir fathers hands in bearing with hir lewenesse, which he might have lost if he should have fallen out with hir: he was contented to wink at hir filthie disorder, and both permitted, and also invited Apollie verie often to lodge in his house. And thus it continued a good space, before any practise was begun by them against master Arden. She at length inflamed in love with Posbie, and loathing his husband, wished and after practised the means how to hasten his end.

There was a painter dwelling in Feuertham, who had skill of poisons, as was reported. She therefore demanded of him, whether it were true that he had such skill in that feat or not: And he denied not but that he had indeed. Psea (said she) but I would have such a one made, as should have most vehement and speedie operation to dispatch the eater thereof. That can I do (quoth he) and forthwith made him such a one, and willed him to put it into the bottome of a porringer, & then after to pottle milke on it. Which circumstance she forgetting, did cleane contrarie, putting in the milke first; and afterward the poison. Now master Arden purposing that daie to ride to Canturburie, his wife brought him his breakefast, which was wont to be milke and butter. He having received a spoonfull or two of the milke, mistooke the taste and colour thereof, and said to his wife, mistresse Arden what milke have you given me here? Where-withall she tilted it over with her hand, saying, I weene nothing can please you. Then he took his horse and road towards Canturburie, and by the waie fell into extreme purging bywards and downewards, and so escaped for that time.

After this, his wife fell in acquaintance with one Græne of Feuertham, servant to sir Anthonie Arger, from which Græne master Arden had possessed a peece of ground on the backside of the abbete of Feuertham, and there had blowes and great threats passed betwixt them about that matter. Therefore she knowing that Græne hated his husband, began to practise with him how to make him a waie; and concluded, that if he could get any that would kill him, he should have ten pounds for a reward. This Græne having doings for his master sir Anthonie Arger, had occasion to go up to London, where his master then late, and having some charge up with him, desired one Bradshaw a goldsmith of Feuertham that was his neighbor, to accompany him to Grauesend, and he would content him for his pains. This Bradshaw, being a verie honest man, was content, and road with him. And when they came to Rainham downe, they chanced to see three or foure servingmen that were coming from Leeds: and therewith Bradshaw espied comming up the hill from Rochester, one blacke Will, a terrible cruell ruffian with a sword and a buckler, and an other with a great staffe on his necke.

Then said Bradshaw to Græne: We are happy that here cometh some companie from Leeds, for here cometh by against us as murdering a knave as any is in England: if it were not for them we might chance hardlie to escape without losse of our monie and livers. Psea thought Græne (as he after confessed) such a one is for my purpose, and therefore asked: Which is he? Ponder is he quoth Bradshaw, the same that hath the sword and buckler: his name is blacke Will. How know you that, said Græne? Bradshaw answered, I knew him at Bullongne, where we both served, he was a soldier, and I was sir Richard Cauendishes man, and there he committed manie robberies and heinous murders on such as travelled betwixt Bullongne and France.

By this time the other companie of servingmen came to them, and they going all together, met with blacke Will and his fellow. The servingmen knew blacke Will, & saluting him, demanded of him whether he went: He answered, By his blood (for his life was to sweare almost at euery word) I know not, nor care not, but set by my staffe, and such as it fall leth I go. If thou (quoth they) wilt go backe againe to Grauesend, we will giue thee thy supper. By his blood (said he) I care not, I am content, haue with you: and so he returned againe with them. When blacke Will took acquaintance of Bradshaw, saying, fellow Bradshaw how dost thou? Bradshaw unwilling to renew acquaintance, or to haue ought to do with so shameles a ruffian, said: Why doe ye know me? Psea that I do (quoth he) did not we serue in Bullongne together? But ye must pardon me (quoth Bradshaw) for I haue forgotten you.

Then Græne talked with blacke Will, and said: When ye haue supped, come to mine hosts house at such a signe, and I will giue you the sacke and sugar. By his blood (said he) I thanke you, I will come and take it I warrant you. According to his promise he came, and there they made good cheare. Then blacke Will & Græne went and talked apart from Bradshaw, and there concluded together, that if he would kill master Arden, he should haue ten pounds for his labor. Then he answered, By his wounds that I will if I maie know him. Psea to morrow in Poules I will shew him thee, said Græne. Then they left their talke, & Græne bad him go home to his hosts house. Then Græne wrote a letter to mistresse Arden, & among other things put in these words: We haue got a man for our purpose, we maie thanke my brother Bradshaw. Now Bradshaw not knowing any thing of this, took the letter of him, and in the morning departed home againe, and deliuered the letter to mistresse Arden, and Græne & blacke Will went by to London at the tide.

At the time appointed, Græne shewed blacke Will master Arden walking in Poules. Then said blacke Will, what is he that goeth after him? Psea said Græne, one of his men. By his blood (said blacke Will) I will kill them both. Psea (said Græne) do not so, for he is of counsell with us in this matter. By his blood (said he) I care not for that, I will kill them both. Psea said Græne in any wise do not so. Then blacke Will thought to haue killed master Arden in Poules churchyard, but there were so manie gentle men that accompanied him to dinner, that he mistook of his purpose. Græne shewed all this talke to master Ardens man, whose name was Michaele, which euer after stood in doubt of blacke Will, lest he should kill him. The cause that this Michaele conspired with the rest against his master, was: for that it was determined, that he should marrie a kinswoman of Posbies.

After this, master Arden late at a certeine parsonage which he held in London, and therefore his man Michaele and Græne agreed, that blacke Will should come in the night to the parsonage, where he should find the doores left open, that he might come in and murder master Arden. This Michaele having his master to bed, left open the doores according to the appointment. His master then being in bed, asked him if he had shut fast the doores, and he said yea: but yet afterwards, fearing lest blacke Will would kill him as well as his master, after he was in bed himselfe, he rose againe and shut the doores, bolting them fast. So that blacke Will coming thither, and finding the doores shut, departed, being disappointed at that time. The next daie blacke Will came to Græne in a great chafe, swearing and flaring because he was so deceived, and with manie terrible oaths threatened to kill master Ardens man first, whereouer he met him. No (said Græne) do not so, I will first know the cause of quitting the doores.

Then Græne met and talked with Ardens man, and asked of him, why he did not leaue open the doores, according to his promise: Psea (said Michaele) I will shew you the cause. My maister yesternight did that he neuer did before: for after I was in bed, he rose up and shut the doores, and in the morning rated me for leauing them vnshut. And herewith Greene & blacke Will were pacified. Arden being redie to go home wards, his maid came to Greene & said; This night will my maister go downe. Whereupon it was agreed that blacke Will should kill him on Reineam downe. When maister Arden came to Rochester, his man still fearing that blacke Will would kill him with his maister, picked his horse of purpose, and made him to halt, to the end he might protrae the time, and tarie behind. His maister asked him why his horse halted, he said, I know not. Well (quoth his maister) when ye come at the smith here before (betwene Rochester and the hill foot ouer against Chetam) remoue his shoe, and searh him, and then come after me. So maister Arden rode on: and per he came at the place where blacke Will laie in wait for him, there ouertoke him diuerse gentlemen of his acquaintance, who kept him companie: so that blacke Will mist here also of his purpose.

After that maister Arden was come home, he sent (as he vsuallie did) his man to Sheprie to sir Thomas Cheinie, then lord warden of the cinque ports, about certeine businesse, and at his comming awaie, he had a letter deliuered sent by sir Thomas Cheinie to his maister. When he came home, his mistresse toke the letter and kept it, willing her man to tell his maister, that he had a letter deliuered him by sir Thomas Cheinie, and that he had lost it, adding that he thought it best that his maister should go the next morning to sir Thomas, because he knew not the matter: he said he would, and therefore he willed his man to be stirring betimes. In this meane while, blacke Will, and one George Shakesbag his companion, were kept in a storehouse of sir Anthoine Agers at Dzeffon, by Greene's appointment: and thither came mistresse Arden to see him, bringing and senting him meat and drinke manie times. He therfore lurking there, and watching some opportunitie for his purpose, was willed in anie wise to be vp early in the morning, to lie in wait for maister Arden in a certeine brome close, betwixt Feuertham & the ferrie (which close he must needs passe) there to doe his feat. Now blacke Will stirred in the morning betimes, but mist the waie, & taried in a wrong place.

Maister Arden & his man comming on their waie early in the morning towards Shorneham, where sir Thomas Cheinie laie: as they were almost come to the brome close, his man alwaies fearing that blacke Will would kill him with his maister, feined that he had lost his purse; Why said his maister, thou folly knaue, couldst thou not looke to thy purse but lose it? What was in it? Whye pounds said he. Why then go thy waies backe againe like a knaue (said his maister) and seeke it, for being so earlie as it is, there is no man stirring, and therefore thou maist be sure to find it, and then conie and ouertake me at the ferrie. But neuerthelesse, by reason that blacke Will lost his way, maister Arden escaped yet once againe.
At that time, blacke Will yet thought he should haue bene sure to haue met him homewards: but whether that some of the lord wardens men accompanied him backe to Feuertham, or that being in doubt, for that it was late to go through the brome close, and therefore toke another waie, blacke Will was disappointed then also.

But now saint Valentines faire being at hand, the conspirators thought to dispatch their diuclish intention at that time. Spobie minded to picke some quarrell to maister Arden at the faire to fight with him; for he said he could not find in his heart to mur-ther a gentleman in that sort as his wife wished: although he had made a solemne promise to him, and he againe to him, to be in all points as man and wife together, and thereupon they both receiued the sacrament on a sundaie at London, openlie in a church there. But this deuile to fight with him would not serue, for maister Arden both then and at other times had bene greatlie prouoked by Spobie to fight with him, but he would not. Now Spobie had a sister that dwelt in a tenement of maister Ardens nere to his house in Feuertham: and on the faire euen, blacke Will was sent for to come thither, and Greene bin-ging him thither, met there with mistresse Arden, accompanied with Michaelel her man, and one of her maids. There were also Spobie and George Shakes-bag, and there they deuised to haue killed him in maner as after wards he was. But yet Spobie at the first would not agree to that cowardlie murdering of him, but in a furie slong awaie, and went by the abbie street toward the Solwer be lice, the house of the aforesaid Adam Froule, where he did often hoft. But before he came thither now at this time, a messenger ouertoke him, that was sent from mi-stres Arden, desiring him of all loues to come backe againe to helpe to accomplish the mater he knew of.

Whereupon he returned to his againe, and at his com-ming backe, he fell downe upon his knees to him, and besought him to go through with the matter, as if he loved him he would be content to doe, with as the had diuerse times told him, he needed not to doubt, for there was not anie that would care for his death, nor make anie great inquirie for them that should dispatch him.

Thus he being earnest with him, at length he was contented to agree vnto that horrible deuile, and thereupon they conueied blacke Will into maister Ardens house, putting him into a closet at the end of his parlour. Before this, they had sent out of the house all the seruants, those excepted which were pruiue to the deuised murder. Then went Spobie to the doze, and there stood in a night gowne of silke gir-ded about him, and this was betwixt six and seven of the clocke at night. Maister Arden hauing bene at a neighbors house of his, named Dumphin, & hauing cleared certeine reckonings betwixt them, came home: and finding Spobie standing at the doze, asked him if it were supper time: I thinke not (quoth Spobie) it is not yet readie. Then let vs go and plaie a game at the tables in the meane season, said maister Arden. And so they went straight into the parloand as they came by through the hall, his wife was walking there, and maister Arden said; How now mistresse Ales? But she made small answer to him.
In the meane time one cheined the wicked doze of the entrie. When they came into the parloz, Spobie sat downe on the bench, hauing his face toward the place where blacke Will stood. When Michaelel maister Ardens man stood at his masters backe, holding a candle in his hand, to shadow blacke Will, that Arden might by no meanes perceiue him comming forth. In their plate Spobie said thus (which seemed to be the watchword for blacke Wills comming forth) Now mate I take you sir if I will. Take me (quoth maister Arden) which waie? With that blacke Will slept forth, and cast a towell about his necke, so to stop his breath and strangle him. Then Spobie hauing at his girdle a pressing iron of fourteen pounds weight, stroke him on the hed with the same, so that he fell downe, and gaue a great grone, insa-much that they thought he had bene killed.

Then they bare him awaie, to laie him in the counting house, & as they were about to laie him downe, Arden saie the pangs of death comming on him, he gaue a great grone, and stretched himselfe, and then blacke Will gaue him a great gash in the face, and so killed him out of hand, laid him along, toke the monie out of his purse, and the rings from his fingers, and then comming out of the counting house, said; Now the feat is done, give me my monie. So mistres Arden gaue him ten pounds: and he comming to Grene, had a horse of him, and so rode his waies. After that blacke Will was gone, mistresse Arden came into the counting house, and with a knife gaue him seven or eight picks into the brest. Then they made cleane the parlor, toke a clout, and wiped where it was bloudie, and strewed againe the rushes that were thrust with struggling, and cast the clout with which they wiped the blood, and the knife that was bloudie, wherewith she had wounded hir husband, into a tub by the wel side; where afterwards both the same clout and knife were found. Thus this wicked woman, with hir complices, most shamefullie murdered hir owne husband, who most entirly loved hir all his life time. When she sent for two Londoners to supper, the one named Paine, and the other Cole, that were grocers, which before the murder was committed, were bidden to supper. When they came, she said: I maruell where maister Arden is; he will not tarie for him, come ye and sit downe, for he will not be long. Then Possibies sister was sent for, she came and sat downe, and so they were merie.

After supper, mistres Arden caused hir daughter to plaie on the virginals, and they dancied, and she with them, and so seemed to protract time as it were, till maister Arden should come, and she said, I maruell where he is so long; well, he will come anon I am sure, I praie you in the meane while let vs plaie a game at the tables. But the Londoners said, they must go to their holls house, or else they should be shut out at doores, and so taking their leaue, departed. When they were gone, the seruants that were not psside to the murder, were sent abroad into the towne; some to seeke their maister, and some of other errands, all sauing Michaell and a maid, Possibies sister, and one of mistres Ardens owne daughters. When they toke the dead bodie, and caried it out, to laie it in a field next to the church-yard, and so coming to his garden wall, through the which he went to the church. In the meane time it began to snow, and when they came to the garden gate, they remembered that they had forgotten the key, and one went in for it, and finding it, at length brought it, opened the gate, and caried the corps into the same field, as it were ten pases from the garden gate, and laid him downe on his backe streight in his night gowne, with his slippers on: and betwene one of his slippers and his foot, a long rush or two remained. When they had thus laid him downe, they returned the same way they came through the garden into the house.

They being returned thus backe againe into the house, the doores were opened, and the seruants returned home that had bene sent abroad: and being now verie late, she sent forth hir folks againe to make inqurie for him in diuerse places; namely, among the best in the towne where he was wont to be, who made answer, that they could tell nothing of him. When she began to make an outcrie, and said; Fewer woman had such neighbors as I haue, and herewith wept: in somuch that hir neighbors came in, and found hir making great lamentation, pretending to maruell what was become of hir husband. Whereupon, the maior and others came to make search for him. The satire was wont to be kept partlie in the towne, and partlie in the abbey; but Arden for his owne priuat lucre & couetous gaine had this present yeare procured it to be wholie kept within the abbey ground which he had purchased; & so reaping all the gaires to himselfe, and breauing the towne of that portion which was wont to come to the inhabitants, got manie a bitter curse. The maior going about the satire in this search, at length came to the ground where Arden laie: and as it happened, Paine the groser getting sight of him, first said; Staie, for me thinke I see one lie here. And so they looking and beholding the bodie, found that it was maister Arden, lieng there throughlie dead, and viewing diligentlie the maner of his bodie & hurts, found the rushes sticking in his slippers, and marking further, espied certeine footsteps, by reason of the snow, betwixt the place where he laie, and the garden doze.

When the maior commanded euerie man to staie, and herewith appointed some to go about, & to come in at the inner side of the house through the garden as the waie laie, to the place where maister Ardens dead bodie did lie; who all the waie as they came, perceived footings still before them in the snow: and so it appeared plainlie that he was brought along that waie from the house through the garden, and so into the field where he laie. When the maior and his companie that were with him went into the house, and knowing hir euill demeanour in times past, examined hir of the matter: but she desired them and said, I would you should know I am no such woman. Then they examined hir seruants, and in the examination, by reason of a peece of his heare and blood found nere to the house in the waie, by the which they caried him forth, and likewise by the knife with which he had thrust him into the brest, and the clout wherewith they wiped the blood awaie which they found in the tub, into the which the same were thrown; they all confessed the matter, and hir selfe beholding hir husbands blood, said; Oh the blood of God helpe, for this blood haue I shed.

Then were they all attached, and committed to prison, and the maior with others went presentlie to the flower de lise, where they found Possibie in bed: and as they came towards him, they espied his hose and purse stained with some of maister Ardens blood. And when he asked what they meant by their comming in such sort, they said; See, here ye may vnderstand wherefore, by these tokens, shewing him the blood on his hose and purse. Then he confessed the deed, and so he and all the other that had conspired the murder, were apprehended and laid in prison, except Grene, blacke Will, and the painter, which painter and George Shakebag, that was also fled before, were neuer heard of. Shortlie were the sessions kept at Feuerham, where all the prisoners were acceigned and condemned. And thereupon being examined whether they had anie other complices, mistres Arden accused Bradshaw, upon occasion of the letter sent by Grene from Grene end, (as before ye haue heard) which words had none other meaning, but onelie by Bradshaws describing of blacke Wills qualities; Grene iudged him a mate instrument for the erection of their pretended murder. Where to notwithstanding (as Grene confessed at his death certeine yeares after) this Bradshaw was neuer made priuie; howbeit he was vpon this accusation of mistres Arden, immediately sent for to the sessions, and indicted, and declaration made against him, as a procurer of blacke Will to kill maister Arden, which proceeded wholie by misunderstanding of the words contained in the letter which he brought from Grene.

When he desired to talke with the persons condemned, and his request was granted. He therefore demanded of them if they knew him, or ever had anie conuersation with him, & they all said no. Then the letter being shewed and read, he declared the be-rie truth of the matter, and vpon what occasion he told Cræne of blacke Will: neuertheless, he was condemned, and suffered. These condemned persons were diuerlie executed in sundrie places, for Michaele maister Ardens man was hanged in chaires at Feuertham, and one of the maids was burnt there, pitifullie bewailing hir case, and cried out on hir mistres that had brought hir to this end, for the which she would neuer forgive hir. Posbie & his sister were hanged in Smithfield at London; mistres Arden was burned at Canturburie the foure and twentieth of March. Cræne came againe certeine yeares after, was apprehended, condemned, & hanged in chaires in the high waie betwixt Woking & Woughton against Feuertham; blacke Will was burnt on a scaffold at flashing in Ze-land. Adam Foule that dwelt at the house de lice in Feuertham was brought into trouble about this matter, and caried vpon to London, with his legs bound vnder the horse bellie, and committed to prison in the Sparthallie: for that Posbie was heard to saie; Had it not bene for Adam Foule, I had not come to this trouble: meaning that the bringing of the silver dice for a token to him from mistres Arden, as ye haue heard, occasioned him to renew familiaritie with hir againe. But when the matter was thoughtlie ripped vp, & that Posbie had cleared him, protesting that he was neuer of knowledge in anie behalfe to the murder, the mans innocencie preferred him.

This one thing seemeth verie strange and notable, touching maister Arden, that in the place where he was laid, being dead, all the propotion of his bodie might be seene two yeares after and more, so plaine as could be, for the grasse did not grow where his bodie had touched: but betwene his legs, betwene his armes, and about the hollownesse of his necke, and round about his bodie, and where his legs, armes, head, or anie other part of his bodie had touched, no grasse growed at all of all that time. So that manie strangers came in that meane time, beside the towne men, to see the print of his bodie there on the ground in that field. Which field he had (as some haue reported) most cruellie taken from a woman, that had bene a widow to one Coke, and after married to one Richard Kead a mariner, to the great hinderance of hir and hir husband the said Kead: for they had long inioied it by a lease, which they had of it for manie yeares, not then expired: neuertheless, he got it from them. For the which, the said Keads wife not onelie exclaimed against him, in sheading manie a salt teare, but also cursed him most bitterlie euen to his face, wishing manie a vengeance to light vpon him, and that all the world might wonder on him. Which was thought then to come to passe, when he was thus murdered, and laie in that field from midnight till the morning: and so all that daie, being the faire daie till night, all the which daie there were manie hundreds of people came wondering about him. And thus far touching this horrible and heinous murder of maister Arden. To returne then where we left.

About this time the kings maiestie calling his high court of parliament, held the same at Westminster the three and twentieth daie of Januarie, in this fift yeare of his reigne, and there continued it, untill the fiftenth daie of Aprill in the first yeare of his said reigne. In this parlement the booke of common praier, which in some part had bene corrected and amended, was newlie confirmed & established. In the end of this parlement, namelie the fiftenth of Aprill the infectious sweating sickness began at Shrewesburie, which ended not in the north part of England untill the end of September. In this space what number died, it cannot be well accounted: but certeine it is, that in London in few daies nine hundred and sixtie gaue vpon the ghost. It began in London the ninth of Iulie, and the twelfth of Iulie it was most vehement: which was so terrible, that people being in best helth, were suddenly taken, and dead in foure and twentieth houres, and twelue, or lesse, for lacke of skill in guiding them in their sweat. And it is to be noted, that this mortalitie fell chiefly: or rather vpon men, and those also of the best age, as betwene thirtie & fortie yeares. The speedie riddance of life procured by this sickness, did so terrifie people of all sorts, that such as could make thist, either with monie or frendship, changed their soile, and leaving places of concourse, betooke them (for the time) to abodes, though not altogether solitarie, yet lesse frequented: to conclude, manifold meanes were made for safetie of life. The first weeke died in London eight hundred persons.

The manner of this sweat was such, that if men did take anie cold outwardlie, it stroke the sweat in, and immediatlie killed them. If they were suffered to sleepe, commonlie they swoned in their sleepe and departed, or else died immediatlie vpon their waking. But the waie to escape danger was close keeping moderatlie with some ale and a little drinke, and the same to be posset-ale, and so to keepe them thirtie houres, & then was the danger past; but beware of sudden cold. Before men had learned the manner of keeping, an infinit number perished. This disease at that time followed Englishmen & none other nation; for in Antwerpe and other countries, our Englishmen being there amongst diuerse other nations, onelie our Englishmen were sicke thereof, and none other persons. The consideration of which thing made this nation much afraid thereof, who for the time began to repent and giue almes, and to remember God from whom that plague might well seeme to be sent among vs. But as the disease in time ceased, so our deuotion in that time decayed. At this time also the king with the aduise of his priuite counsell, and hauing also great conference with merchants and others, perceiuing that by such coins and copper monies, as had bene coined in the time of the king his father, and now were commonlie currant in the realme; and indeed a great number of them not worth halfe the value that they were currant at, to the great dishonor of the kings maiestie & the realme, and to the deceit & no little hinderance of all the kings maiesties good subiects, did now purpose not onelie the abasing of the said copper monies, but also meant wholie to reduce them into bullion, to the intent to deliuer fine and good monies for them. And therefore in the moneth of Iulie by his graces proclamation, he abased the peece of twelue pence, commonlie called a teston vnto nine pence, and the peece of foure pence vnto thre pence. And in August next following, the peece of nine pence was abased to six pence, and the peece of thre pence vnto two pence, and the pennie to an halfe pennie.

On the eleuenth daie of October, there was a great creation of dukes and earles, as the lord marquisse Dorset was created duke of Suffolke, the earle of Warwicke made duke of Northumberland, and the earle of Wilshire made marquisse of Winchester, & sir William Herbert maister of the hoshes; he also made William Cicill his secretarie knight, maister John Cheke one of his scholemaisters knight, maister Henrie Dudlie knight, & maister Henrie Heuill knight. The sixteenth daie of the said moneth being fridaie, the duke of Summerlet was againe apprehended, & his wife also, & committed to the tower; with him also were committed sir Michaele Stanhope,

Stanhope, Sir Thomas Arundell, Sir Kase Wane, Sir Giles Bartrige & other for suspicion of treason and felonie, whereof they were all thought after indicted.
And so standing indicted, the second daie of December next following, the said duke was brought out of the tower of London with the ar of the tower borne before him, with a great number of billes, gleaves, halberds & pollaxes attending upon him, & so came into the Minster hall, where was made in the middle of the hall a new scaffold, where all the lords of the kings counsell sate as his judges: and there was he arraigned and charged with manie articles both of felonie and treason. And when after much mild speech he had answered not guiltie, he in all humble manner put himselfe to be tried by his peeres: who after long consultation among themselues, gave their verdict that he was not guiltie of the treason, but of the felonie. The people there present (which was a great number) hearing the lords saie not guiltie, which was to the treason, thinking most certeinlie that he was cleerlie acquitted; and chiefly for that immediatlie upon the pronouncing of those words, he that carried the ar of the tower departed with the ar, they made such an outcrie and ioie, as the like hath not bene heard. Which was an evident declaration of their good willes and hartie favors unto him, whose life they greatlie desired to have saved, for that he had deserved right well of most (though the good gentleman had some privat e-nities) and had bene as a man made iustlie saie:

solamen magnum patrie, solamen amicis.

But neuertheless, he was condemned to the death, whereof shortly after he tasted. The felonie that he was condemned of, was upon the statute made the last yeare against rebelles, and unlawfull assemblies, wherein amongst other things is one branch, that whosoever shall procure the death of anie counsellor, that enerie such attempt or procurement shall be felonie. And by force of that statute, the duke of Summerfet, being accompanied with cer-teine others, was charged that he purposed and attempted the death of the duke of Northumberland, the lord marquisse, the lord of Penbroke, and others of the privie counsell, which by statute was felonie.

After the duke was thus condemned, he was again returned to the tower, and landed at the crane of the vinetree, and so passed through London, where were both exclamations: the one cried for ioie that he was acquitted, the other cried out that he was condemned. But howsoever they cried, he was convicted to the tower of London, where he remained untill the two and twentieth daie of Januarie next following. The duke being condemned (as is aforesaid) the people spake diuerslie, and murmured against the duke of Northumberland, and against some other of the lords, for the condemnation of the said duke: and also (as the common fame went) the kings maiestie took it not in good part. Wherefore as well to remove fond talke out of mens mouths, as also to recreate and refresh the troubled spirits of the young king; who (as saith Grafton) seemed to take the trouble of his uncle somewhat heavilie: it was devised, that the feast of Christs nativitie, com-monlie called Christmasse then at hand, should be solemnlie kept at Greenwich with open household, and franke resort to court (which is called keeping of the hall) what time of old ordinarie course there is alwaies one appointed to make sport in the office, called commonlie lord of misrule: whose office is not unknowne to such as have bene brought up in noble mens houses, and among great house-keepers, which be liberrall feasting in that season. There was therefore by order of the counsell, a wise gentleman & learned named George Ferrers, appointed to that office for this yeare; who being of better credit & estimation than commonlie his predecessors had bene before, received all his commissions and warrants by the name of the maister of the kings pastimes: Which gentleman so well supplied his office, both in the way of sundrie sights and deuises of rare inuentions, and in act of diuerse interludes, and matters of pastime played by persons, as not onelie satisfied the common sort, but also were verie well liked and allowed by the counsell, and other of skill in the like pastimes: but best of all by the young king himselfe, as appeared by his princelie liberalitie in rewarding that seruice.

¶ On mondaie the fourth of Januarie, the said lord of merie disposits came by water to London, and landed at the tower wharffe, entered the tower, and then rode through tower street, where he was received by Maister lord of misrule to John Paitard one of the Sherriffes of London, and so conducted through the citie with a great compaignie of young lords & gentlemen to the house of Sir George Warne lord maior, where he with the chefe of his compaignie dined, and after had a great banquet: and at his departure, the lord maior gave him a standing cup with a couer of silver and guilt of the value of ten pounds for a reward, and also set a hogstied of wine, and a barrell of beere at his gate, for his traine that followed him. The residue of his gentlemen & ser-uants dined at other aldermens houses, and with the Sherriffes, and then departed to the tower wharffe again, & so to the court by water, to the great commendation of the maior and aldermen, and highlie accepted of the king and counsell.]

This Christmas being thus passed and spent with much mirth and pastime, wherewith the minds and eares of murmurers were metlie well appeased, according to a former determination as the sequele shewed: it was thought now good to proceed to the execution of the iudgement given against the duke of Summerfet, touching his consulation & atteindor of the felonie before mentioned. Whereupon, the two and twentieth daie of Januarie, then next following being fridaie, he was brought out of the tower, and according to the manner, deliuered to the Sherriffes of London; and so with a great compa-nie of the gard & others with weapons, was brought to the scaffold where he should suffer, without changing either voice or countenance, other than he was accustomed to use at other times.

The same morning earlie, the constables of e-uerie ward in London (according to a pcept directed from the counsell to the maior) stricke charged euerie household of the same citie, not to depart anie of them out of their houses, before ten of the clocke of that daie: meaning thereby to restraine the great number of people that otherwise were like to have ben at the said execution. Notwithstanding, by seauen of the clocke, the tower hill was covered with a great multitude, repairing from all parts of the ci-tie, as well as out of the suburbs. And before eight of the clocke, the duke was brought to the scaffold, inclosed with the kings gard, the Sherriffes officers, the warders of the tower, & other with halberds: where as he nothing changing neither voice or countenance, but in a manner with the same gesture which he commonlie used at home, kneeling downe upon both his knees, and lifting up his hands, commended himselfe unto God. After he had ended a few short prayers, standing up againe, and turning himselfe toward the east side of the scaffold, nothing at all a-bash'd (as it seemed vnto those that stood by) heisset with the sight of the ar, neither pet of the hangman, nor of present death, but with the like alacritie and cheerfulness of mind and countenance as before times

times he was accustomed to heare the causes & supplications of other, & speciallie of the poore (towards whome as it were with a certeine fatherlie loue to his children he alwaies shewed himselfe most attentive) he bitered these words to the people.

The words of the duke of Summerfet at his death.

Derelie beloued friends, I am brought hither to suffer death, albeit I neuer offended against the king, neither by word nor deed, and haue bene alwaies as faithfull and true vnto this realme, as anie man hath bene. But forsomuch as I am by law condemned to die, I do acknowledge my selfe as well as others, to be subiect thereto. Wherefore to testifie mine obedience which I owe vnto the lawes, I am come hither to suffer death, wherevnto I willingly offer my selfe with most hartie thanks vnto God, that hath giuen me this time of repentance, who might thorough sudden death haue taken awaie my life, that I neither should haue acknowledged him nor my selfe.

Whereouer (derelie beloued friends) there is yet somewhat that I must put you in mind of, as touching christian religion, which so long as I was in authoritie, I alwaies diligentlie set forth, and furthered to my power. Neither do I repent me of my doings, but reioise therein, with now the state of christian religion commeth most nere vnto the forme and order of the primitive church. Which thing I esteeme as a great benefit giuen of God, both to you and me, most hartlie exhorting you all, that this which is most purelie set forth vnto you, you will with like thankfulness accept and embrace, and set out the same in your living: which thing if you do not, without doubt, greater mischief and calamitie will follow.

When he had spoken these words, suddenlie there was a great noise heard, whereupon the people were straight dizen into a great feare, few or none knowing the cause. Wherefore I thinke it good to write what I saw (saith John Stow) concerning that matter. The people of a certeine hamlet which were warned to be there by sauen of the clocke to giue their attendance on the lieutenant, now came thorough the posterne, and perceiuing the duke to be already on the scaffold, the foremost began to run, crying to their fellows to follow fast after. Which suddenness of these men, being weaponed with bills and halberds, & this running caused the people which first saw them, to thinke some power had come to haue rescued the duke from execution, and therefore cried awaie awaie. Whereupon the people ran, some one waie, some an other, manie fell into the tower ditch, and they which tarried, thought some pardon had bene brought: some said it thundered, some that the ground moued, but there was no such matter.

This amazement of the people is in other words recorded by John Fox in the storie of this dukes troubles & death: which because they be effectually I thinke good to interlace. When the duke had ended his speech (saith he) suddenlie there was a terrible noise heard:

whereupon there came a great feare on all men. This noise was as it had bene the noise of a great storme or tempest, which to some seemed to be heard from a boue: like as if a great deale of gunpowder being inclosed in an armorie, and hauing caught fire, had violently broken out. But to some againe it seemed as though it had bene a great multitude of hostes men running together, or comming vpon them; such a noise was then in the eares of all men, albeit they saw nothing. Whereby it happened, that all the people being amazed without any evident cause, and without any violence or stroke stricken, they ran awaie, some into the ditches and puddles, they ran awaie, some into the houses thereabout. Other some being affraid with the horour and noise, fell downe groveling vnto the ground with their pollaxes & halberds, and most part of them cried out: Iesus saue vs, Iesus saue vs. Those which tarried still in their places, for feare knew not where they were. And I myselfe which was there present among the rest, being also affraid in this hurle burle, stood still altogether amazed, looking when anie man would knocke me on the head. It happened here, as the euangelists write, it did to Christ, when the officers of the high priests & Phariseis comming with weapons to take him, being astonished ran backe, & fell to the ground.

In the meane time, whilst these things were thus in doing, the people by chance spied one sir Anthonie Wrothorne riding vnto the scaffold: which was the occasion of a new noise. For when they saw him comming, they coniectured that which was not true, but notwithstanding which they all wished for, that the king by that messenger had sent his vncke pardon: and therefore with great reioicing and casting by the caps, they cried out; Pardon, pardon is come: God saue the king. Thus this good duke, although he was destitute of all mans helpe, yet he saw before his departure, in how great loue and fauour he was with all men. And trulie I do not thinke, that in so great slaughter of dukes as hath bene in England within this few peares, there was so manie weeping eyes at one time: and not without cause. For all men did see in the decaye of this duke, the publike ruine of all England, except such as indeed perceiued nothing. The duke in the meane time standing still, both in the same place and mind wherein he was before, shaking his cap which he held in his hand, made a signe vnto the people that they should keepe themselves quiet: which thing being done, & silence obtained, he spake to them the second time in this maner.

The second speech of the duke of Summerfet to the people.

Derelie beloued friends, there is no such matter in hand, as you bainlie hope or beleue. It seemeth thus good to almighty God, whose ordinance it is meet & necessarie that we be all obedient vnto. Wherefore I praise you all to be quiet, and without tumult: for I am euen now quiet, and let vs loine in praise vnto the Lord, for the preservation of our noble king, vnto whose maiestie I wish continually health, with all felicitie and abundance & all maner of prosperous successe: wherevnto the people cried out, Amen. Whereouer, I wish vnto all his counsellors the grace and fauour of God, whereby they may rule althings uprightlie with iustice, vnto whome I exhort you all in the Lord to shew your selues obedient, the which is also also verie necessarie for you, vnder the paine of condemnation, and also most profitable for the preservation and safegard of the kings maiestie. And forsomuch as heretofore I haue had oftentimes affaires with diuers men: that it is hard to please euery man that hath bene offended or injured by me, I most humbly require and aske them forgiveness: but especiallie almightie God, whome thoroughout all my life I haue most grauously offended. And vnto all other, whatsoeuer they be that haue offended me, I doe with my whole heart forgive them.

And once againe (dearely beloved in the Lord) I require that you will keepe your selues quiet and still, least thorough your tumult you might cause me to haue some trouble, which in this case would nothing at all profit me, neither be any pleasure vnto you. For albeit the spirit be willing and readie, the flesh is fraile and wauering, and thorough your quietnesse I shall be much more the quieter: but if that you fall vnto tumult, it will be great trouble & no gaine at all vnto you. Whereouer, I desire you to beate me witnesse, that I die here in the faith of Iesus Christ, desiring you to helpe me with your prayers, that I maie perseuere constant in the same vnto my liues end.

When he turning himselfe about kneeled downe vpon his knees, vnto whome doctor Cox, which was there present, to counsell and aduertise him, deliuered a certaine scroll into his hand, wherein was contained a briefe confession to God. Which being read, he stood vp againe on his feet, without any trouble of mind as it appeared, and first had the thriffes farewell, then the lieutenant of the tower, & certaine other that were on the scaffold, taking them all by the hands. Then he gaue the executioner monie, which done, he put off his gowne, and kneeling downe againe in the straws, untied his shirt strings: and then the executioner comming to him, turned downe his collar round about his necke, and all other things which did let and hinder him. Then he couering his face with his owne handkerchiefe, lifting vp his eyes vnto heauen, where his onely hope remained, laid himselfe downe along, shewing no manner of trouble or feare; neither did his countenance change, but that before his eyes were couered there began to appeare a red colour in the middle of his cheeks.

Thus this most meke and gentle duke lieng along and looking for the stroke, because his doublet couered his necke he was commanded to rise vp and put it off: & then laieng himselfe downe againe vpon the blocke, and calling thise vpon the name of Iesus, saing: Lord Iesu saue me, as he was the third time repeating the same, euen as the name of Iesu was in uttering, in a moment he was bereft both of head and life; and slept in the Lord Iesus, being taken awaie from all the dangers and euils of this life, and resting now in the peace of God: in the preferment of whose truth and gospell he alwaies shewed himselfe an excellent instrument and member, and therefore hath receiued the reward of his labours. Thus gentle reader thou hast the true historie of this worthie and noble duke, and if any man report it otherwise, let it be counted as a lie.

This duke was in high fauour and estimation with king Henrie the eight, of whome he receiued suche high & great preferments, by reason that the said king had married ladie Jane his sister, by whome he had issue king Edward the sixt. He was not onely courteous, wise and gentle, being daily attendant at the court; but forward and fortunate in seruice abroad, as may well appeare in his sundrie voiajes, both into France and Scotland. He was of nature verie gentle and pitifull, not blemished by any thing so much, as by the death of the admerall his naturall brother, which could not haue bene brought to passe in that sort, without his consent. But of this good duke (to let passe multitude of wordes) maister Fox hath written no lesse trulie than commendable, & no lesse commendable than deserueble, and no lesse deserueble than profitablie in his historie, whereto I refer the reader for further knowledge. Neuerthelesse of this vertuous duke by waie of application I saie as sometime one said (verie aptlie as some thinke) of the gracions ladie 'An Bullen,

The protectors of England collected out of the ancient and moderne chronicles, wherin is set downe the yeare of Christ, and of the king in which they executed that function.

Upon the death of this duke of Summer-set protector of England, it shall not be unfitting in this place to set downe all the protectors (whereof I can as yet haue intelligence) and who haue bene gouernors, regents, guardians, or deputies of the realme, and of the kings person during his minority and time of his insufficiencie of gouernement; or else of his absence being out of the realme: wherof I haue made an especiall title in my Pantographie of England, in which this my collection of the protectors, although perhaps I shall not set downe all (for Barnardus non videt omnia) yet it is better to haue halfe a loose than no head, knowledge of some than of none at all. Thus therefore I begin.

Guendoline the daughter of Cozimeus duke of Cornetwall (after the procurement of warre against hir husband wherein he was slaine) was by common consent (for that hir sonne Madzane which she had by Aocrine was insufficient by reason of his minority to gouerne the kingdome) made by the Britons ruler of the Ile, in the yeare of the world 2894, and so continued the same by the space of fiftene yeares, vntill hir sonne came to lawfull age.

Martha (the widow of Guenteline the king) by reason that Sicilius hir sonne was not of age convenient to wield the scepter (as one being but seven yeares old) obtained the gouernement both of the realme and of hir sonnes person, which she most worthily deserued, being a woman of rare vertue and iudgement.

Elojed, Ethelred, or Edred (for all these diuersities are found in authors) brother to Edmund king of England, while the sonnes of Edmund (Edwine and Edgar) were for their minorityes insufficient to dispose the kingdome, was appointed protector to his nephewes, in the yeare of Christ 940, who about six or seven yeares after his protectorship toke on him the kingdome at Kingstone on Easter daie, in the yeare of Christ, as hath John Stow 946, as others haue nine hundred fortie seven.

Emma the queene of England, the widow of king Ethelred, and of Canutus, both kings of England iointlie, with Godwine earle of Kent had the gouernement of the realme vnder Hardiknute king king of England, who began his reigne in the yeare of Christ 1041.

Harold the sonne of Godwine at the death of king Edward the Confessor (which fell in the yeare of Christ 1066, and the thir and twentieth yeare of the same king) was by the testament of the said king Edward appointed regent of the yong Edgar Atheling (named heire in the life of the said Edward) and of the kingdome, after the death of king Edward, during the minority of the said Edgar. Beside which the like commending of the kingdome to this Harold, in respect of the quenes honour, as that before the successors right, is set downe by one that liued at that time, and wrote the life of king Edward, of erle Godwine, and of his children, in these words.

Correcte manu (meaning king Edward lying on his death bed, and speaking in the behalfe of Godtha the quene, sister to this Harold) ad predictum nutricium suum fratrem Haroldum, Hanc inquit cum omni regno tutandam tibi commendo, ut pro domina & sorore ut es fideli serues & honores obsequio, ut quoad vixerit a me adepto non priuatus honore debito. Commendo pariter etiam eos, qui nationem terram suam reliquerunt causa amoris mei, mihi que haec omnia fideliter sunt obsequuti: ut si sepe a eis sita volunt fidelitate eos tuearis & retineas, aut tua defensione conductos cum annibus quae sub me acquisuerunt cum salute ad propria transferri facias, &c. But he, when king Edward was dead, usurped the crowne to himselfe, and shortly after lost both his life and his kingdome.

Odo bishop of Baieux, and William Fitz-osborne earle of Hereford.

Odo bishop of Baieux, and William Fitz-osborne the first, being earle of Kent, and chiefe iustice of England, and the second being earle of Hereford, were gouernours of the realme, in the yeare of our Lord 1067, and the first yeare of William the Conquerour, when he went into Normandie after the conquest and indifferent quieting of the realme.

Lanfranke archbishop of Cantuarburie.

Lanfranke archbishop of Cantuarburie, as appeareth by Matthew Parker, writing in this sort in the life of the said Lanfranke: Absente Gulielmo omnia Lanfranco mandabantur, qui summa prudentia cuncta moderatus, proceres & plebem in officio tranquille sine ulla motu atque tumultu continebat, adeo ut si quae defectio suspicio nascebatur, ad eam illico compescendam maximus & potentissimus quisque opem & adiuuentum illi imperanti praestitit.

Sir Richard Lucie chiefe iustice of England.

Sir Richard Lucie knight, chiefe iustice of England was protector of the realme in the twelue yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the second, being the yeare of our Lord 1166, in the absence of the king when he was in Normandie, and in the parts beyond the seas. Which Lucie in the thirtenth yeare of the same king, being the yeare of our redemption 1167, did valiantly resist, and politikelie drue backe the earle of Bullongne inuading the realme. He built the abbeye of Leofnes or Westwood in the parish of Crich in Kent (and not in Southfleet as some haue written) in the yeare of Christ 1178, being about the foure and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the second; and further built the castell of Angier in Essex, in the diocese of the bishop of London. He had issue Godfreie bishop of Winchester, and thre daughters, who after the death of Godfreie their brother were his heires: the eldest daughter of which Sir Richard Lucie, was married to Robert the first called Fitzwater: the second daughter Anelina, was married to Kuers, of whome issued John de Kuers: the third daughter Rose, was married to Richard Warraine, son to king John, as appeareth by a deed (belonging to my selfe, who had the rectorie of Leofnes) beginning thus: Rosa de Douer quondam uxor venerabilis viri Richardi filij regis de Chilian.

Hugh Pudis bishop of Durham.

Hugh Pudis de Pudis: neque to king Stephen, being bishop of Durham, and erle of Northumberland, and William Longchampe bishop of Ely, had the gouernement of the realme for

Richard the first, upon his departure forth of the realme to take his iourne into the holie land. For in his absence he appointed this Hugh to haue the rule of the north parts, as chiefe iustice & warden of the realme from Yumber to Scotland, deliuering to him also the keeping of the castell of Winchester, the other parts of the realme, with the custodie of the tower, he assigned to the gouernement of William Longchampe bishop of Ely, whome he made chiefe iustice and warden of those east, south and west parts, making him also his chancellor: who being a man of great diligence and knowledge in the administration of things, was yet verie fatious and desirous of rule, honour and riches, farre above all measure. And with these two bishops he linked in authoritie by commission Hugh lord War-dolph, William Parthall the great, earle of Chep-stow, Sirigull or Penbrooke, Gesteie Fitzpeter, and William Brelwer, barons, men of great honor, wisdom & discretion. This the king did in the yeare of Christ 1190, and the first yeare of his reigne.

Walter de Constantijs sometime chancellor of England, bishop of Lincolne, and now archbishop of Roane, upon the misdeameor of the yong bishop of Ely William Longchampe, about the yeare 1192, had the custodie and gouernement of the realme committed vnto him, whilest king Richard the first remained still in the holie warres: who being called from that place in the yeare of Christ 1193 (with Eleanor mother to the king) to come to king Richard then imprisoned in Austria, the archbishop of Cantuarburie Hubert succeeded him in the yeare 1194, whome the said archbishop of Roane procured to be installed in the see of Cantuarburie, which Walter de Constantijs (as hath Euerselden) was made bishop of Lincolne in the yeare 1183, and the next yeare after bishop of Roane.

Hubert Walter, or Walter Hubert (for such a transmutation of the name is vsed amongst hystorographers) was made (upon the discharge and going of Walter archbishop of Roane beyond the seas to king Richard) gouernor and protector of the realme, before the returne of Richard the first into England after the said kings imprisonment (by the Duke of Austria and the emperour) procured by Sanaricus bishop of Glasterburie and Welles, a kinsman to the emperour, wherof our moderne printed chronicles nor our ancient writers, except one, make any mention. This Hubert died at his manor of Tenham, and was buried at Cantuarburie in the south wall, in the yeare of our redemption 1205, the third ides of Julie, being the seventh yeare of king John.

Eleanor widow to Henrie the second, and mother to Richard the first, was made protectresse of England, after the departure of hir son into France, when he had bene deliuered out of prison: in which office she continued during the life of hir sonne, which he ended in Poitiers in those French warres, by a hurt receiued from one that discharged a crossbow against him, on a Fridaye as he besieged Chalons. Touching whose death (sith I am now in hand with the same) it shall not be amisse to set downe such fewe all verses composed by severall men in severall sorts, as I haue read, and are not yet made common to the world, which verses be these, concerning his death and place of burfall, as hereafter followeth:

Pictavis exta ducis sepelit, tellusque Chalus Corpus duri claudi sub marmore fuit Nensia tunc tegit cor inexpugnabile regis, Sic loca per trina se sparsit tanta ruina, Nec fuit hoc funus cui sufficeret locus unus.

Wherof also another composed these following verses somewhat eloquentlie, as saith Matthew Paris (and so in truth they were, considering that age which mostlie used a rinning kind of Latine verses, induced into the west part of the world by the barbarous Gothes) in his greater historie of the life of king Richard in manner and forme following:

Ad Chalm cecidit rex regni cardo Richardus, Hic ferus, hic humilis, hic agnus, hic leopardus, Cafus erat lucis, Chalmus per seculi nomen Non intellectum fuerat, sed nominis omen Non patuit, res clausa fuit, sed duce cadente Prodyt in lucem, pro casu lucis adeptus.

Besides which verses of two severall men, it pleaseth my pen to ad also the third mans dowing, as well for that the number of thre is the holie number, as for that there is nothing so sweet, but that varietie doth refresh it: yet especiallie sith it is delightfull to see the severall inventions of manie wits, this third poet therefore, exclaiming against the daie in which the said king Richard the first receiued his death wound (being on a fridaie) doth thus write:

*O veneris damno! a dies! o fidus amaram!
Ille dies tua nox fuit, & Venus illa venenum, Ille dedit lathum, sed postum ille dierum, Primus ab undecimo, quo vita victum ipsum Clauis utrag die: homicida tyrannide mira Transigitur, clausus exclusum, telum opertum, Prouidus incautum, miles inimicus inermem.*

This queene Cleano: the protectresse died in the yere of Christ 1205, being the seuenth of king John.

Geffreie Fitzpeter lord Ludgershall, who was by Richard the first made chiefe iustice of England, after the remouing of Hubert the archbishop of Canturburie, and was in the first yere of king John gited by him with the sword of the earldome of Essex, was also protector of the realme. Who being a man of great power and authoritie, was by nature gentle, by birth noble, in the lawes cunning, in reuenues great, and to all a good iusticer. This man was a hyde to king John, to restrain his insolencie; since he was confederat and alied in friendship & blood with all the nobilitie of England: & for that cause was greatlie feared of the k. who said of him, as he did before of the archbishop Hubert, that he then did fullie reigne, when they two were dead. For turning to those which stood by him, when news was brought unto him of the death of Fitz Geffreie, he sware by Gods feet, that he was then king & lord of England, and not before. Which words he would not vse, when the archbishop Hubert died; because this man was yet liuing, whome the king (as is alreadye said) greatlie feared. And therefore vpon the death of the archbishop, he did onelic saie that he began to reigne; but not vpon this mans departure out of the world, he said he was become a full lord & absolute king of England. This Geffreie Fitzpeter died in the yere of our redemption 1212, being about the fourteenth yere of the reigne of the said miserablie afflicted king John, who died in the yere of Christ 1216; whose death I haue bene the willinger here to mention; because I would set downe his epitaph (not else before set downe in our English chronicles) as I find the same of ancient report:

*Hoc in sarcophago sepelitur regis imago, Qui moriens multum sedauit in orbe tumultum, Et cui connexa dum vixit probra manebant, Hunc mala post mortem timor est ne fata sequantur.
Qui legis hac metuens dum cernis te moriturum, Disito quid rerum pariat tibi meta diurnum.*

This Geffreie Fitzpeter married Beatrice, daughter and heire of William lord Saie, by whom he had issue, Geffreie Hardensle earle of Essex, & spawd married to Humfreie de Bohuns, by whome the Bohuns became earles of Essex.

William Parthall surnamed the great, being erle of Penbroke, was made protector of the realme, a person of the king, after that the king (being nine yeres of age) was crowned in the yere of our Lord 1216. Which office this William (being also marshall of England) used so honorablie, that he recovered a great part of the nobilitie (which toke part with Lewes son of the French king against king John father to this Henrie) to assist the young king Henrie against the said Lewes: who in the time of the said John had obtained a great part of the kingdome of England. By which means the said Lewes was expelled, and the kingdome wholie reconcered to the vse of the said young king Henrie the third.

This William Parthall married Isabell daughter and heire to Richard Strangbow earle of Penbroke, who made him a happy father in the multitude of his children. For by hir he had five sonnes, all which were in succession marshals of England, and earles of Penbroke; and five daughters. The sonnes were William, Richard, Gilbert, Walter, and Anselme; who all dieng without issue, the inheritance was deuolued to the five sisters; which were, spawd the eldest, married to Hugh Bigod, in hir right earle marshall; Jone the second, married to Maraine Montehensie, in hir right also earle of Penbroke, as hath Nicholas Triuet; Isabell the third, married to Gilbert de Clare earle of Gloucester; Sibill the fourth, married to William Ferrers erle of Darbie; & Que the fifth daughter, married to William de Berehuse, or de Broule. This William the great died in the yere of our redemption 1219, being the third (as hath Nicholas Triuet) or the fourth (as hath Matthew Westminster) yere of the reigne of the said king Henrie the third, and was buried at the new temple, on Ascension daie, being the seuenteenth calends of Aprill: of whome was made this epitaph by Geruashus Melkelecie, taking vpon him the person of the earle marshall:

Sum quem Saturnum sibi sentit Eibernia, Solem Anglia, Mercurium Normannia, Gallia Martem.

Which signifieth that he was a sharpe corrector and ruler of the Irish, an honor & glorie to the English, a counsellor and dispatcher of the affaires of Normandie, a warlike knight and invincible captain against the Frenchmen.

Petrus derupibus, or Peter of the Roch, being bishop of Winchester, was after the death of William Parthall earle of Penbroke advanced to the protectorship of the king; because that the young king was almost destitute of any of his owne kindred that might worthilie haue the rule of his person. For his mother queene Isabell was newlie married to Hugh Bune earle of March in France. This bishop of Winchester (who was both a wise and a stout prelat) being now in possession of the king, and mistrusting that he had entred into a more weightie office than he might well discharge, if all things were not done according to the fante of the nobilitie, procured diuerse graue and honorable men to be preferred to the kings counsell, as to be associats to him in the administration of the weale publike; and so entred into the administration of his new atchued honor. Which yet he did not long intole.

But as the bishop was at the first careful to plant such of the nobilitie about the king, for the support of the realme; so yet himselve being a Gascoigne, did after in the riper yeres of the king prefer to offices about the king such Gascoignes as both were of his owne blood and kindred; and by these extraneous dealing procured the nobilitie with an hard and vndutifull course to oppose themselues against the king. This Peter was advanced to the seat of Winchester, in the yere of our redemption 1204, being about the first yere of king John. After which he went to Rome, and being a prelat more fit to fight than to preach, for Wars than for the mules ; did returne from Rome in the yeare of Christ 1205, being about the seventh yeare of King John. He remained bishop about two and thirtie yeares, and died at his manour house of Fernham, on the fifth daye of June, in the yeare of our Lord (as have Matthew Paris and Matthew Westminster) 1238, being the two & twentieth yeare of Henrie the third. And so somewhat before his death, about the one and thirtieth yeare of his bishoppyke, went into the holie land with the bishop of Exeter. He builded, and indued with possessions manie religious houses : amongst which he founded Twisfield in Hamphshire, of which Peter de la Roches, or of the rocks, Matthew Paris maketh a more large discourse.

Hubert de Burrow earle of Kent.

Hubert de Burow, constable of Dover castle, earle of Kent, and chiefe iustice of England, being of great account in the realme for his probitie and goodnesse, was made protector of the king and kingdom, in the yere of our redemption 1221, being the fift yere of king Henrie the third. This man in the yere of Christ 1221 (being the same yere in the which he was made protector) married at Poike, Margaret, sister to Alexander king of Scots. And here I thinke it not amisse to saie somewhat touching the issue of this Hubert of Burow, who in a certene namelesse booke (caried about in the hands of all men) treating of the nobilitie (created since the innation of William Conqueror) is said to die without issue: which cannot possible be so, if that be true which I haue seene: which I am led by manie reasons to beleue to be most true.

For I haue read of two children which this Hubert had, whereof the one being a sonne, was called Richard de Burow, who was knighted by Henrie the third (as it seemeth to me) after the death of his father: if this Richard be not the same John, of whose Matthew Paris writeth, that in the yeare of Christ 1 2 29, Rex Anglorum Henricus, in die Pentecostes Iohannem filium Huberti Anglia iusticiarium cingulo militari donauit tercio nonas Junij. The other child was a daughter called Margarete, married to Richard heire to the earldome of Gloucester, as noteth Iohn Beuer in these words: Richardus heres comitis Glouernie Margaretam filiam Huberti de Burgo comitis Cantie in uxorem accepit. This Hubert de Burow was a verie old man, who after manie persecutions by the king, and after so manie chances of both fortunes, departed this world on the fourth daies of Maie, in the yeare of our redemption 1 2 4 3, being the seuen and twentieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third at his manour of Wansford, or Wansford. Whose bodie was honorable caried to London, and there buried in the church of the frier preachers, to whom in his life he had giuen great gifts; and amongst other things, his gublie place which stood not far from the palace of earle Richard of Cornewall (as I with some probable reasons coniecture) nere vnto Westminster, which afterward the archbishop of Yorke did procure. This wife the countesse of Bent, being likewise verie old, a woman that kept verie great hospitalitie, and that was well beloved, died in the yeare of Christ 1 2 5 9, being the three and fortyth yeare of Henrie the third, about fixteene years after the death of the earle his husband.

archbishop of Yorke.

Walter Greie archbishop of Poze was made protector of the realme in this sort. The French king hauing vnjustlie given the earldome of Boffiers to his brother Adolphus; Hugh Buzone earle of March (the greatest of the nobilitie in that prouince) would not do homage vnto Adolphus; but wrote his letters to his son in law king Henrie the third. (whose mother Cleane he had married) that if he would come into those parts, he should haue both aid of men, and furniture of war for the perfect restoring of those dominions to the crowne of England, for which cause Henrie the third assembling his power, did with his brother Richard (then lately returned from Ierusalem) depart the realme in the yere of our redemption 1242, being the six & twentieth yere of his government into Poitiers, & left the administration of the kingdome to Walter Errie archbishop of Dozke, whilste he should remaine in those parts. Which office the said archbishop held also in the yere of Christ 1243, being the seauen and twentieth yere of king Henrie the third. Of this man is more mention made in my collection of the chancellors of England; in this place onelie further setting downe, that this Walter died in the yere of Christ 1255, being about the nine and thirtieth yere of this Henrie the third. as hath Anonymus M.  Edward Longshanks, being after king of England by the name of Edward the first, son to the said king Henrie) were (in the yere of our redemption 1253, being the seven and thirtieth yere of the reigne of king Henrie the third) appointed gouernours and protectors of the realme in the kings absence, whilst he went into Gascoine, whither he went to pacifie the nobilitie, and to keepe the same in safetie from the French. And because my pen hath here fallen vpon Richard earle of Cozntwall, I determine to say somewhat of him in this place, not hauing other occasion offered to me therefore. This Richard the son of king John was borne in the yere of Christ 1208, being the tenth yere of the reigne king John. He was made (and so called) earle of Poitiers by Henrie the third, about the ninth yere of his reigne, in the yere of Christ 1225, who also that yere with his vncle William earle of Sarisburie went into Poitiers, where he was sofallie receiued: he putteth the earle of sparch to flight, he recovereth that which was lost in Gascoine, he went into the holic land, refuseth the kingdome of Apulia offered vnto him, he is chosen emperor, and receiueh that honoz at Co-len, being there crowned king of the Romans: he subdued Alфонsus competitor with him for the empire, he after returneth into England: he is an enimie to Simon Montfort and the barons rebelling against his brother king Henrie the third; he is taken prisoner by the barons, and is afterward deliuered: he was created knight and earle of Cozntwall in the yere of our redemption 1225, as hath Matthew Westminster, but as saith William Packington, he was created earle of Cozntwall in the yere of Christ 1227. He married foure wives, if that Elisabeth his first wife and Isabel the widow of Gilbert de Clare were not all one woman. But leauing that to further knowledge, I do for this time make them but one person; for so in truth it must be, whatsoeuer other wise shall be helued in mistaking their names. Elizabeth that was his first wife, as noteth Leland, was buried in the quere of Welland, being that woman which is called Isabel, and was the daughter of William Marshall earle of Penbroke surnamed the great: and the widow of Gilbert de Clare earle of Glocester was married to this erle of Cozntwall, in the yere of our Lord 1231, being the fifteenth yere of king Henrie the third.

This Isabell died in the yeare of our redemption 1240, being the foure and twentieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, after this manner.
For she being great with child, and nere to the time of hir deliuerance, fell into a verberum isterism, or the hickel, and deliuering a child into the world, which had life, and was baptised by the name of Nicholas, they both presentlie died thereupon. Which thing when the earle understood being then on his iourneie into Cornwall, he burst out in teares, and greatlie lamented that losse. Wherefore hastily returning, and learning his former iourneie, he honorablie buried his wife at * Welland or Beaulen, an house of religion builded by king John from the foundation, and replenished with Charterhouse monks.

His second wife was Sinthia or Sanctia, daughter to Ketmond earle of Province, and sister to the queene of England, wife to king Henrie the third, brother to the said Richard earle of Cornwall, who married the said Sinthia in the yeare of our redemption 1243, being the seuen and twentieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third. Leland also appointeth to him the third wife, which was Beatrix de Famaillais, whom he calleth queene of Almaine, & wife to king Richard, brother to Henrie the third. Which lady died in the yeare of our redemption 1277, being the first yeare of Edward the first, and was buried at the friers minors in Drford. This noble Richard erle of Cornwall died in Februarye at Berkhamsfield, in the yeare of Christ 1271, in the five and fiftith yeare of king Henrie the third, as saie Matthew Paris and Marthew Westminster: but Nicholas Triuer referreth his death to the yeare 1270, being the foure and fiftith yeare of Henrie the third: and the chonicle belonging to Guelham to the yeare 1272, being the six and fiftith yeare of Henrie the third. After whose death his hart was buried in the friers minors of Drford, and his bodie committed to the earth in the monasterie of Hales (being Charterhouse monks) which he had builded at his charge of 10000 marks, which at this daie at five shillings the ounce of silver amounteth to the summe of twentie thousand pounds. He had two sonnes, the one called Henrie by his first wife Tabell; the other called Edmund de Almaine by his second wife Sinthia. Henrie was slaine by Simon and Guic of Pontfort sonnes of the last Simon Pontfort earle of Leicester, in the life of his father Richard in Italie at Aiterbo, in the yeare of our redemption 1270. Which fact being done in saint Splucters church as he was at masse, occasioned the townesmen to paint the manner of his death on the wall of the church: and that picture being beheld by a certaine versifier, he was byged thereupon to compose these following verses:

Regis Theutonici Richardi clara propago, Sternitur Henricus, velut hac designat imago, Dum redit à Tripoli, regum fulvus comitum, In crucis obsequio patitur sub gente nociva, Iruit in templum, post missam, stirps Guenelonis Perfodit gladium hunc Simonis atque Guidonis, Disposuit Deus ut per eos vir tantum obiret, Ne renouatis his, gens Anglica tota periret, Anno milleno Domini cum septuagena, Atque duceno, Carolo sub rege sereno, Præriterbina sit in eius carne ruina, Celi regina precor ut sit ei medicina.

His bones were brought into England, and buried in the monasterie of Hales, where his father was after also buried: but his hart was bestowed in a gullt cup, and placed beside the chaine of saint Edward the Confessor in Westminster abbeye. The other sonne to this Richard earle of Cornwall was Edmund of Almaine, who after the death of his father was inuested with the honor of the earldome of Cornwall, being borne at Berkhamsfield in the yeare of our redemption 1250, being the foure and thirtieth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, to whom his uncle Bonifacius bishop of Canturburie was godfather, and called him Edmund in the honor of saint Edmund archbishop of Canturburie and Confessor. This Edmund earle of Cornwall married the daughter of Richard earle of Clare, of whome shall be moze spoken when we come to treat of him as protector of England.

Boniface the archbishop of Canturburie, with others which follow, were protectors of the realme after this maner, as I haue gathered. It was ordered in the parlement at Drford called Parlementum infanum, that the king should chosse forth twelue persons of the realme, and the communalitie of the land other twelue, the which hauing regall authoritie in their hands, might as gardians of the kingdome take in charge vpon them the gouernment of the realme, & should from yeare to yeare prouide for the due election of iustices, chancellors, treasurers, and other officers, and further prouide to see to the safe keeping of the castles belonging to the crowne.

These foure and twentie persons appointed to that function, began to order all things at their owne pleasure: in the meane time not forgetting to vse things chieflie to their owne aduantage, as well in prouiding excheats and wards for their children and kinfolks, as also in bestowing of patronages of churches belonging to the kings gift, vnto their owne liking. So that these prouiders which should haue made careful and beneficiall prouisions for the realme, made speedie and plentifull prouision for them and theirs, in somuch that neither king nor Christ could get anie thing from these protectors. There be that write, how that there were but twelue or thirtene chosen to be gouernors at this time (which for this present I deme to be the truer opinion) whose names are as follow: Boniface archbishop of Canturburie, the bishop of Worcester, Roger Wigod earle of Hereford and marshall of England, Simon de Pontfort earle of Leicester, Richard de Clare earle of Gloucester, Humfrey Bohune earle of Hereford, Richard Fitzalane earle of Arundell, sir John Spansell chiefe iustice of England, sir Roger lord Mortimer, sir Hugh Wigod, sir Peter de Saunoe, sir James Audleie, & sir Peter de Pontfort. To these (as some saie) was authoritie onlie giuen to punish all such as trespassed in the breach of anie of the constitutions of the parlement of Drford. Others say that they were made rulers & protectors of the realme, and to dispose thereof, because the king was much misleed in the gouernment of the kingdome by the peruerse counsell of his flatterers. Which twelue gouernors I suppose did not long continue: for being euerie one priuatlie for himselfe, and so not iointlie for the common-wealth, they grew diuided, and that the one labored to set vp, the other sought to pull downe.

Boniface archbishop of Canturburie the second time, & the bishop of Worcester, with sir Philip Basset, or rather sir Hugh Wigod made chiefe iustice of England by the barons, were appointed in the yeare of our redemption 1260, being the fortie and fourth of king Henrie the third, to haue the gouernment of the realme in the absence of the king, whilst he remained in France at Paris about the affaires of Normandie: at that time a peace was made betwene the kings of England and France.

Gilbert de Clare the second of that name that was earle of Gloucester and Hertford, was the sonne of Richard de Clare erle of Gloucester and Hertford, which died in the yeare of our redemption 1262, being the fortie & first yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third, and was buried at Tewkesburie, with a great image of silver and gilt vpon his tombe, and the same sword and spures which he did weare in his life time. Of which Richard these verses were composed for his probitie and rarenesse of vertuous manners maners and conditions, and set vpon his tome:

Ere pudor Hyppoliti, Paridis genas, sensus Physis, Aeneas pietas, Hectoris iracundia.

This Gilbert (I saie) the sonne of the said Richard was after the death of Henrie the third (which happened in the yeare of our Lord 1277, & in the seuen & fiftith yeare of the reigne of the said king Henrie) in the absence of king Edward the first in the holie warres made gouernour of the realme, vntill the returne of the said king Edward into England, to which function he was appointed by king Henrie the third, lieng on his death-bed: who caused the said Gilbert to sweare to keepe the peace of the land to the behoofe of Edward his sonne. Which he did most faithfully, vntill the second daie of August, in the second yeare of the said king, in which the said king Edward landed in England, being in the yeare of our redemption 1274, at what time the king was honorably interteined of the said Gilbert, and John earle of Murraine (a supporter to him in the charge of the kingdome) at the castell of Tunbridge in Kent, and Wigate in Surrie, which Gilbert with the other piers of the land, immediatlie after the death of king Henrie the third, assembling at the new temple brake the old seale of king Henrie, made a new seale in the name of king Edward, and appointed faithful officers for the sure keeping and obseruing of the treasure, the riches, the peace, and the lawes of the kingdoms.

This Gilbert had two wiues, his first wife was Alice the daughter of Hugh le Bzune erle of March, by whom he had issue a daughter, that was countesse of Fife in Scotland: his second wife was Ione the daughter of king Edward the first, called Ione of Acres, by whom he had one sonne, called Gilbert the third, earle of Glocester and Hertford, who married Mathe the daughter of Richard earle of Ulster in the yeare of Christ 1308 at Waltham, by whom he had issue a sonne, John bozne in the yeare of Christ 1312, being in the first yeare of Edward the second, that died without issue; after the death of which Gilbert the third, his lands and earldomes of Glocester and Hertford came to the sister of the said Gilbert the third, who was slaine in the battell of Striueling against the Scots in the seuenth (or as others haue the eight) yeare of king Edward the second, whom the Scots would gladlie haue kept for ransome if they had knowne him: but he had forgotten to put on his cote of armes to shew what he was, after which he was brought into England and was buried at Tewkesburie, vpon whose death the two earldomes of Glocester and Hertford were so dispersed, that there was neuer anie to this daie, that iointlie succeeded or possessed them both. Thus hauing digressed from Gilbert the second, in treating of his sonne Gilbert the third, let vs againe returne to him. He besides his sonne Gilbert the third, had by his wife Ione three daughters; Eleanor, first married to Hugh Spenser, second sonne to Hugh Spenser earle of Glocester, and after his death to William Zouch; Margaret married to Piers de Causton earle of Cornewall, and after to Hugh Audelcie; and Elizabeth or Isabell married in the yeare of our Lord 1308, being the first yeare of Edward the second, to John the sonne of Richard earle of Ulster. This Gilbert the second, before the marriage of his second wife, was on the fiftenth kalends of August diuorced from Alice his first wife, in the yeare of our redemption 1271, being the six and fiftith yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the third; and after in Westminster church the last of Aprill married his second wife, about the eighteenth yeare of Edward the first being the yeare of Christ 1290, which Gilbert the second, being taken atwaies by vntimelie death, departed this world in the yeare of our redemption 1195 (being the thre and twentieth of the reigne of the said Edward the first) who was in word & deed, in commandement and authoritie the greatest person of the kingdome, next to king Edward the first: for which cause he well deserued to haue his sepulture among his worthy ancestors.

Edmund earle of Cornewall, of whom there is somewhat spoken before, being the sonne of Richard king of Almaine, and earle of Cornewall brother to Henrie the third, married Margaret the daughter of Richard de Clare erle of Glocester, he was made protektor of the Realme by Edward the first in the fourteenth yeare (as some saie) or in the fiftenth, as others saie (for there is so much disagreement amongst authozs for the accounts of yeares, as it pisseth anie one man to reconcile them in all points) when the said king went into Aragon to reconcile the two kings of Arragon & Naples. He continued in this office in the yeare of Christ 1287, or 1228, as hath Treuet, being the sixteenth yeare of Edward the first, in which he subdued Rife ap Iwerbach the Welsh prince, rebelling against Edward the first, and ouerthrew the castell of Dyffillane (as hath the said Nicholas Treuet) he was lord of Wallingford, did much cost therevpon, and died without issue, as hath Matthew Westminster, in the yeare of Christ 1300: but as hath Thomas Walsingham 1301, leauing the king of England his heire. Yet are there some pedegrees and other authozs, and those not the meanest, which saie that he had a daughter, Isabell married to Rojice Fitz Harding lord Warkele: so that these authozs, which saie that he died without issue, are to be vnderstood of the issue male, & not of the heire generall: for they account him to die without issue, which leaueeth no posteritie to continue his title of honor. The which their meaning they make more plaine, in that they saie that after his issuelesse death, the earledome came to the crowne. And here bicause there is mention made of Wallingford, I will set downe what Leland hath written touching the same, bicause I desire to make common, and to preserve all whatsoeuer monuments of Leland that come vnto my hands: thus therefore he writeth of Wallingford in his commentaries of England, written in the yeare of our redemption 1542, being the foure and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the eight in these wordes.

The towne of Wallingford hath bene a verie notable thing and well walled. The ditch of the towne, and the cress wherevpon the wals stand, be yet manifestlie perceived, and begin from the castell, going in compasse a good mile and more, and so continueth to Wallingford bridge, a large thing of stone ouer the Thames. There remaine yet the names of these streets amongst others, Thamestreet, Fishstreet, Woodstreet, Goldsmiths rolo. And by the patents and donation of Edmund earle of Cornewall and lord of the honour of Wallingford, it appereth that there were fourtene parish churches in Wallingford: and there be men yet alieue that can shew the places and churchyards where they stood, at this time there are but thre parish churches. The towne and the castell was soze defaced by the Danes warres, yet they maeilie flozished in the time of Richard king of the Romans earle of Cornewall, and brother to Henrie the third, he did much cost vpon the castell which ioineth to the north gate of the towne, and hath thre ditches (as vpon the cress of the same may appere) large and deepe, about each of the two first ditches (on the cress of the ground cast out) runneth an embatteled wall now soze in ruine, and for the most part defaced. All the goodlie buildings, with the tower and dungeon, be within the third ditch. There is

is also a collegiat chapell amongst the buildings within the third dyche. Edmund earle of Cornewall son to Richard king of Romans was the first founder and indower of this college. Prince Edward the blacke (as one told me) augmented this college. There is a deane, foure priests, six clerkes, and foure choristers. The late deane before doctoz London that now is, builded a faire steeple of stone at the west end of the collegiat chapell, to the making whereof he defaced (as it is said without licence) a pece of the kings lodging on the east end of the chapell. The deane hath a faire lodging of timber within the castle, and to it is ioined a place for the ministers of the chapell. Thus much Leland for Wallingford, & thus much I for Edmund earle of Cornewall and lord of Wallingford.

Edward of Carnaruan prince of Wales, sonne to Edward the first, was in the yeare of our redemption 1295, being the five and twentieth yeare of Edward the first, protector of England, in the absence of his father in Flanders, who because he was of tender yeares, had as tutors and governours appointed unto him Richard bishop of Durham (Eulogium hath the bishop of London) William Pontacute, with diuerse other knights, as Reignold Greie, John Giffard, & Alan Plunket, being wise, discret and expert soldiers.

Piers of Peter de Cauesfone a Gascoine borne, whome king Edward the second so tenderlie loued as that he preferred him before all men, was appointed gardian of the realme in the first yeare of the said king Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1308, when the king went into France and there aboad to marrie Isabell daughter to Philip king of France, before that the said Edward was crowned king of England, as hath Radulphus Higden. Of this Piers I will here saie little, because I haue spoken more largelie of him in my panto- graphic of England.

John de Droghda bishop of Bath and Wells, was in the yeare of our redemption 1313, being the sixt yeare of king Edward the second, made protector of the realme in the absence of the said king Edward the second, and his wife quene Isabell, who went into France to solemnize the coronation of Philip (sonne to Philip king of France) who was at that instant created king of Navarre. This Droghda was the fourteenth bishop of Bath & Wells. Great contention was there betwene him and the deane and priests of that church. He succeeded in the bishoprike Walter Houelshab. This Droghda held the bishoprike about nineteene yeares, he beautified the same with manie goodlie buildings, procured manie priuileges vnto it, and greatlie exalted his kindred. He was buried at Welles before the high altar of saint John Baptist.

Henrie Lacie of Lacie earle of Lincoln, and of Salisburie, baron of Halton and of Pontfract, corruptlie called Pomfret, and constable of Chester, was made protector of the realme in the first yeare of Edward the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1310, whilst the king remained in the warres of Scotland. Which Henrie died shortly after in the same yeare, and was buried in the new worke of Paules, who carried for his armes the purple lion contrary to the cote his ancestors had borne before. This man had done great seruice in the warres in the time of Edward the first, he married Margaret the daughter and heire of William Longespée earle of Salisburie, and had by hir a daughter named Alice, married to Thomas Plantagenet earle of Lancaster, Leicester, and Darbie. This Henrie (as I haue learned of other and read in Leland) had issue a bastard sonne, and hauing amongst manie other lordships the manour of Grantchester besides Cambridge, he gaue the same with other lands vnto that bastard, and commanded that the same Lacie so set vp in Grantchester, should for himselfe and his successors euer name their sonnes and heires by the names of Henrie, which hitherto hath bene religiouslie obserued amongst them. And this was the originall of the houses of the Lacies in Grantchester, as Leland learned of him which was then heire of those lands.

Gilbert de Clare the third earle of Gloucester of that name, after the death of Henrie Lacie, was chosen gouernour of the realme (the king being still in Scotland) during the time that the king should make his abode in that countrie. Of this man see before in the discourse of his father Gilbert the second earle of Gloucester and Hertford, and protector of the realme.

Edward prince of Wales and duke of Aquitaine, comming out of France with Isabell in the second yeare of Edward the second, his father was after his landing in England and the taking of his father made gardian of England vnder his father, which office he did not long continue: for depositing his father from the kingdome in the yeare of Christ 1326 he assumed the crowne himselfe in his fathers life.

Walter Keinolds archbishop of Cantuarburie was with others appointed gardian of England on this sort. Edward the third as before attaining to the crowne in the yeare of our redemption 1327, or as some others more trulie saie 1326, being fourtene yeares of age did then begin his reigne. But because he was so young (not being of power or policie to welde so great a charge) it was decreed in this first yeare of his reigne, that twelue gouernours of the greatest lords within the realme should possesse the gouernement, vntill he came to ripper yeares, whose names were as insue: Walter archbishop of Cantuarburie, the archbishop of Doke, the bishop of Winchester, the bishop of Hereford, Henrie earle of Lancaster, Thomas Bozherston earle marshall, Edmund of Woodstocke earle of Kent, John earle of Warren, the lord Thomas Wake, the lord Henrie Percy, the lord Oliver de Ingham, and the lord John Kesse, who were sworn of the kings counsell and charged with the gouernement of the kingdome as they would answer for the same. But this ordinance continued not long, for in the second yeare of this king, Isabell the kings mother and the lord Roger Mortimer took the whole rule into their hands, in such sort that the king and his counsellors were in all affaires of state, and otherwise, onelie gouerned by their direction. Of this Walter Keinolds the archbishop, because he was sometime chancellor, and sometime treasurer, is more mention made in the large volume of the liues of the chancellors.

John of Eltham earle of Cornewall sonne to Edward the second, had in the fourth yeare of king Edward the third being the yeare of our redemption 1330 the gouernement of the realme committed vnto him, whilst king Edward the third had passed the seas onelie fiftene hoyses in his company, apparelled in clothes like vnto merchants, which office the said John of Eltham executed vntill the returne of the said king, and before that also when the said Edward the third, in the second yeare of his reigne, did before this time go into France to do his homage. He was made earle of Cornewall in the second yeare of king Edward the third, being the yeare of Christ 1328, and died at Barwik, others saie at S. Johns towne in Scotland, in the month of October 1336, being the tenth yeare of Edward the third, and was honorable buried at Westminister, for the solemnization of whose buriall the king came

Edward the Blacke prince, eldest sonne to Edward the third, being about the age of nine yeares, was in the twelfth yere of his father, being the yere of our redemption 1338, or as saith Matthew Parker 1337, made gardian of England in the absence of his father being as then sailed into Flanders to procure the Flemmings to aid him against the French king. Under which prince as some write (or rather as I for the time take it) equall in commission to him it seemeth that John archbishop of Canturburie had the chiefe rule of the land, because that king Edward after his returne into England, which was about the fourteenth or the fiftenth of his reigne, charged the said bishop with certeine negligences which he used in collections of monie, whilest he had the chiefe rule of the land, when he was in the wars of France. Wherefore the words of Matthew Parker in the life of the said John Stratford (saient that the king held a parlement, in which Omnem regni curam & gubernationem archiepiscopo commisit) must needs be intended that he had that charge under or equallie with the said Blacke prince, as chiefeest counsellor to support the tender yeares of his sonne.

After which also in the yere of our redemption, as hath the same Matthew Parker 1342, being about the sixteenth of the said Edward the third, the king committed the care & gouvernement of the kingdome to the said archbishop, whilest the king was beyond the seas in the warres: for thus writeth the said Parker, fol. 257. Ac paulo post nulla purgatione indicta (speaking of the said bishop unjustlie accused to the king) aut recepta, omnibus pene parlamentis ordinibus pro archiepiscopo deprecantibus, rex eum sua sponte legitime purgatum & excusatum pronuntiavit, eumque multo magis charum quam ante habuit, omnibusque gerendis in Anglia rebus se in militia absente prefecit. Of which archbishop being sometime chancelor, and treasurer of England shall be set downe a more large discourse in my large booke of the lives of the chancellors.

Lionell third sonne to Edward the third, was in the ninth yere of the reigne of the said king Edward the third, being the yere in which the word became flesh 1245, made gardian of England, in the absence of his father, who as then was sailed into the parts (beyond the seas) of Flanders. Of this man there is more spoken in my following treatise of the dukes of England.

Henrie lord Persie, & Kase lord Beuill, when Edward the third was sailed into Normandie, were in the twentieth yere of the reigne of the said Edward the third, being the yere of our redemption 1346, appointed to be gardians of the realme in his absence with the archbishop of Yorke, the bishop of Lincoln, and Thomas Hatfield bishop of Durham.

Thomas of Woodstocke being verie yong was made custos or gardian of England, in the yere that God took on him the forme of a servant 1359, being the thre & thirtieth of the reigne of the said king Edward the third, when he sailed into France with a 1100 ships. Of this man is more spoken in my discourse of the dukes of England, set downe in the time of queene Elizabeth: and in my treatise of the conestables of England, set downe in the time of Henrie the eight pag. 867.

John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, fourth sonne of Edward the third, because the king his father was feeble and sicklie (being now about thre score & five yeares of age, though Bodinus in his Methodo historiae saie that he died in his climactericall yere of thre score and thre: for the truth is, that the said Edward the third was fourtene yeares old when he began to reigne, and he reigned about one and fiftie yeares, which make of his age thre score and five yeares) but especiallie for the sorow which the king inwardlie conceived for the death of that worthy prince his son, commonlie surnamed the Blacke prince. This John of Gaunt (after the death of the said Blacke prince, which died in the yere of Christ 1376, being the fiftieth yere of the reigne of Edward the third, whose death was deemed to be hastened by the said John of Gaunt aspiring to the crowne, the plat whereof though it took not effect in the life of the said John, yet it was performed in his sonne Henrie of Bullingbroke, who deposed Richard the second) was appointed by his father Edward the third to have the rule of the realme under him, the which he continued during his fathers life, which was not a full yere after that he had made the said John of Gaunt gouernour of England. After which death of king Edward the third, when Richard the second, a child of eleven yeares of age began his reigne, in the yere of our redemption 1377, in the first yere of the said Richard the second, after his coronation, the said John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, & Edmund of Langley earle of Cambridge brother to the said John of Gaunt, were appointed to have the gouernement of the kings person, and the administration of the common-wealth. But shortly after, in the same yere of the king, in the yere of our redemption 1378, the said John of Gaunt gaue up the same office. Of this man is more said in my treatise of the dukes of England.

William Courtenie bishop of London (but shortly after his protectorship advanced unto the see of Canturburie, in the yere of Christ 1381, about the ninth of Januarie, being about the fourth of Richard the second, was made gouernor of the realme in this manner. After (as is before said) that the duke of Lancaster had wiselie weied the sickle estate of the realme, and considered that by the euill gouernment of the nobilitie, and inconstant mind of the yong king, there must needs fall a change of the estate, & doubting that if any thing succeeded otherwile than the nobles liked, the cause and negligence might be imputed to him, as one who chiefe had the gouernment in his hands (and thanks howsoever the state was ruled he looked for none) did in the end after a few months authoritie (wholie mistaking the manners of the court, which commonlie are not of the best in the minority of princes) surrender his protectorship, and obtained licence of the king to depart, and so got him quietlie to his castell of Kenelworth, permitting others to have the whole swaie of the kingdome.

Notwithstanding all which, in the second yere of Richard the second, about the yere of Christ 1379 being not altogether carelesse of the kings well doing; this duke before his departing to Kenelworth, caused certeine graue persons with his full consent, to be ordeined, which should haue the gouernement of the kings person, and administration of the common-wealth. The names of whome were, William Courtenie before mentioned, Edmund Mortimer earle of March, Kase Ergumne bishop of Salisburie, and William lord Latimer, with others, of whome for the most part the people had conceived a good opinion: yet because the said bishop of Salisburie, and the lord Latimer were associat to the rest, and of equall authoritie with them, the commons murmured greatlie against them. The cause for which they so mistaked the lord Latimer, was for that he had sometimes bin too much fauouring to dame Alice Piers, concubine to king Edward the third, to whome the said lord Latimer was chiefe chamberleine, & therefore was of him best beloued, which two persons, the lord Latimer, and dame Alice, were by parliament in in the fifth yeare of Edward the thirde removed from the king, for that they miscounted him, but especiallie with much mischief grew in the realme by the same Alice Piers. For she being now exalted in pride by overmuch love of Edward the thirde, would beyond the modestie and maner of women, sit in ingeminent with the kings justices, he with the doctors in the consistorie, turne sentences to what she would, and require manie things dishonest in themselves, and dishonourable to the king. Which woman, an old written chronicle belonging to the house of Cuesham, hath delivered to me these words: Alicia Piers regis concubina supra modum mulierum nimis supergressa sui etiam sexus et fragilitatis femineae immemor, nunc iuxta iustitiarum regis nunc in foro ecclesiastico iuxta doctores sedendo, et pro defensione causarum suaderet, et etiam contra iura postulare minime verebatur, unde propter scandalum petierunt ab illo (which was the king) penitus amoveri in parlamento tento anno Domini 1376 et 50 Ed. 3. Thus that autho.

And here before I go any further with my protectors, because some curious heads that find not all these matters in the records of the tower, which they daile turne with a churlish hand, or else thinke that nothing may be knowne out of the walles of their office, will seeme to seeke a knot in a rush, and saie that I in compasse of some few lines have written a contrarietie, in saieing that John of Gaunt thirdest after the kingdome, and for that cause hastened the death of his elder brother prince Edward the blacke as Richard the third did the death of his brother George duke of Clarence, which intent could not possible be in John of Gaunt, as appeareth by my olone following words: where I saie that he gaue over the protectorship of his nephue, because he would avoide all suspicion of euill gouernement: which hee would neuer haue done if he had so ment, that place being so apt for the execution of his purpose, and might giue occasion to him that neuer ment any such matter before, to attempt it being in that place, as Richard duke of Booke did attempt, but not perfoyme it, in the time of Henrie the first; and as Richard duke of Gloucester, being in the same office of protectorship, did not onelie attempt it, but brought to perfection. Whereunto I answer, that all this is no contrarietie, but onelie a manifest shew and confirmation, the one part of my words to the other. For sith he could not in the life of his father Edward the third before the crowning of king Richard the second (as Richard the third did) attaine the crowne, he would not now attempt it (the king being once crowned, and in full possession of the kingdome) so rashlie and vnadvisedlie (as did Richard duke of Booke against Henrie, for which he was in the end haine) least that thereby his part might seeme to carie the face of a rebellion, as in truth it should haue done. For whosoeuer either for colour of God, bene- fit to their countrie, or for whatsoeuer cause, lift up the sword against a crowned king, sitting at the sterne of gouernement, being one of the gods of the earth, the same must needs tend vnto a rebellion, which John of Gaunt would not seeme to execute, & for that cause leauing off his purpose at that time, he did in the end also leaue the whole matter to his son to perfoyme, especiallie sith he afterward perceived Richard the second so much to fauor and further him with monie, munition, and men, to recouer the kingdome of Castile & Arragon in Spaine, in the right of the wife of the said John of Gaunt. To whom and to his wife (as hath Henrie Knighton) king Richard the second gaue a generall crowne of gold to honour them withall, & to shew how interlie he loued them when they both went into Spaine. And for these causes the said John of Gaunt refused the oportunitie of time & place in the king his nephues minority to execute it. But did he cease it so? No. For that sparke although it were a little cooled, was not utterly quenched, because he hastened the same in his son, whom he not onelie persuaded, but furthered (after the barishment of his said sonne Henrie of Bullingbroke by Richard the second in the life of the said John of Gaunt) to returne into England, and after his death to challenge by sword the earldome of Lancaster his right inheritance, and vnder the same to reuenge the death of the duke of Gloucester and others: and by that means, when Richard the second was out of the realme of England in Ireland, the said Henrie Bullingbroke sonne of John of Gaunt entered the realme, put downe the king, and got the crowne which his father sought. Thus this much digressing from the protectors, and to returne to that course which I haue in hand, I will leaue the discourse of policies to obtaine kingdoms, because they be no balles for me to bandie, and follow on my former intent as meete for my simplicitie.

Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwick was in the third yeare of Richard the second, being the yeare of our redemption 1380, made protector in this sort. In the parlament holden the same yeare, at the speciall sute of the lords, and of the commons, the bishops and barons chosen (as you haue heard) before by John of Gaunt to be protectors of the realme, were removed, and the earle of Warwick especiallie elected to that function, to remaine continuallie with the king as cheefe gouernor of his roiall person; & one that should giue answer to all foreigners repairing thither, vpon what cause soeuer their coming were; hauing further as ample gouernment of the kingdome giuen vnto him, as the other removed gouernors had. Being placed in that office by the duke of Lancaster, he died the first ides of Aprill, in the yeare of Christ 1401, being the third yeare of Henrie the fourth. He married Margaret, the daughter of William lord Ferrers of Grobie; by whome he had issue, Richard earle of Warwick.

Thomas Fitzalane otherwile called Arundell bishop of Ely, the two and twentieth that inioined that seat, being two and twentie yeares of age, and the son of Richard Fitzalane earle of Arundell & Marren, was with others made protector of England in this sort. At a parlament holden at London in the tenth yeare of Richard the second, being the yeare of Christ 1386, were certeine gouernors of the kingdome elected, because the treasure of the realme had bene imbeilled & lewde wasted, nothing to the profit of the king and kingdome, by the couetous and euill gouernment of the deposed officers, which were Michaell de la Pole earle of Suffolke lord chancellor, John Fitzham bishop of Durham lord treasurer, & diuerse other persons that ruled about the king.

Now the gouernors elected by this parlament were in number thirtene; and by name Thomas Arundell bishop of Ely, then made lord chancellor; John Gilbert bishop of Hereford made lord treasurer; and Nicholas abbat of Waltham at that time made keeper of the priuie seale; William Courtenie archbishop of Canturburie, Alexander Penill archbishop of Booke, Edmund Langlete duke of Booke, Thomas of Woodstocke duke of Gloucester, William bishop of Winchester, Thomas bishop of Excester, Richard Fitzalane erle of Arundell, John lord Deuereur, and Reinold lord Cobham of Starbozow. These were thus by parlament chosen to haue vnder the king the whole ouersight and gouernment of the realme, as by their commission in the statutes of the tenth yeare of the said Richard the second it doth in the printed booke appeare.

Edmund Langley duke of York, uncle unto Richard the second, was in the eighteenth yeare of the said Richard, being about the yeare of our redemption 1395, ordeined lord gardian of England, in the kings absence in the realme of Ireland. This protector caused a parlement to be assembled at Westminster: where he dealt so effectualie, notwithstanding the untowardnesse of the burgeses, that a tenth was granted by the cleargie, and a fiftenth by the temporaltie; but not without protestation, that those payments were granted of a merke freewill, for the loue they bare to the king, and to haue the affaires in Ireland to succeed the better. After this, about foure yeares; king Richard the second in the two and twentieth yeare of his reigne, in the yeare of Christ 1399, making another piage into Ireland (being the last and most unhaple that euer was to him, for before his returne he had in effect lost his realme, which after his comming he lost in deed) did againe in his absence substitute this Edmund duke of York as chiefe gouernor of England. Who in the absence of the king, assembled a power of men against Henrie of Bulkinghoke, now entered into the land to challenge the dukedome of Lancaster after the death of his father John of Gaunt, and vnder that colour to surpe the crowne. Which Edmund passing into Wales in the thre and twentieth yeare of Richard the second, was receiued into the castell of Barking, where remained untill the comming of Henrie of Bulkinghoke. Whom when he perceiued (for the power which the said duke of Lancaster had assembled from all parts of the realme) that he was not of sufficiencie to resist; he came forth into the church that stood without the castell, and there fell to parlex with the duke of Lancaster; after which he did neuer forsake the duke of Lancaster, untill he came to the crowne. Who, if he had faithfullie stood vnto his nephew, might perhaps haue saued vnto him both his crowne and life. Of this man is more said in my treatise of the dukes of England.

Jone de Hamures widow to Henrie
the fourth.

Jone de Hamures sometime duchesse of Britaine, (widow to Philip Montfort, as saith Hypodigma; but Walsingham in his historie calleth him John duke of Britaine; being also the widow of king Henrie the fourth) was substitute gouernor of the realme by hir son in law king Henrie the first, king of England, in the thirde yeare of his reigne, being the yeare from the birth of the messias 1415, when the said Henrie the first tooke his tourne into France to conquer the same. This woman in the seuenth yeare of Henrie the first, which was in the yeare of Christ 1419, being suspected (as saith John Stow) to practise withcraft against the king, was committed to the custodie of John Mellam, or rather John Delham, who appointed nine seruants to attend vpon hir, and brought hir to Beuenfete castell to be gouerned vnder his prouidence. But shortly after clearing hir selfe, she was deliuered. This ladie died at Hauering at the bolwe in Essex the ninth of Iulie in the seuenth yeare of the reigne of king Henrie the first, being the yeare of Christ one thousand foure hundred thirtie and seuen, and was buried at Canturburie with hir husband king Henrie the fourth.

John de
Plantagenet
duke of Bedford.

John duke of Bedford son to Henrie the fourth, & brother to k. Henrie the first, was in the fourth yeare of the reigne of the said Henrie, being the yeare of our redemption 1416, by parlement appointed regent of the realme, to inioie the same office so long as the king was imployed in the French wars. Which place he possessed accordinglie; and in the ninth yeare of the victorious prince, king Henrie the first, being gardian of England, he, with Henrie Beauford bishop of Winchester uncle to Henrie the first, and Jaqueline duchesse of Holland remaining then in England, were godfathers, and godmother to Henrie, after king by the name of Henrie the first, the son of Henrie the first; Henrie Churchie archbishop of Canturburie baptising the child. In the tenth and last yeare of Henrie the first, this John with a strong power conuied quene Katharine wife to Henrie the first, from Southampton into France. This man being duke of Bedford, earle of Arundmond and of Kendall, constable of England, and warden of the marches of Scotland, died the fourteenth date of September at Rome in 30. maner, who (hauing also bene regent of France, a most valiant gentleman, and one that kept the parts beyond the seas in great obedience to the crowne of England) had for his yearelie pension 20000 crownes at the least. After whose death all things went backward, and the English lost all that they had beyond the seas, Calis, & those dominions onlie excepted.

This man (I saie) died in the yeare of our redemption 1435, being the thirteenth yeare of the unfortunate government of the deposed king Henrie the first, and was honorably buried at Rome in our ladie church there. Touching whome it shall not graue me to set downe the answer of a French king lately in our age made to one of his nobilitie, saing vnto the king (then being in the said ladie church of Rome, and beholding the tome of this John of Bedford) that it were conuenient that the same tome were defaced and pulled downe; since he was the onelie man that brought the greatest damage that euer happened vnto France. To whom the king said; Hold thy peace sole, God forbid that euer we should do such reproch to him being dead; whome the proudest of our nation durst not looke in the face when he was liuing. This duke John married the second yeare of Henrie the first, in the yeare of Christ 1423, Anne the daughter of John duke of Burgogne, who died in the tenth yeare of Henrie the first, in the yeare of Christ 1433, after which he married Jaques daughter to Peter earle of S. Paule in the same yeare, and yet died without issue. Of this man is mention made in my former discourse of the constables of England, pag. 868.

Humfrie duke of Gloucester brother to Henrie the first, and uncle to Henrie the first, was in the tenth and last yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1422, made regent of England, vpon the removing and departure of John duke of Bedford with quene Katharine, wife to Henrie the first into France. In which yeare (happening the lamentable death of that worthy prince king Henrie the first) the said Henrie vpon his death-bed appointed this Humfrie to be protector of the realme; which he did exercise in the time of the minority of Henrie the first, from the time of his first enterance into the kingdome. Who at that time taking vpon him that function, called vnto him graue and wise counsellors; with whose support he might with better honor to the realme, and benefit to the subiects, rule the ship of this kingdome, sailing in the dangerous waues of the kings infancie. By which means holding the sterne thereof, directed by the course of iustice, he did most honorably during his life discharge the dutie of so weightie an office. Who in the fourteenth yeare of Henrie the first, being the yeare of our Lord 1439, did with five hundred saile land at Calis, and for eleven dates spoiled the lott countries and so by Calis returned againe into England. This man in the five & twentieth yeare of king Henrie first, being the yeare of Christ 1447, was in his castell of Ales in Millhoire, & comming from thence duke of Gloucester.

to the parlement was lodged in the hospitall, and arrested by John lord Beaumont high constable of England. But on the foure and twentieth daie of Februarye he died for sorrow as some saide, and as John Stow hath noted, because he might not come to his answer. Other write that he was murdered in the night by the queens procurement, to the great griefe of the commons, and in time following to the bitter destruction of the king and the queene. He was duke of Glocester, and also in the right of his wife duke of Holland and Zeland, earle of Penbroke, lord chamberleine of England, and protector of the realme, being highlie esteemed of learned men, himselfe also not meanelie furnished with knowledge, having rare skill in astrologie, wherof beside manie other things he compiled a singular treatise, obtaining the name of Tabula directionum, touching whose death I have read these verses following in John Whethamsted:

*Aemula fors varijs signanter honoribus altis Causavit miserè mala multos flere ruina, Latus erat Iulius, undis mersus Ptolemus, Pulsus Tarquinius, exul factusque Tydens, Dux nimis propere iam dictus tempora vitæ Complevit tristis, heu indignatio regis Causa fuit magna, maior detractio falsi, Plebs et iuncta fallaci et insidiosa, Nam regis patris, quamvis et proximus heres, Tunc fueratque suus consultor in ordine primus, Vir prudensque pius, vir doctus et ingeniosus, Non tamen erubuit, nec pertimuit, ve pepercit Hunc accusare falsè de proditiōe, Discreto quodque suam clam vellet tollere vitam Et sibi surripere violenter iura corona.
Ducit argentum, proprium qui captat in usum, Desiderat medium quo vindicet aptius ipsam, Sic regem plures comitantes collaterales Se tantur prædon, mediat frans, dat dolum ipsam, Fidior in regno regi duce non fuit isto, Plisus fide stabili aut maior amator honoris, Et tamen et prædo voto potiretur iniquo, Fraudem consuluit, cum fraude dolum sociavit, Sicque ducem falsi maculans cum proditiōe Obtinuit votum, prædator eratque bonorum Illius, et tristis obijt dux criminis expert.*

Which duke Humfrie was buried at saint Albons, being without issue, after he had married two wives; whereof the first wife was Iacoba or Jaqueline (daughter and sole heire of William of Baucier) being then the lawfull wife to John duke of Brabant then living, which wife this Humfrie married in England in the yere of our redemption 1424 being the third yere of king Henrie the first, upon which grew great warres, and Humfrie duke of Glocester challenged the combat of the duke of Burgognie, taking part with his cousine John duke of Brabant. But in the end the duke of Glocester left his wife at Mons & returned into England, and shee unto Gaunt, and so into Holland, & the combat staied by means of the duke of Bedford brother to the duke of Glocester. But after (as it seemeth) the duke of Glocester was divorced from this dutchesse, and then married Cleano: Cobham (whome he had tenderlie loved as his paramour before that) in the yere of our redemption 1428, being the first yere of the reigne of king Henrie the first. This woman in the nineteenth yere of the said Henrie the first (upon the taking of Henrie Bullingbroke for practising necromancie, thereby to consume the king) fled in the night to Westminster for sanctuary. which caused her to be suspected of treason. Whereupon Bullingbroke confessing that he wrought the same at the procurement of the said Cleano:, desirous to know to what estate she should come unto, the said dame Cleano: did oftentimes for the same fact appeare before the bishop, and in the end was consulted. After which in the twentieth of Henrie the first she did grievous penance therfore, and so escaped with hir life. And here because I have said somewhat of Jaqueline dutchesse of Holland, I thinke it not amisse to adde a little more of hir, being a woman of great beautie, and desire of change in performing the pleasures of the flesh: therfore I will set downe what I have seene written under the pictures of hir and hir husband Francis in this sort.

Thomas Beaufort duke of Excester (appointed to that office by Henrie the first on his death-bed) was with Henrie Beaufort bishop of Winchester great uncle to king Henrie the first in the yere of our redemption 1422, being the first yere of the reigne of king Henrie the first (then but nine months old) made protector and gardian of the person of the yong king, to see him tenderlie and carefullie brought up and instructed in all such parts as were to be required in the person of a monarch. Which office he left about the fourth yere of king Henrie the first, and died on feluyeres daie at his manor of Crantwich in the said first yere of Henrie the first, being the yere of our redemption 1446: he married Margaret the daughter of Thomas Beuill of Hornesbie.

Richard Beauchampe earle of Warwick the son of the former Thomas Beauchampe, being beyond the seas, and there deputie for John duke of Bedford (being regent of France) did (whilest the said regent was come ouer into England) obtaine manie castels in his deputiethip; who being thus imployed in the foren warres, was in his absence out of his countrie (for his singular wisdom and valor) ordered by the three estates of the realme of England in open parlement, to be gouernor of the person of the yong king Henrie the first, in the place of Thomas Beaufort duke of Excester lately deceased: which Richard did not yet forthwith hasten his returne into England, but remained in France for a season, enlarging inlarging the fame of his martial exploits. This his election to the protectorship of the kings person, was in the first yere of Henrie the first, being the yere of our redemption 1426. He died in the yere of our Lord 1439, being the seicententh yere of the deposed king Henrie the first, at Hone in Normandie the last daie of Maie, as hath John Stow; and the fourth of October next following his corps was honorablie conueied, as well by land as by water from Hone to Warwicke, and there honorablie buried in the college of our ladie church founded by his noble ancestors. He married two wiues, the first Elisabeth daughter and heire of Thomas lord Barkeley, by whome he had three daughters, Margaret married to John lord Talbot earle of Shrewesburie, Cleane married to Thomas lord Rolle, and Elisabeth married to George Nevill lord Latimer. His second wife was Isabel the daughter and heire of Richard lord Spenser, by whome he had issue Henrie duke of Warwicke, and Anne married to Richard Nevill earle of Salisburie.

Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke

Richard Plantagenet duke of Yorke, sonne to Richard earle of Cambridge, and father to Edward the fourth king of England, notwithstanding that he made challenge to the crowne against Henrie the first, then in possession thereof, as heire to the house of Yorke, and was to be preferred before the house of Lancaster; and notwithstanding that he was by parliament appointed to weare the crowne after the death of Henrie the first: yet after all this, in the three and thirtieth yere of the same king, being the yere of our redemption 1455 (such was the imperfection of the king to gouerne) he was appointed protector of the realme, ruling the same at his owne disposition. Which office he did not long inioie, and that most worthilie: for the next yere after being the foure and thirtieth of king Henrie the first, and the yere of our redemption 1456, he was deposed from the same, and quene Margarete wife to Henrie the first toke againe the absolute regiment into his hands: which duke after in the nine and thirtieth of king Henrie the first, being the yere of our redemption 1460, the thirtieth daie of December, being lord of Wakefield, was there with his sonne the earle of Rutland slaine at the battell commonlie called the battell of Wakefield; of which I haue read these verses in Whetnhamsted once abbat of saint Albons:

Anno millesimo centum quater quoque sena, Terdenoque die, duodeno mense Decembre, Infra Eboracensem iuxta Wakefield comitatum Dux dominus Wilhelms pugnans habuisse Constitutum grandem contra gentem borealem, Ac preceres plures preerant qua gentibus ipsi, Quod docuit, quia fors quod res fortuna secunda, Fatis habere moras, cecidit dux natus eius, Ac comes insignis fors belli, fors fuit ipsi Obiit, sicque satis regni fuerat brevis heres Omen id latum lulerat mutamine mestum Desendum multis, in regni, in fuit eius.

This was done 1561, counting the yere to begin at Christmas as some doe, or at Januarie as others doe.

He married Cicilie daughter to Rafe Nevill first earle of Westmerland, by whome he had issue Edward duke of Yorke, earle of March, and after king of England by the name of Edward the fourth: George Plantagenet duke of Clarence, Richard Plantagenet duke of Glocester, after king of England by the name of Richard the third: three daughters, Anne married to Henrie Holland duke of Excester, Elisabeth married to John de la Poole duke of Suffolke, and Margarete married to Charles duke of Burgognie.

George Plantagenet duke of Clarence

George Plantagenet duke of Clarence, and constable of England, sonne of the foresaid duke of Yorke, and brother to king Edward the fourth, with Richard Nevill earle of Warwicke (who set by and pulled downe kings at his pleasure) were after the flight of Edward the fourth out of England into Burgognie to his brother in law (in the tenth yere of the reigne of the said king Edward, being the yere of our redemption 1470, when Henrie the first had by their means readeped the kingdome) made gouernors of the land, which office they inioied not long. For the said Edward the fourth returning into England, in the eleuenth yere of his reigne, being the yere of our redemption 1471, reconciled to him the duke of Clarence, did againe put downe king Henrie the first, and due the said earle of Warwicke (steing awate) at Barnet field, on Easter day, by one of the men of his campe. After this, on the fifteenth daie of Januarie began a parlement; in the eighteenth yere of the reigne of king Edward the fourth, being the yere of our redemption 1478, where this duke of Clarence was atteinted of treason, and the eleuenth of March following he ended his life in a but of malmeise, and was buried at Eukefburie beside his wife, who being with child died by poison a little before him. Of this man see more in my discourse of the constables of England pag. 869.

Richard Plantagenet third sonne to Richard duke of Yorke, was constable of England and gouernour of the person of the king, of whome is more spoken in my discourse of the constables of England pag. 869. But here mentioning the constables of England, I thinke it better now than not at all, to mention also some imperfection and default in my former discourse of the said constables, set downe by me before in pag. 865. Which default of mine in that place grew by reason of ouermuch hast, which I used in sudden seeking for the same, whereby (according to the old prouerbe) I brought forth a blind whelp. For in the former description I haue omitted diuers the which were constables of England, the names of which were Henrie the first in the life of his father, Sigellus, and Robert de Dilie, with others of that line in descent, which Sigellus I can not as yet learne to be anie other but Sigellus de Dilie, brother to Robert de Dilie that came in with the Conqueror, who gaue Oxfordshire vnto the said Robert.

Besides which, if it shall seeme to anie that I haue in my former treatise rashlie written I know not what, & that here I make Henrie the first constable in his father the Conquerors time, & by contrarietie thereto did before make Walter constable also in the Conquerors and William Rufus his time: let them know that there is no contrarietie herein. For Walter might first be constable, & then Henrie the first, and both they in the Conquerors time, this office being taken from the first, and given to the latter by the Conqueror. After whose death William Rufus might take it from his brother Henrie, because he would not make him too great in England, for doubt least he might hereby put the crowne in hazard, being fauoured of the people as one borne in England, and for that cause might restore that office to Walter. Again it maie be, that some men reading that I haue before set downe, that Hawdo the emperesse gaue the constableness to Spilo the son of Walter in the first of king Stephan, and that king Stephan toke that office from Spilo in the first yere of his reigne, and gaue it to Walter Beauchampe, will condemne me therefore of like vnadvised writing: because it seemeth thereby that Stephan toke it from Spilo before that Spilo had it. Which is not so, for I can proue with some reason and authoritie, that Spilo had it a little before the death of king Henrie the first, and also after his death in part of the first yere of king Stephan, being witness to a deed by king Stephan, made and dated the first of his reigne, to

A digression concerning the constables
of England not mentioned before in pag. 865.

Algehus de Ollie constable
of Eng-
land.

The foundation of the cathedral church of Exeter.

to which he subscribed his name Milo Constabularius, after which king Stephan might in that yeare take that office from him, and so he did. Which Palus the emperesse understanding, and finding Allo (now fallen from king Stephan) one which assisted hir, the better to confront Stephan, gaue the constableship to Allo (accounting hir selfe as quene) in the first of Stephan.

This being thus spoken in defense of that which before I haue written pag. 866. let vs go to our other matter concerning the constables not mentioned before in the said discourse, wherein I find my selfe in a marvellous laberinth (out of which I doubt that the best antiquaries cannot lose themselves, no not he which thinketh and saith that he can controll all men, for I suppose he will be lame in this matter) how all these could be constables, vnlesse that in the time of Henrie the first, and of king Stephan, as it is most likelie, there was chopping & changing, putting in and taking out, setting vp and pulling downe one man in diuerse yeares of one and the selfe same king: for king Stephan was sometime a king, and sometime as no king, and then againe a king. And so likewise was it with Palus the emperesse at the same time, bearing hir selfe sometime as quene, and then dejected as no quene. But be it as it will be, I will here set downe what I find in ancient charters and pedegrees touching the constables of England not before mentioned, leauing the same to others (either to order for succession of time, or to amend for truth of matter) who peraduenture reading these things, which I haue scene and will here set downe, can bestow them in better order than I can, which I earnestlie praye them to do, whereby truth maie be brought to light and perfection; which as yet touching these constables set downe in this place, seemeth to be obscured and confused vntill the time that Roger Fitz Spiles had that office: for from his time the same is without all controuersie sufficientlie knowne. Wherefore, here before I enter into the descent of the Ollies, who were constables of England, I will set downe a strange note of thre persons witnesses to a deed, dated Primo Stephani, anno Dom. 1136, who do all subscribe their names as constables. Which charter being the same wherein king Stephan gaue the manor of Sudton or Sutton to the house of Winchester, the same was amongst other witnesses thus signed, Robertus de Veer constabularius, Milo constabularius, Brientius filius comitis constabularius: all who could not be constables of England at one time. Wherefore sauing correction I suppose that it is out of all controuersie, that neither the first nor the last of these thre were constables of England, but of some other places, as of Douer or other castles. And so to that which I haue further to saie of the kings constables in one descent and succession of the de Ollies, being tearmed the kings constables, both in ancient charters and pedegrees, thereof Nigellus before mentioned seemeth to be one.

This Nigellus was constable of England in the yeare of our redemption one thousand one hundred and one, being the first yere of king Henrie the first, as may appeare by a deed of confirmation made by Henrie the first touching the cathedrall church of Exeter, whereof I thinke good to saie somewhat to bring in the proofe that this Nigellus was constable. This church was built for the most part in the time of William Rufus, by Herebert de Losinga the first bishop of Exeter, who translated the see from Ely into Exeter, in the yeare of Christ 1094, which church being finished and consecrated to the holie trinitie, was afterward confirmed by Henrie the first, and Palus his wife, in the first yeare of the said Henrie, being the yeare of our redemption 1101, to the charter thereof signed by king Henrie & Palus his wife, were manie bishops, noblemen and abbats witnesses, amongst whom are these two set downe; Nigellus Constabularius, and Rogerus Cancellarius, of which Nigellus thus writeth Leland in his commentaries on the song of the swan in the word Isidis insula: Erat Roberto frater Nigellus nomine, de quo fama non admodum multa refert, which I suppose is this Nigellus de Ollie the constable, as I before said.

Robert de Ollie, sonne of the said Nigellus, did succeed his father, and was as may appeare by some authoers (who tearme him accordingly) great constable of England. This man together with his wife Edith were the founders of the religious house of Osney, touching whome I shall not graue to set downe what I haue gathered out of Leland and others. This Edith obtained of hir husband to build a church in the Isle of Osney in Oxfordshire, to our sauiour Christ, about the yeare of our redemption 1129, being about the nine and twentieth yeare of king Henrie the first, which church did after grow to be of great renoume and building, the occasion of building thereof is set downe by others in this sort. Edith being in great estimation with Henrie, first married the said Robert de Ollie by the kings procurement, which Robert began the priore of the blacke chanons of Osney by Oxford, amongst the Isles made by the riuer of Isis or Wolfe. This Edith used oftentimes to walke out of Oxford castell with hir gentlewomen for to solace and recreate hir selfe. At what time at a certeine place, as often as she came by the same, certeine pies assembled themselves in a tree, where they chattered and as it were spake vnto hir. This ladie much maruelling at the matter, happening so continuallie at one time in one place after one order, and with one maner of foules, was manie times astonished and feared therewith, esteeming it a verie strange wonder. Whereupon she sent for one Radulph or Rafe a chanon of saint Frideswide in Oxford, a man of vertuous life & hir confessor, asking his counsell vpon the same. To whom he answered (after that he had scene the order of those pies onelie chattering at hir comming thither) that she should build some church or monastrie in that place. Whereupon she intreated hir husband to build a priore, and so he did, making that Radulph the first priore of that house. All which matter, that is the coming of Edith to Osney, Radulph waiting on hir, and the tree with the pies were all extant (at the generall dissolution of the abbeyes in the time of Henrie the eight) to be scene painted on the north side of the high altar, in the arch of the wall ouer Ediths tombe in Osney priore, vpon which tome there laie a stone image of Edith in the habit of a dowresse holding a hart in hir right hand. This Robert de Ollie was buried in Osney in the verie middle of the presbiterie, vnder a flat marble stone; whereupon was a flowred crosse portraied, which Robert had issue Henrie de Ollie, baron of Hochinton, & the kings constable, which married Margerie the daughter of Humfrie de Bohune, by whome that Henrie had issue Henrie de Ollie baron of Hochinton, and the kings constable which died without issue. Thus this much by waie of digression, touching the constables of England, left out in my former discourse of those officers. And so againe to the protectors.

Katharine the daughter of Ferdinand king of Spaine, and wife to king Henrie the eight, was (in the absence of the said king beyond the seas in the the warres of Turuine and Carneie) made regent of the realme, in the yeare of Christ 1513, and the first yeare of king Henrie the eight, she had bene the widow of Arthur prince of Wales, eldest sonne vnto king Henrie the seauenth, and eldest brother to king Henrie

Robert de Ollie constable of England.

The foundation of the abbey of Osney in the yeare of Christ 1129, being about the thirtieth yeare of Henrie the first, as some write.

Katharine quene of England.

Henric the eight, who after the death of that Arthur was by dispensation of the pope married to Henric after king, by the name of Henric the eight, being younger brother of the said Arthur, from which king Henric she was afterward not onelie divorced, in the one and twentieth of his reigne, being the yeare of Christ 1529, but after by parlement also in the foure and twentieth of the kings reigne, in the yeare of Christ 1532, disgraced from the name of quene, and from thenceforth appointed onlie to be called the princeesse dowager of prince Arthur, about five yeares after which she died on the eight of Januarie, being the yeare of our redemption 1535, which was the seauen and twentieth yeare of king Henric the eight, and was honourable buried in the abbey of Peterborough, for which cause afterward in the generall dissolution of the abbeies, when all those houses were spoiled, this abbey was not onelie for hir buriall there spared and not defaced, but also further honored with a greater title, and turned into a bishoprike, by the said king Henric the eight.

Katharine Par, the daughter of sir Thomas Par, lord of Kirkbie Kenball, and wife to king Henric the eight, was by patent made protectresse of the realme of England, when king Henric the eight went in person to the wars of Bullongne, on the thirtenth of Julie in the yeare of our redemption 1544, being the sixt and thirtieth yeare of the triumphant reigne of the said king. This ladie Katharine being the lord Latimers widow, was married to the king at Hampton court, one the twelfe of Julie being the five and thirtieth yeare of his reigne, and the yeare of Christ 1543, who hauing no issue by the king, was after the kings death married to Thomas Seimer knight, lord Seimer of Sudleie and high admirall of England.

Edward Seimer knight, vicount Beauchampe earle of Hertford, & after duke of Summerfet, was protector of the kings person, and of the kingdome, in the first yeare of king Edward the sixt, his nephew which was in the yeare of our redemption 1546, the king being then but nine yeares old. Of this man is moze spoken in my following discourse of all the dukes of England by creation or descent since the conquest, with which duke of Summerfet, the last in office of protectorship, Francis Thim knitteth by this simple discourse of the protectors of England of the kings person.

¶ On the 17 of Februarie, on which date were receiued the booke of the reliefe of all the wards of London, towards the new hospitals, by the kings commissioners, the counsell dined at maister Compers the thirte, and after dinner maister Thomas Curteis alderman came thither to speake with the lord chancelloz for a matter he had depending afoze him in the chancerie, but for his misdemeanour in words and signes to the lord chancelloz at that time, the said maister Curteis was committed to ward in the Fleet. The sixt and twentieth of Februarie, sir Rafe Wane and sir Miles Partridge were hanged on the tower hill; & sir Michaele Stanthope with sir Thomas Arundell were beheaded there. The last of Aprill, through negligence of the gunpowder makers, a certeine house nere the tower of London, with the last of powder was blowne up and burnt, the gunpowder makers being fiftene in number, were all slaine.

The sixtenth of Maie was a goodlie muster of horsemen made before the king, in the parke at Greenwich, vnder the kings banner his band of pensioners, in number a hundred and fiftie, euerie pensioner two great horses and a gelding, the lord Wale their lieutenant. The duke of Northumberland, great maister of the kings household vnder the white lion & the ragged staffe fiftie. The duke of Suffolke vnder the vnicozne in the starre a hundred and ten. The lord marquisse of Winchester, high treasurer, vnder his banner the falcon, one hundred men. The marquisse of Northampton high chamberleine vnder the maidenhead a hundred. The earle of Arundell lord priuie seale vnder the gose a hundred. The earle of Warwike maister of the kings horses vnder the white lion fiftie. The earle of Huntington vnder his banner fiftie. The earle of Rutland vnder the peacocke fiftie. The earle of Penbroke vnder the greene dragon fiftie. The lord Darcie vnder the maidens bodie fiftie. The lord Cobham vnder the Saracens head, fiftie. The lord Clinton lord admirall vnder the anchor, fiftie. The lord warden of the fine ports, vnder the rose in the sunne beames, one hundred.

¶ Not long after the death of the said duke of Summerfet and his complices, it chanced the reuerend father in God maister doctor Ribleie then bishop of London, to preach before the kings maiestie at Westminster. In the which sermon he made a fruitfull and goodlie exhortation to the rich, to be mercifull vnto the poze, and also to moue such as were in authoritie, to trauele by some charitable waie & meane, to comfort and relieue them. Whereupon the kings maiestie being a prince of such towardnesse and vertue for his peaces, as England before neuer brought forth, and the same also being so well reteined and brought vp in all godlie knowledge, as well by his vere uncle the late protector, as also by his vertuous and learned schoolmaisters, was so carefull of the gods gouernement of the realme, and chiefe to do and prefer such things as most speciallie touched the honor of almightie God. And vnderstanding that a great number of poze people did swarme in this realme, and chiefe in the cite of London, and that no good order was taken for them, did suddenlie and of himselfe send to the said bishop as soon as his sermon was ended, willing him not to depart, vntill that he had spoken with him (and this that I now write was the vertie report of the said bishop Ribleie) who according to the kings commandement gaue his attendance. And so soon as the kings maiestie was at leasure, he called for him, and made him to come vnto him in a great gallerie at Westminster, where (to his knowledge) and the king also told him so, there was present no mo persons than they two, and therefore made him sit downe in one chaire, and he himselfe in another, which (as it seemed) were before the comming of the bishop there purpose set, & caused the bishop (maugre his teeth) to be couered, and then entered communication with him in this sort.

First giuing him most hartie thanks for his sermon and god exhortation, he therein rehearsed such speciall things as he had noted, and that so manie, that the bishop said; Trulie, trulie (for that was com- monlie his oth) I could neuer haue thought that ex- cellencie to haue bene in his grace, that I beheld and saw in him. At the last, the kings maiestie much commended him for his exhortation for the reliefe of the poze. But my lord (saith he) ye willed such as are in authoritie to be carefull therof, and to deuise some good order for their reliefe, wherein I thinke you meane me, for I am in highest place, and therefore am the first that must make answere vnto God for my negligence, if I should not be carefull therein, knowing it to be the expresse commandement of almightie God, to haue compassion of his poze and needie members, for whome we must make an account vnto him. And trulie my lord, I am before all things most willing to trauele that waie, and I doubt

The citizen of London moued to be assistants in this charitable beaution.

The direct report of bishop Ribleie, which in due way is what trulie followed by his sermon. Ergo the hearing of the second question is precluded.

The ready of the lord to see the good Degeing poze.

allusion of Iohn Leland recorded in praise of this most excellent prince, as followeth in this epigram:

*Quisquis Eaduerdum Romano expresserat ore, Custodem fidei dixerit esse sacra.
Hoc ego crediderim puero feliciter orto A superis nomen caluit esse datum.
Est pater antiquæ fidei defensor amicus, Degener & nullo tempore natus erit.*

Sir William Chester.
John Cal-throp draper.

But to returne where we left. By example of the charitable act of this vertuous yong king, sir William Chester knight and alderman of London, and John Calthrop citizen and draper of the said citie, at their owne proper costs and charges made the bricke walles and way on the backside that leadeth from the said new hospitall, vnto the hospitall of saint Bartholomewes, and also couered and bauted the towne ditch from Aldersgate to Spewgate, which before was verie noisome and contagious to the said hospitall.

Richard Cas-
tell thowmaker.

This hospitall being thus erected and put in good order, there was one Richard Castell alias Casteller, thowmaker, dwelling in Westminster, a man of great trauell and labor in his facultie with his owne hands, and such a one as was named the cocke of Westminster, for that both winter and summer he was at his worke before foure of the clocke in the morning. This man thus trulie and painfullie laboring for his liuing, God blessed and increased his labours so abundantly, that he purchased lands and tenements in Westminster, to the yearelie value of fortie and foure pounds. And hauing no child, with the consent of his wife (who furnished him, & was a ver-tuous & good woman) gaue the same lands wholie to Christs hospitall aforesaid, for the reliefe of the innocent and fatherlesse children, and for the succor of the miserable, sore and sicke, harbored in the other hospitals about London, whose example God grant manie to follow.

I. Stow, 1053.
A monster.

The third of August, at Spidleton eleuen miles from Oxford, a woman brought forth a child which had two perfect bodies from the nauill vppward, and were so ioined together at the nauill, that when they were laid in length, the one head & bodie was eastward, and the other west: the legs for both the bodies grew out at the midst where the bodies ioined, and had but one issue for the excrements of both bodies: they liued eightene daies, and were women children. The eight of August were taken at Dunthorow three great fishes called dolphins: & the weeke following at Blackewall were six more taken, and brought to London, the least of them was more than anie horse.

Great fishes,

Such about this season there were three notable ships set forth and furnished for the great aduenture of the unknowne voyage into the east by the north seas. The great doer and incourager of which voyage was Sebastian Cabato an English man, borne at Bristow, but was the sonne of a Genowate. These ships at the last arrived in the coun-trie of Spilcoute, not without great losse and danger, and namelie of their capteine, who was a worthy and aduenturous gentleman, called sir Hugh Willoughbie knight, who being tossed and driuen by tempest, was at the last found in his ship frozen to death and all his people. But now the said voyage and trade is greatly advanced, and the merchants aduenturing that waie, are newlie by act of parlement incorporated and indued with sundrie priuileges and liberties.

Sebastian Cabato.

Three maria-ges betwene great estates.

About the beginning of the moneth of Maie next following, there were three notable marriages concluded, & shortly after solemnized at Durham place.
The first was betwene the lord Wilford Dukelet, the fourth sonne of the duke of Northumberland, and the ladie Jane, eldest daughter to Henrie duke of Sulfolke, & the ladie Francis his wife, was the daughter of Marie second sister to king Henrie the eight, first married to Lewis the French king, and after to Charles Brandon duke of Suffolke. The second ma-riage was betwene the lord Herbert, son and heire to William earle of Penbroke, and the ladie Katharine, second daughter of the said ladie Francis, by the said Henrie duke of Suffolke. And the third was betwene Henrie lord Hastings, sonne and heire to Francis earle of Huntington, and ladie Katharine yongest daughter to the forenamed duke of Northumberland.

These marriages were compassed & concluded chief-lie vpon purpose to change & alter the order of succesion to the crowne, made in the time of king Henrie the eight, from the said kings daughters, Marie and Elizabeth, and to conueie the same immediatly after the death of king Edward to the house of Sulfolke, in the right of the said ladie Francis: wherein the said yong king was an earnest traoueller in the time of his sicknesse, & all for feare that if his sister Marie, being next heire to the crowne, should succeed, that she would subuert all his lawes and statutes made concerning religion, wherof he was most carefull: for the continuance whereof he sought to establish a meet order of succession, by the alliance of great houses by waie of marriage, which neuer thelesse were of no force to serue his purpose. For tending to the disheriting of the rightfull heirs, they proued nothing prosperous to the parties: for two of them were sone after made frustrate, the one by death, the other by dinorsie.

In the meane while, the king became euerie daie more sicke than other of a consumption in his lungs, so as there was no hope of his recouerie. Where-vpon those that then bare chiefe authoritie in coun-cell, with other prelates and nobles of the realme, called to them diuerse notable persons, learned as well in diuinitie as in the lawes of the land, namelie bishops, iudges, & other, who fell to consultation vpon this so weightie cause, and lastly concluded vpon the denise of king Edwards will, to declare the said ladie Jane, eldest niece to king Henrie the eight, and wife to the said lord Wilford, to be rightfull heire in succession to the crowne of England, without respect had to the statute made in the five and thirtieth yeare of king Henrie the eight: the true meaning of which statute they did impugn and ouerthrow by di-uerse subtill sinister constructions of the same, to disherit the said kings daughters, to whome the succession of the crowne of England of right appertei-ned, as well by the common lawes of this realme, as also by the said statute made in the said five and thirtith yeare of king Henrie, as aforesaid. To which new order of succession, all the said kings counsell, with manie bishops, lords, doctors and iudges of the realme subscribed their names, without refusal of any, except sir James Hales knight, one of the in-fantes of the common pless, who being called to this counsell, would in no wise giue his assent, either by word or writing, as ye shall heare more in the histo-rie of quene Marie.

Now when these matters were thus concluded, and after confirmed by a number of hands, as aforesaid, then the noble prince king Edward the first, by long lingering sicknesse and consumption of his lungs aforesaid, approached to his death, and departed out of this life the first daie of Iulie, in the seuenth yeare of his reigne, and seuententh of his age, after he had reigned and noble gouerned this realme six yeares, five moneths, and eight daies. And a little before his departing, lifting up his eyes to God, he prayed as followeth.

The prair of king Edward the LORD God, deliuer me out of this miserable and wretched life, take me among thy chosen: howbeit not my will, but thy will be done.

Lord I commit my spirit to thee, oh Lord thou knowest how happie it were for mee to be with thee: yet for thy choicens sake if it be thy will, send me life and helth, that I maie trulie serue thee. Oh my Lord blesse thy people, and saue thine inheritance.
Oh Lord God, saue thy chosen people of England. Oh my Lord God defend this realme from papistrie, and mainteine thy true religion, that I and my people maie praise thy holie name. And therewithall he said, I am faint, Lord haue mercie vpon me, and take my spirit.

Thus did this good young king paied vp to God his ghost the first daie of Iulie (as before is mentioned) whome if it had pleased God to haue spared with longer life, not unlike it was, but he should haue so gouerned this English common-wealth, that he might haue bene comparable with any of his noble progenitors: so that the losse of so towarlike a young king, greatlie discomforted the whole English nation, that looked for such a reformation in the state of the common-wealth at his hands, as was to be wished for of all good subiects: which bred such a liking in them toward him, that euen among verie traitorous rebels his name yet was had in reuerence, although otherwile they neuer so much forgot their dutie both towards him and other, appointed to gouerne vnder him, through a malicious and most wilfull error; as if his tender yeares had not sufficientlie warranted his roiall authoritie, but that the same had bene insarpred by others against his will and pleasure.

And as he was intierlie beloued of his subiects, so with the like affection of kindnes he loved them againe; of nature and disposition make, much inclined to clemencie, euer hauing a regard to the sparing of life. Where wanted in him no promptnes of wit, gra-uitie of sentence, ripenesse of iudgement, as his age might beare, fauour and loue of religion was in him from his childhod, his skill and knowledge in sciences, besides his other excellent vertues, were such, that to them he seemed rather bozne than bought vp.
I made some verie strange, that in his young yeares (as maister Fox reporteth of him) he could tell and recite all the ports, hauens, and creekes, not within his owne realme onelie, but also in Scotland, and likewise in France, what comming in there was, how the tide serued in euerie of them; moreouer, what burthen, and what wind serued for the com-ming into each hauen: also of all his iustices, magistrates, & gentlemen that bare any authoritie within his realme, he knew their names, their housekeeping, their religion and conuersation what it was. He had a singular respect to iustice, a vertue most commendable in a prince, and chieflie to the dispatch of poore mens suites. He perfectlie understood the Latine tong, the French, the Graeke, Italian, and Spanish, neither was he ignorant (saith Cardanus) in Logique, in the principles of naturall philosophie, or in musicke.

To conclude, his towardlinesse was such in all heroicall vertues, noble gifts, and markable qualities conuenient for his princelie estate, that so much was hoped for in his roiall person (if he had liued till triall might haue bene had of the poore) as was to beloued for in anie one prince that euer had rule ouer this noble realme. ¶ The eight of Iulie, the lord maior of London was sent for to the court, then at Greenwich, and to bring with him six aldermen, as manie merchants of the Staple, and as manie merchant aduenturers, vnto whom by the counsell was secretlie declared the death of king Edward, & also whom he had ordeined to the succession of the crowne by his letters patents, to the which they were sworn, and charged to keepe it secret. ¶ But now to proceed with the doings that followed. Immediate after the death of this so worthy a prince king Edward, the aforesaid ladie Jane was proclaimed queene of this realme by the sound of trumpet, that is to saie, the ninth daie of Iulie, at which proclamation were present the lords of the counsell, the maior of London, with others.

¶ The eleauenth of Iulie, Gilbert Pot, dialler to Arthur Sanders vintner, dwelling at St. Johns head within Ludgate, who was accused by the said Sanders his maister, was set vpon the pillorie in Cheape, with both his eares nailed, and cleane cut off, for words speaking at time of the proclamation of ladie Jane. At the which execution was a trumpet blowne, and a herald read his offense, in presence of one of the shiriffes, &c. About fixe of the clocke the same daie in the afternone, Pinion Sanders, master to the said Gilbert Pot, and John Owen a gunner, comming from the tower of London by water in a wherrie, and shoyting London bydge, towards the blacke friers, were drowned at saint Maries Locke, and the wherriemen saued by their oares.

The ladie Marie, a little before lieng at Honesdon in Hartfordshire, hauing intelligence of the state of the king hir brother, and of the secret practise against hir: by the aduise of hir friends, with all speed toke hir iourne toward hir house of Kenninghall in Norfolke, intending there to remaine, untill she could make hir selfe more strong of hir friends and allies, and withall wrote vnto the lords of the counsell in forme as followeth.

A letter of the ladie Marie sent to the lords of the counsell, wherein she claimeth the croune now after the decease of hir brother king Edward.

¶ Lords we greet you well, and haue re-ceiued sore aduertisement, that our dearest brother the king our late souereigne lord is departed to Gods mercie: which newes, how they be woofull to our heart, he onelie knoweth, to whose will and pleasure we must and doe humble submit vs, and all our wils. But in this so lamentable a case, that is to wit, now after his maiesties departure and death, concerning the crowne & gouernance of this realme of England, with the ritle of France, and all things thereto belonging that hath bene prouided by act of parlement, and the testament and last will of our dearest father, besides other circumstances aduan-cing our right: you know, the realme, and the whole world knoweth, the rolles and records appeare by the authoritie of the king our said father, and the king our said brother, and the subiects of this realme, so that we verelie trust that there is no true subiect that is, can, or would pretend to be ignorant thereof: and of our part we haue our selues caused, and as God shall aid and strength vs, shall cause our right and title in this behalfe to be published and proclaimed accor-dinglie. And albeit this so weightie a matter seemeth strange, that the dieng of our said brother vpon

She certifieth the lords that she knoweth what is intended against hir.

She chargeth the lords upon their loialties to cause hir right to the regement to be proclaimed.

The lords aduertise the ladye Marie that the ladye Jane is quene.

A subtill shift to proue the ladye Marie illegitimate.

weighed this present case with our estate, with your owne estate, the commonwealth, and all our honours, we shall and may conceiue great hope and trust, with much assurance in your loialtie and seruice, and therefore for the time interpret and take things not to the worst, and that ye yet will like noblemen worke the best. For the lesse, we are not ignorant of your consultations to vnder the provisions made for our preferment, nor of the great bands and provisions forcible, whereunto ye be assembled and prepared, by whome, and to what end, God and you know, and nature can feare some euill. But be it that some consideration politike, or whatsoeuer thing else hath moued you thereto, yet doubt you not my lords, but we can take all these your doings in gracious part, being also right ready to remit and fullie pardon the same, with that frellie to eschew bloudshed & vengeance against all those that can or will intend the same, trusting also assuredly you will take acceptance this grace and vertue in good part, as appertineth, and that we shall not be enforced to vse this seruice of other our true subiects and frends, which in this our iust and rightfull case, God (in whome our whole alliance is) shall send vs. Wherefore my lords, we requite you, and charge you, and euerie of you, that euerie of you of your allegiance which you owe to God and vs, and to none other, for our honour, and the seruice of our realme, onelie imploye your selues and forthwith upon receit hereof cause our right and title to the crowne and government of this realme, to be proclaimed in our cite of London, and such other places as to your wisdoms shall seme good, and as to this case appertineth, not falling hereof, as our verie trust is in you: and thus our letter signed with our owne hand shall be your sufficient warrant in this behalfe. Given vnder our signet at our manoir of Kenninghall the ninth of Iulie 1553.

To this letter of the ladye Marie, the lords of the counsell answered againe as followeth.

MAdam, we haue receiued your letters the ninth of this instant, declaring your supposed title, which you iudge your selfe to haue to the imperiall crowne of this realme, and all the dominions thereto belonging. For answer therof, this is to aduertise you, that forsomuch as our soueraigne ladye quene Jane is, after the death of our soueraigne lord Edward the first, a prince of most noble memorie, inuested and possessed with the iust and right title of the imperiall crowne of this realme, not onelie by god order of old ancient good lawes of this realme; but also by our late soueraigne lords letters patents, signed with his owne hand, and sealed with the great seale of England, in presence of the most part of the nobles, counsellors, iudges, with diuers other graue and sage personages, assenting and subscribing to the same: we must therefore, as of most bound dutie and allegiance, assent vnto hir said grace, and to none other, except we should (which faithfull subiects cannot) fall into greuous and vnspokeable enormities. Wherefore we can no lesse do, but for the quiet both of the realme and you also, to aduertise you, that forsomuch as the diuorcie made betwene the king of famous memorie king Henrie the eight, and the ladye Katharine your mother, was necessarie to be had, both by the euerlasting lawes of God, and also by the ecclesiasticall lawes, and by the most part of the noble and learned vniuersities of chifsendow, and confirmed also by the sundrie acts of parlements, remaining yet in their force, and thereby you iustlie made illegitimate, and vnder the crowne imperiall of this realme, and the rules, dominions, and possessions of the same: you will vpon iust consideration hereof, and of diuers other causes lawfull to be alleged for the same, and for the iust inheritance of the right line, and goodlie orders taken by the late king Edward the first, and greatest personages aforesaid, surcease, by any pretense to ber and molest any of our soueraigne ladye quene Jane hir subiects, from the true faith and allegiance due vnto hir grace, assuring you, that if you will for respect thew your selfe quiet and obedient (as you ought) you shall find vs all, and severall, ready to do you any seruice that we with dutie may, and to be glad of your quietnesse, to prelerue the common state of this realme, wherein you may be otherwise greuous vnto vs, to your selfe, and to them. And thus we bid you most hartlie well to fare. From the towre of London this ninth of Iulie.

Tour ladieships frends shewing your selfe an obedient subiect,

Thomas Canturburie, the marquess of Winchester, John Bedford, William Northampton, Thomas Cle Chancellor, John Northumberland, Henrie Suffolke, Henrie Arundell, Francis Shrewsburie, William Penbroke, Cobham, R. Rich, Huntington, Darcie, Cheineie, R. Cotton, John Gates, William Peter, William Cecil, John Cheke, John Mason, Edward North, Robert Botwys.

All these aforesaid, except onelie the duke of Northumberland, and sir John Gates, were either by speciall fauour, or speciall or generall pardon, discharged for this offence against hir committed, after hir comming to be quene. But now vpon the receit of this answer, vnderstanding by hir frends that she could not lie in suertie at Kenninghall, being a place open & easie to be approached, she removed from thence vnto hir castell of Fremingham, standing in a wood countrie, & not so easie to be invaded by hir enemies. So sone as the counsell heard of hir sudden departure, and considering that all came not to passe as they supposed; they caused speialle a power of men to be gathered together. And first they agreed that the duke of Suffolke father to the new made quene, should haue the conduct and leading of the armie.

But afterward it was deuised and decreed vpon further considerations, and by the speciall means of the ladye Jane his daughter, who taking the matter heauilie, with weeping teares, made request to the whole counsell, that hir father might tarrie at home in hir companie. Where vpon the counsell persuaded with the duke of Northumberland, to take that vantage vpon him, saying, that no man was so fit therefore: because that he had achieved the victorie in Suffolke once already, and was therefore so feared, that none durst once lift by their weapon against him: besides that, he was the best man of warre in the realme, as well for the ordering of his camps and souldiers, both in battell and in their tents, as also by experience, knowledge and wisdom; he could both animate his armie with witty persuasions, and also pacifie and allate his enemies pride with his stout courage, or else to dissuade them (if need were) from their enterpryse. Finally, said they, this is the short and the long, the quene will in no wise grant, that hir father shall take it vpon him: therefore (quoth they) we thinke it good, if it may please your grace, it lieth in you to remedie the matter. With these & the like persuasions the duke was allured to put himselfe desperatlie vpon hazard:

Non morte horrenda non vllis terribus armis.

Insomuch that he reioined vpon their talke, and said: Well then, sith ye thinke it good, I and mine will go, not doubting of your fidelitie to the quenes maiestie, maistie, which now I leaue in your custodie. So that night he sent for both lordes, knights, and other that should go with him, and caused all things to be prepared accordingly. Then went the counsell in to the ladie Jane, and told hir of their conclusion, who humbly thanked the duke for reseruing hir father at home, and beseeched him to vse his diligence: whereunto he answered, that he would do what in him laie. The morrow following, great preparation was made, the duke earlie in the morning called for his owne harnesse, and saw it made readie at Durham place, where he appointed all his retinue to meet. The same daie carts were laden with munition and artillery, and field peeces were set forward.

The same forenoone the duke moued off to the counsell to send their powers after him, as it was before determined, the same to meet with him at Newmarket, and they promised they would. He said further to some of them: My lords, I and these other noble personages, with the whole armie that now go forth, as well for the behalfe of you & yours, as for the establishing of the quenes highnesse, shall not onelic aduenture our bodie and liues amongst the bloudie strokes and cruell assaults of our aduersaries in the open fields: but also we do leaue the conseruation of our selues, children, and families at home here with you, as altogether committed to your trust and fidelities: whome, if we thought we would through malice, conspiracie, or dissention leaue vs your friends in the byers, and betraie vs; we could as well sundrie waies foresee and provide for our owne safegardes, as anie of you by betraieing vs can do for yours. But now upon the onelic trust and faithfulness of your honours, whereof we thinke our selues most assured, we do hazard our liues. Which trust and promise if ye shall violate, hoping thereby of life and promotion: yet shall not God count you innocent of our bloods, neither acquite you of the sacred and holie oth of allegiance, made frelie by you to this vertuous ladie the quenes highnesse, who by your and our intisement is rather of force placed therein, than by hir owne seeking and request. Consider also, that Gods cause, which is the preferment of his word, & feare of papists entrance, hath bene (as ye haue here before alwaies said) the originall ground whereupon ye euen at the first motion granted your goodwills and consents thereunto, as by your handwritings appeareth; and thinke not the contrarie, but if ye meane deceit, though not forthwith, yet hereafter God will reuenge the same.

I can saie no more, but in this trouble some time with you to vse constant hearts, abandoning all malice, enuie, and priuat affections. And therewithall the first course for the lordes came vp, wherefore the duke shut vp his talke with these wordes. I haue not spoken to you in this sort upon anie mistrust I haue of your truths, of which alwaies I haue euer hitherto conceiued a trustie confidence, but I haue put you in remembrance thereof, what chance of variance so euer might grow amongst you in mine absence: and this I praie you, with me not worde good speed in this iourne, than ye would haue to your selues. My lord, saith one of them, if ye mistrust anie of vs in this matter, your grace is farre deceived, for which of vs can wash his hands cleane thereof? And if we should thinke from you as from one that were culpable, which of vs can excuse himselfe to be guiltlesse? Therefore herein your doubt is too farre cast. I praie God it be (quoth the duke) let vs go to dinner: and so they sat downe. After dinner the duke went in to the quene, where his commission was by that time sealed, for his lieutenantship of the armie, and then toke his leaue of hir, and so did certaine other lordes also.

Then as the duke came through the counsell chamber, he toke his leaue of the earle of Arundell, who praied God be with his grace, saieing he was sozie it was not his chance to go with him and beare him companie, in whose presence he could find in his heart to spend his blood euen at his set. Then the earle of Arundell toke Thomas Louell the dukes boie by the hand, and said: Farewell gentle Thomas with all my heart. Then the duke, with the lord marquisse of Northampton, the lord Greie, and diuerse other toke their harge, and went to Durham place, and to White hall, where that night they mustered their men: and the next daie in the morning the duke departed with the number of six hundred men, or thereabouts. And as they rode through Shorwich, said the duke to the lord Greie: The people please to see vs, but not one saith God speed vs. The same daie sir John Gates and other went out after the duke.

Now as the duke went forward on his waie (with his commission from the whole counsell, and his warrant vnder the broad scale of England, without mistrust of that which after fortune to his owne destruction, as in the historie of quene Marie shall appeare, accompanied with no small number of lordes and gentlemen, hauing notwithstanding his times prescribed, and his iourneies appointed by the counsell, to the intent he would not seeme to do any thing but vpon warrant) what a do there was, what stirring on euerie side, what sending, what riding and posting, what letters, messages, & instructions went to and fro, what talking among the souldiers, what harburning among the people, what faire pretences outwardlie, inwardlie what priuie practises there were, what speeding and sending forth ordinance out of the towre, yea euen the same daie that quene Marie at euen was proclaimed quene, what rumors, and comming downe of souldiers as there was from all quarters, a world it was to see, and a processe to declare, enough to make (as saith master Fox) a whole volume, euen as big as an Atlas.

The greatest helpe that made for the ladie Marie, was the short iourneies of the duke, which by commission were assigned vnto him before, as aboue is mentioned: and happilie not without the politike forecast of some in fauour of the ladie Marie: for the longer the duke lingered in his sojage, the ladie Marie the more increased in puissance, the hearts of the people being mightilie bent vnto hir. Whereupon she in the meane time remaining at Fremingham, and hearing of this preparation against hir, gathered together such power of the noblemen & other hir friends in that countrie, as she could get. And first of all, the noblemen that came vnto hir aid, were the earles of Sussex, Bath, and Driford, the lord Wentworth, sir Thomas Cornwallis, sir Henrie Feringham, sir William Walgraue, with diuerse other gentlemen and commons of the counties of Suffolke and Suffolke. Here (as master Fox noteth) the Suffolke men being the first that resorted to hir, promised hir their aid and helpe to the uttermost of their powers, so that she would not go about to alter the religion which hir brother had established, and was now vled and exercised through the realme. To this condition she agreed, with such promise, as no man would haue doubted that anie inuocation of matters in religion should haue followed, by hir sufferance or procurement during hir reigne: but how soon she forgot that promise, it shall shortly after plainlie appeare.

In this meane season, the lord Windsor, sir Edmund Beekham, sir Robert Duncie, and sir Edward Hastings, called the commoners of the shire of Buckingham; vnto whome sir John Williams, which afterward was lord Williams of Thame, and

The earle of Arundell praied God be with his grace, saieing he was sozie it was not his chance to go with him and beare him companie, in whose presence he could find in his heart to spend his blood euen at his set.

Such a do on all sides during this his iourne, betweene the duke and the ladie Marie.

The old proverbie verified: Deaie by death danger.

and sir Leonard Chamberleine, with the cheefe power of Wiltshire. And out of Northamptonshire came sir Thomas Tresham, and a great number of gentlemen out of diuerse parts, whose names were too long to rehearse. These capitaine with their companies being thus assembled in warlike manner, marched forward towards Northfolke to the aid of the ladie Marie, and the further they went, the more their power increased.

About this time sir Shypps well manned, that were appointed to lie before Portsmouth, and to haue taken the ladie Marie if she had fled that waie, were by force of weather driuen into the haven, where one maister Jerningham was raising power on the ladie Maries behalfe, who hearing thereof, came thither.
Whereupon the capitaine toke a bote and went to the ships, but the sailers and souldiers asked maister Jerningham what he would haue, and whether he would haue their capitaine or no, and he said yea. Marie said they, ye shall haue them or we will throw them into the bottome of the sea. But the capitaine said forthwith, that they would serue quene Marie wil-linglie, and so brought forth their men, and conueied with them their great ordinance. Of the comming of these ships the ladie Marie was wonderfull ioyous, & afterward doubted little the dukes puissance: but when newes thereof was brought to the tower, each man there began to drow backward: and ouer that, word of a greater mischance was brought to the tower: that is to saie, that the noblemens tenants refused to serue their lords against quene Marie.

The duke thought long for his successors, and wrote somewhat sharpe to the councill at the tower in that behalfe, as well for lacke of men as munition, but a slender answer had he againe. And from that time forward, certaine of the councill, to wit, the erle of Penbrooke, and sir Thomas Cheineie lord warden, and other, sought to get out of the tower to consult in London, but could not. On the sixteenth of Julie, being sundaie, doctor Ridsdale bishop of London, by commandement of the councill, preached at Pauls crosse, where he vehementlie perswaded the people in the title of the ladie Jane, late proclaimed quene, and inuied earnestlie against the title of ladie Marie, &c. The same sixteenth of Julie, the lord treasuror was gone out of the tower to his house in London at night, and forthwith about seauen of the clocke the gates of the tower vpon a sudden were shut vp, and the keyes bozne vp to the ladie Jane, which was for feare of some packing in the lord trea-suror: but he was fetched againe to the tower about twelue of the clocke in the night.]

The lords of the councill, being in this meane while at London, after they vnderstood how the better part of the realme were inclined, and hearing euerie daie newes of great assemblies, began to suspect the sequell of this enterprise. So that providing for their owne suertie, without respect of the duke (who now was at Burie) they fell to a new councill, and lastlie by assent made proclamation at London in the name of the ladie Marie, by the name of Marie quene of England, France, & Ireland, defender of the faith, & of the churches of England & Ireland supreme head. Of which proclamation, after the duke of Northumberland, being then at Burie, was aduertised by letters of discomfort from the councill, he incontinentlie, according to the new order recei-ued from them, returned with his power againe to Cambridge. Now so sudden change of minds forthwith appeared in his armie, that they which before seemed most forward in that quarrell, began first to flee from him, & so euerie man shifting for himselfe, he that late before was furnished of such multitude of souldiers, was suddenlie forsaken of all sauing a few, whose perils were ioined with his.

But now before I proceed anie further in the historie of quene Marie, who was now receiued and proclaimed quene, as then to succeed hir brother, I will speake somewhat of the learned men that wrote & published anie pamphlets or treatises in his daies, as in deed there were manie: but for that the more part of them died in quene Maries time, or in the quenes maiesties time that now is, or else are yet liuing, I do omit those here, meaning to speake of them hereafter, if God shall permit, as occasion maie serue. For the residue that ended their liues in this kings daies, these I find: David Clapham a lawyer and well scene in the Latine tong, wrote sundry treatises; Robert Talbot a prebendarie of Northwich, verie skilfull in antiquities; Edward Hall a counsellor in the common law, but excellent-lie scene in histories, wrote a notable chronicle of the union of the two houses of Yorke & Lancaster.

Furthermoze Richard Tracie of Lodington in Gloucestershire, an esquier, and verie well learned, sonne to William Tracie; doctor Joseph an excellent preacher; George Jole a Bedfordshire man, that wrote diuerse treatises concerning diuinitie, and died either in the last yeare of king Edward, or in the beginning of quene Maries reigne, as appeareth by maister Bale; Alexander Barkleie a Scot, a notable poet, and a good rhetorician, departed this life in the yeare one thousand five hundred fiftie and two; William Hugh a Northfolke man, wrote, besides other things, a notable treatise called the trowbled mans medicine, he deceased by the burking of a veine, in the yeare one thousand five hundred fortie and nine; Thomas Sternehold bozne in South hampton, turned into English meter seuen & thirtie psalmes chosen forth of Dauids psalter. Of strangers that liued and died here in this kings daies, excellentlie learned, and renowned for such treatises as they published to the world, Martine Bucet and Paulus Fagius are most famous. To end now with this part of the booke concerning king Edward, I haue thought good to set downe Ierom Car-dans verses, written as an epitaph of him (and recoded by maister Fox in his historie) as here followeth:

*Flete nefas magnum, sed toto flebilis orbe
